On account of various causes labour troubles have been prevalent in India for many months; the strained economic conditions and the great rise in prices have been the main causes of this unrest. The forces let loose by the war and the Russian revolution have to a certain extent widened and coloured the political outlook of the Indian labourer. For many weary years his patience has been heavily taxed, and he has been on the look-out for means to improve his lot. Excessive hours, low wages, premature exhaustion, due to malnutrition, lack of education for himself and his children, absence of any housing arrangements, and of general sanitary conditions, and the prevalence of apathy on the part of the authorities and the employers have made the Indian labourer restless. The Indian Factories Act was passed in 1881; during nearly 40 years twice only has that Act been amended. In September, 1890, an Indian Factory Commission was appointed, and again in 1908 the Indian Factory Labour Commission went round. The reports of these Commissions led to the amending of the Factory Act, and the last occasion on which this was done was in 1911. The law now obtains as it was amended in 1911. This law enables an employer to engage labourers for 12 hours per day, on 6 days in the week, i.e., 72 hours per week. Women are allowed to be employed for 11 hours per day. Young persons, i.e., boys and girls of 9 to 14 years of age, are employed for 6 hours per day; generally two shifts are used in textile factories. The long day of 12 hours has a ridiculously small break of 30 minutes in the middle of it. This 12 hours day lengthens into 13 or 14, or even more, as was recently pointed out by an able Indian Civil Servant:—"From the standpoint of the worker, the time taken in going to and returning from the factory must be added to the length of his active day, which cannot then be less than 13 hours."

In the matter of wages, the law is dumb. In the matter of sanitation and factory inspection it speaks in halting tones, and those who have practical experience know how superficial is the actual inspection, and how ineffective really in bettering the lot of the labourer.

Thus it will be perceived that the record of the administration in improving and bettering the condition of the Factory labourer is not a satisfactory one. This point is not only of academic interest, but becomes a matter of urgent practical importance when we see that the Report of the Functions Committee makes the "settlement of labour disputes" and the "welfare of labour, including provident funds, industrial insurance (general, health and accident), and housing" reserved subjects. I do not quite understand why the somewhat peculiar arrangement detailed below is resorted to in that Report. If we refer to p. 26 of the Functions Committee Report and look at items 24 and 25, and then turn to p. 46, and look at Serial No. 15, we find that No. 24, "development of Industries, including industrial research and technical education" is a transferred subject, in all provinces, while No. 25, "Industrial matters included under the following heads:

(a) factories;
(b) settlement of labour disputes;
(c) electricity;
(d) boilers;
(e) gas;
(f) smoke nuisances; and
(g) welfare of labour, including provident funds, industrial insurance (general, health and accident), and housing" are reserved in all provinces.

This is the first point which I respectfully submit for consideration to the Joint Committee. I would strongly urge that the whole of No. 25 of the Provincial subjects (Functions Report, p. 26) should be transferred. Of the seven items included in No. 25, (a), (b), (c), (d), are made "subject to Indian legislation"; while I see the point of (a) factories, (c) electricity, and (d) boilers, being made subject to Indian legislation for the sake of obtaining uniformity, I fail to see why (b) settlement of labour disputes should be so treated. This is actually to sow the seed of future discord, and I think it my duty to strike a note of warning. Trade Unionism is bound to grow fast in India; the settlement of labour disputes will be claimed as one of their rights by the Trade Unions on behalf of the labourer, and if it is in the hand of Government, it will bring the Unions into conflict with the Government, and will inevitably lead the labourers to regard the Government as on the side of the employers. The Government should limit its work to the creation of permanent Boards of Arbitration to which labour disputes can be referred, on lines similar to a Labour Board suggested by some of us last October for Madras.

Presently we shall require in India some kind of legislation for the recognition of Trade Unions and other labour organisations. Why should a start not be made now, by transferring the whole of item No. 25, and making the popular half of the provincial diarchical Government responsible for the entire subject of the development of industries—which is recommended to be a transferred subject (with the exception of large industries claimed by the Government of India)—and the management of industrial matters, including the most important item (g) welfare of labour? It is my considered opinion that Indian Ministers will be better fitted to carry out adequate factory reforms than the official executive. Anyway, the past record of the administration does not inspire hope or confidence in their capacity or zeal for bettering the lot of the misused labourer. Therefore, with all the force I can command, I respectfully urge that item No. 25 of the provincial subjects should not be reserved, but should be transferred.

This naturally brings us to the question of Indian labour properly and adequately influencing the legislatures. So far back as 1911 Mr. E. S. Montagu, speaking on the Indian Budget in the House of Commons, said:

> The leaders of Indian opinion must set their faces against the degradation of labour, and they need to be specially vigilant, because India's working classes, besides being themselves unorganised are not directly represented on the Legislative Councils, whose Indian members come almost exclusively from the landlord and capitalist classes.

I have only quoted one sentence, but I beg to draw the attention of the Committee to the whole passage in Mr. Montagu's speech.

It is true that in the past non-official members of Legislative Councils have been mostly landlords or capitalists, or lawyers, who did not familiarise themselves with the difficulties and complexities of the life and work of the Indian labourer. I am not forgetting such men as Gopal Krishna Gokhale, of the Imperial Council, or Dewan Bahadur P. Kesava Pillai, of the Provincial, who have, on more than one occasion, championed the cause of the poor. But how are we going to remedy the evils of the past?

In the Bill before us I find no attempt made to introduce any measure of reform which will give the labourer any voice in safeguarding his own interests; in no way can he better his own conditions; he will have to rely, as in the past, on the good will of others, be they foreigners or be they his own countrymen; he has been exploited in the past, and he will continue to be so exploited. But, what is worse, the people who exploit him are coming into greater power. Take Madras; the Franchise Committee recommend a Provincial Council of 120, of which 13 are unalloyed capitalistic seats. A factory manager, a shop-owner, a planter, cannot only vote, but get elected from his Chamber of Commerce, his Trades Association, his Planters' Association. Capitalists will form a powerful element in the Provincial Council; and under the system of franchise recommended by the Southborough Committee the labouring classes will not be able to influence the election. I am speaking specially with reference to the factory labourer, and Bombay affords a better example: The Millowners' Association returns a member, but no labourers' association exists. Commerce and industry have eight seats—excluding landholders' seats—and not a single seat is made available for the representative of labour. I will grant at once that labour organisations do not exist to any great extent; but is that sufficient reason for allowing the exploitation of Indian labour? Is there no way to bring the Indian labourer into power? I maintain that the Indian labourer's interests must be safeguarded, and that the process of safeguarding them must be put into his own hands, and into no one else's. I beg to submit that the masses in India—and among them are the factory labourers—have a culture of their own. Their power of understanding political and economical issues and suggesting proper remedies in a practical manner is well known to those who have worked for and with them. Their political instincts are clear and strong. The factor to be borne in mind is that the Indian labourer loathes the idea of slavery in any shape or form. The Indian labourers want to have schools for their children, houses for themselves, better wages and shorter hours—all as a matter of right and justice. The efforts on the part of the employers or the Government to patronise the labourers are seen as fetters of slavery, albeit golden fetters instead of iron ones. This new spirit is in evidence among Indian labourers, and it is well to recognise that even the golden fetters are resented, and the Indian labourer feels that he is not only a "hand," but also that he has a head and a heart, and aspires to come into his own.

Chairman—continued.

Now, how is this to be done? What weapon can the Joint Committee put into the hands of the labourer to defend himself? The only adequate means that I can suggest is the vote. Enable the Indian labourer to send his own representatives to the Provincial Councils; let all matters relating to his welfare and betterment be in the hands of responsible elected representatives who have the confidence of the labourers. If my suggestion made above that all Industrial matters, including the welfare of labour, be transferred to the popular half of the future provincial administration is given effect to, we shall be on the right way to the solution, and we immediately have to consider the enfranchisement of Indian labour.

I have carefully studied the problem of Franchise in the Madras Presidency. I have the honour to belong to a small Society of careful researchers in the city of Madras, who, after painstaking investigations, have embodied the results of their study in a 60-page volume of royal 8vo. size. I am referring to the Transaction of the Neo-Fabian Society on "The Problem of Franchise in the Madas Presidency," and I beg to draw the attention of the Committee to that publication. I hope I shall not be considered as transgressing my province as a witness before this Committee if I also venture to draw their attention to another Transaction of the Society on "Problems of Reform in the Government of India," which throws light on the thorny subjects of the Indian Legislative Assembly, the Council of State, and electoral methods. In drawing up our Neo-Fabian Scheme we kept in mind the Labourer, and it will serve my purpose to give the qualifications for voters proposed by us:—

(1) All those who pay the income-tax, or the professional tax.

(2) Graduates of all Indian and foreign Universities recognised by their respective Governments.

(3) Any person paying land revenue directly.

(4) Occupants of houses and premises of the annual rental value of Rs.48 in municipal areas and Rs.24 in non-municipal areas.

(5) Tenants of Zamindari and Raiyatwari holdings paying Rs. 10 rental.

As will be seen from pp. 40-41, the people thus enfranchised will be about four millions in the Madras Presidency. This may sound appalling, in view of the Franchise Committee's 542,000 total electors; but, with due deference to that body, I may point out that it tried to please a few somewhat obstinate and retrogressive Madras officials, and did not view the problem from a really broad point of view in the light of the actual experience of other countries of the world in this respect. Also, I think, the difficulties of election arrangements are overrated.

However, observing the way in which the reforms are shaping themselves, I regretfully abandon the four million voters for Madras; and in advocating enfranchisement for Indian Factory Labour I beg leave to put before this Joint Committee two suggestions. My aim is to gain for the factory labourer direct influence in the Legislature. My first suggestion gives him power and a really suitable environment for political education: the second suggestion does this in a less effective manner. Both these suggestions are very bare outlines, and details will have to be filled in after further consideration.

I have appended to this statement a table showing the number of labourers employed in large industrial establishments, both governmental and private. From this it will be seen that some 950,000 Indians work in such factories. The total number of workers in all industrial establishments is about 17,515,250. Both my suggestions endeavour to bring on the electoral roll some at least of the employees in large industrial establishments.

I prorose

Chairman—continued.

I.

I propose that all labourers working in factories and earning a particular wage should be given the vote. The wage may differ in different provinces. For Madras I should suggest that every labourer earning Rs.15 per month in any large factory should be given the vote. In Bombay and Calcutta the figure will have to be higher. To members of this Committee who may not be fully conversant with Indian labour conditions, this figure of Rs.15 per month may appear very low. May I draw their attention to the following figures, taken from the Indian Industrial Commission Report:—

Specimen wages of Calcutta jute mill operatives in June, 1918, in rupees per mensam:

Carders, 9.
Spinners, 15¾.
Shifters, 11.
Winders, 18.
Beamers, 22.
Weavers, 27.
Mistries, 30.
Coolies, 13.

Specimen wages of Bombay cotton mill operatives in 1918, including a war bonus, in rupees per mensam:

Drawer (card room), 23.6.
Reeler, 17.4.
Warper, 40.8.
Rover, 24.1.
Doffer, 12.10.
Weaver, 46.15.

In Madras the wages are much lower than in Bombay, and I have, if the Committee wants it, a complete schedule of wages paid in the well-managed Buckingham and Carnatic Mills.

The wages clearly show how necessary it is to give the factory labourer the power of the vote, so that his battles may be fought in the Legislative Chambers by his elected representative. It is difficult to say how many factory labourers could thus be enfranchised, but the authorities can produce statements of how many earn Rs.10, Rs. 15, Rs.20, and so on, in different provinces, and that would be a guide to the Committee in considering the suggestion that I am making.

II.

My alternative suggestion brings into play both election and nomination methods. Every factory employing more than 50 but less than 1,000 labourers should be the unit; all adult workers in such factories should be given the vote to elect one representatives. All labourers working in factories employing more than 1,000 persons should have the right to elect one more representative for every thousand. Thus a panel will be obtained of several elected representatives; and one or two for each province can be nominated to the Provincial Councils from this panel.

Instead of making every factory employing 50 persons the unit, the unit may be every Trade Union with a membership of at least half the number of the total employed in the factories in that city. Let me illustrate: There are some 175 textile mills in Bombay, employing about 190,000 men. A Trade Union of Textile Workers with a membership of 95,000 should be given the right to elect a representative. Once again a Panel is obtained and nominations may be made from the Panel. The recognition of Trade Unions in this way will accelerate the formation and progress of Trade Unionism, and will greatly assist India's political growth.

Trade Unions and Caste System.

Working in Madras among the so-called lower castes of Hindus and the poor people generally, I have had special opportunities of gathering their views on the non-Brahamana question. As far as the Labour Unions are concerned, I may safely assert that Hindus of all castes and members of other communities, Muslims, Indian Christians, etc., can and do work harmoniously together for their common welfare without the least difficulty. There are many members of the various unions who are Brahamanas, and I have not heard any complaints against them. In fact, the Brahamana—non-Brahamana question has never arisen. A few months ago I invited some 200 members of the Textile Union to a dinner at Adyar, where I live. I invited Brahamanas and non-Brahamanas of all castes, Muslims, Indian Christians and Panchamas. At the dinner next to me set a Panchama, and by his side was a Brahamana; on the other side of me sat a Brahamana, and next to him was an Indian Christian. All were served the same vegetarian food, they all were treated alike, and the function was a great success. On numerous occasions all castes and communities have joined hands in an active manner. Further, I know for a fact that non-Brahamana labourers regard as ridiculous the movement started by some interested people, and they will not allow caste questions to affect their labour work; and that is also true of politics. I am a member of the Madras Presidency Association, which is an organisation of non-Brahamanas. I feel that these non-Brahamana communities must be organised for national work, and by means of this Association we want to help the non-Brahamanas, who include rich landlords and merchants and artisans, as also the bulk of the population, to take their part in the political and general advancement of India. Unlike the movement inaugurated by Dr. Nair, this Association is not anti-Brahamana, but wants to co-operate with Brahamanas to bring about the desired result. Anyway, among the 20,000 poor people of Madras City with whom I come in contact through one or other of the Labour Unions, the anti-Brahamana movement finds no favour, and most of them are non-Brahamanas.

Conclusion.

In conclusion, I earnestly appeal to the Joint Committee to enable the Indian labourer to obtain some political power, to set his feet on the road of political advancement, and thereby of his own uplift. The ghastly conditions under which he exists are not easily describable; he has suffered in the past, and his welfare should not in the future be made to depend on those who are not responsible to him. The success of these reforms to a great extent depends on the atmosphere in which they will be worked in India. On account of various reasons, I anticipate trouble in the labour camp. If something is done now which will satisfy the labourer and convince him that his representatives are looking after his interests and fighting his battles, he will allow his energy and impatience to flow into good constructive work; if nothing is done, then despair will seize him and impatience will lead him to ugly expressions which one wants to avoid in India.

3521. Would you like to add anything to it before the members of the Committee ask you questions upon it?—Well, my Lord, first one word, namely, of thanks on behalf of the labourers for calling me here, which will give them a great hope and confidence in the deliberations of your Lordships' Committee. I do not think I need read the Memorandum, because it has been put in, but with your permission I will make a very short statement, which will take me a few minutes only. There are in India some 17,515,000 workmen employed in industries of whom some 950,000 are in large establishments. There is an Indian Factories Act, which was originally passed in 1881, and was last amended in 1911. The law permits a twelve hours day; women are worked for eleven hours; children between the ages of 9 and 14 are worked for six hours. In the matter of wages the law is dumb; in the matter of sanitation it speaks in halting terms, and the inspection is superficial. Thus, the record of the Administration in the past is not a satisfactory one from the viewpoint of the labourer. Therefore, I respectfully suggest that in the list of Provincial subjects both Nos. 24 and 25 and not only No. 24 should be transferred. I wish to draw the attention of the members of your Committee to page 26 of the Functions Committee's Report. There we find No. 24 Development of Industries, including Industrial Research and Technical Education is a transferred subject, but industrial matters included under the following heads: Factories. Settlement of Labour Disputes,

Chairman—continued.

Electricity, Boilers, Gas, Smoke Nuisances, and Welfare of Labour are all kept reserved in all the Provinces.

If both these items, 24 and 25, are transferred, then the Committee must contrive to get Indian labour to influence Provincial Legislatures in the future. As the Bill is framed at present and as the Southborough Report on Franchise stands, the Indian labourer is not at all enabled to better his lot through proper representatives; he will have to rely, as in the past, on the good will of others, be they foreigners or be they his own countrymen. I submit that the labourer's interests must be safeguarded, and that the process of safeguarding them must be put into his own hands and into no one else's.

This raises the question of the fitness of the Indian labourer. I beg to submit that the masses in India—and among them are the factory labourers—have a culture of their own. Their power of understanding political and economical issues and suggesting proper remedies in a practical manner is well known to those who have worked for and with them. Their political instincts are clear and strong. The factor to be borne in mind is that the Indian labourers loathe the idea of slavery in any form or shape, and they want to have schools for their children, houses for themselves, better wages and shorter hours—all as a matter of right and justice. The efforts on the part of the employer or the Government to patronise them are disliked and resented. The Indian labourer feels that he is not only a "hand," but also that he has a head and a heart, and he aspires to come into his own.

Now under the proposed scheme a factory manager, a shop-owner, a planter can not only vote but get elected to the Council Chamber from his Chamber of Commerce, his trades' association, or his planters' association. In Madras thirteen seats are unalloyed capitalistic seats. Take Bombay: The Millowners' Association returns a member, but their employees have no representation. Under the system of Franchise recommended by the Southborough Committee the labourers will not be able to influence the election.

The Joint Committee should enable the Indian labourer to send his own representatives to the Provincial Legislatures. To include him and his brother on the land or in the mine in a general electorate would be the best plan. A suggestion was made by a society in Madras on this basis, and the number worked out at something like 4,000,000 to be enfranchised in the one Presidency alone. Observing the way in which the reforms are shaping themselves and advocating the enfranchisement of the factory labourers especially, I make two suggestions which I have given in my Memorandum. I do not think I could put them more shortly than I have put them in my Memorandum.

There is only one more point I would like to put before the Committee, and that is on the question of the much discussed non-Brahmana problem. Having worked among those 20,000 labourers in Madras, who are mostly non-Brahmana, I beg to bring to the notice of the Committee that there is no feeling against the Brahmanas amongst the poor people in Madras. I do not think, my Lord, I have anything more to say.

Mr. Spoor.

3522. You are over here, I believe, as delegate to the Labour Party and the Trades Union Congress?—I am.

3524. In the first part of the Memorandum, the statement rather, you have submitted to-day you refer to the union you have formed in Madras. How many members have you got in that union?—Altogether in those five unions about 20,000 people.

3525. Twenty thousand people confined to Madras; how long is it since you began to form that union?—About sixteen or seventeen months now.

3526. Have you reason to believe that in the days that lie ahead you will be able to build up a trade union movement amongst factory workers in India?—I think so. I can speak there with a certain amount of confidence, because, as I say in my Memorandum,

I have had invitations from various centres like Calcutta, Bombay, Cawnpore, Lucknow, and so on where factories in good shape and on a large scale exist and where the labourers are anxious to be organised. Work even now is going ahead.

3527. Of course, we understand that about 90 per cent. of the workers in India are agricultural workers; do you think it will ever be possible to associate them together in any kind of trade union?—I think so, and I think at a very early date—in fact I had, just before I started, a few requests, one especially from the district of Cuddalore, in the Madras Presidency, where agricultural labourers are anxious to unite themselves into a trade union.

3528. Will this movement go pretty much along Western lines?—I should think so.

3529. I ask that question because we are constantly reminded that any comparison between industrial conditions in India and industrial conditions, say, in this country or in other parts of Europe is quite impossible. I know it has been suggested now more than once that really improvidence is responsible for the evil conditions which exist in certain parts of India, rather than any individual or collection of individuals?—I do not think so; I think the masses in India have of late taken very great interest in their own welfare and also in the big general problems that concern the Indian people, and one of the signs of the times is the desire on their part to unite themselves; and I think the movement will, on the whole, go along the lines of trade unions here.

3530. You state that the law in India does nothing at all with regard to the regulation of wages?—That is so.

3531. You have, however, factory inspection?—Yes; but as I say, it is more or less superficial.

3532. You give in your first Memorandum that was issued some time ago a comparison here between the wages?—That is not the Memorandum I have given to this Committee, but to the Trade Union Congress.

3533. That is so—I beg your pardon. In that Memorandum you give a comparison between the wages paid, which run down to 12s. a month in jute mills and the dividend paid to the shareholders in various companies, with, I imagine, Indian as well as European shareholders?—Yes.

3534. Does that rather striking contrast (because I see some of the dividends run up to 120 per cent.) influence feeling to any great extent amongst the workers themselves?—It does; more and more through the help of the vernacular newspapers these things come to be known among the labourers and the workmen in factories and in mines, causing discontent that while they are labouring the profits go to the employers of labour, and the labourers do not get their adequate share.

3535. We have heard about the change in India during recent years, I mean the awakening of a political consciousness in India. Do you think those economic conditions have had anything to do with that?—I think the economic conditions have mostly to do with that. I believe that the patience of the Indian masses, both agricultural and factory-going people, has practically come to a saturation point, and they cannot go on any more without some fundamental change in their conditions.

3536. The point is, assuming that that is correct, do you believe that the giving of a vote to an increasing number of industrial workers, increasing as time goes on, will enable the worker to improve his own condition?—Certainly; because he will be able to send his own representative into the Provincial Councils, and will practically compel his representatives to bring in measures which will better his condition. If I may illustrate it, take this Factory Act which is in existence, and was last amended in 1911, as I have pointed out during the 40 years this Act has been in existence since it was first passed in 1881 it has only been amended twice, once in 1890 or thereabouts, and in 1908, after the Commission went its round, which came into force in 1911. Now, if the labourer going into factories had the vote, and if he had his representatives in the Provincial Legislatures, that thing would not have happened. The Act would have been amended much more quickly, and certainly in the year year 1918-19 we would not have had the spectacle of a 12-hour day in big Indian factories.

3537. You believe that as a matter of common justice the Indian worker really requires the vote in order to protect himself?—I think so, yes.

3538. You offer two or three alternative suggestions here as to how the electorate might be increased, and I would like to ask you which of the alternatives you think yourself would be the most suitable?—Of course, I myself would prefer that the franchise should be widened altogether for all the poor people and the most unfortunate agricultural labourer and the mine worker; but as I pointed out, and it has been very carefully worked out by the Neo-Fabian Society of Madras, in the Madras Presidency alone, on that supposition of a wide franchise, the figure would come to 4,000,000. That compares, from the point of view of the Southborough Report, very unfavourably, because they give only a few thousands there. So that having to keep that in mind, and the Bill as it is framed and as it stands at present, I myself, as I say in my Memorandum, reluctantly abandoned the four millions. Then I give from the point of view of the factory labourer two schemes, one which enables him to elect a representative of his own on a wage-earning qualification, and I suggest a certain figure, of 15 rupees, for the Madras Presidency. That figure I have given tentatively, because on account of various reasons I think it will presently be raised, but at any rate it is my opinion that we must fix a particular wage-earning capacity, different, perhaps, in different cities, because the wages are higher in Calcutta and Bombay.

3540. What you are really seeking is not so much the addition of these people to the electorate as a class, you are not asking for class representation so much as you are wishful to extend the franchise generally?—Yes; but, as I say, if that is not possible, and I can quite see that at this stage it may not be possible, then on behalf of my factory-going labourer I claim that his case ought to be specially considered, and for this reason; that in the general franchise which has been framed by Lord Southborough's Committee, the whole basis has been naturally the present agricultural labourer, because 90 per cent. of our population is agricultural. Every time you consider the proposition of the franchise you will have to take that into consideration, so that while their case has been considered I submit that the case of the labourer working in the big factories in big towns has not been considered. There is one thing to be said for the factory-going labourer in the towns——

Chairman.

3541. Did you give evidence before the Franchise Committee?—No; I was not called.

3542. Did you ask to be called?—No; I did not.

3543. Was not that rather a mistake?—It did not occur to me to speak specially on behalf of the Indian labourer as a separate class.

Mr. Spoor.

3544. I just want to ask one more question: Assuming that the Committee cannot see its way to grant an extension of the franchise at once, as you suggest, do you think that the promise of an extension of the franchise, say, when the second election came along—if it was incorporated in the Act when the next election came it would be on a proper Franchise? Do you think that would in any way meet the desires of the organisations you represent and of the public opinion you have been voicing here?—If it is definitely promised and incorporated in the Statute, so that we are sure that at the next election we—that is, the labourers working in factories—would have their representatives on the Provincial Councils, I think to a certain extent, not altogether, it would meet the desires and wishes of the labourers I have the honour to represent.

3545. But what you really want is to have the franchise widened immediately, if at all possible?—That is, of course, what would be the first and best thing I would ask for. But when you are speaking of promises I would not be satisfied with a promise which is not actually incorporated in the Statute, as it comes to be framed, so that at the next step we are sure of getting in as a matter of course.

Mr. Spoor—continued.

Sir J. D. Rees.

3546. May I ask you one or two questions? But not to approach you like a wolf in sheep's clothing, I must say that I am a director of railways, mines, and tea and coffee estates in India. You have only 20,000 in your unions in Madras?—In the city of Madras, yes.

3547. It is the day of small things in that respect—Yes.

3548. You had what you have yourself described as the well-managed strike at the Buckingham and Carnatic Mills?—No, there was no strike; but there were two lock-outs in the Buckingham and Carnatic Mills. The strikes I referred to were of the tramway men.

3549. You referred to various causes which are likely to give trouble in labour—forces let loose by the war and the Russian Revolution—which have widened and coloured the political outlook. So far as your association is concerned, did you point out the appalling results of the Russian Revolution?—Yes. All the vernacular newspapers and the English newspapers naturally give the reports of whatever is appearing in your English papers, and all the ghastly reports which have appeared about the Russian Revolution have been copied in the Indian papers.

3550. You yourself would not conceal those results from your people?—No, certainly not.

3551. You speak of the excessive hours and the premature exhaustion and so forth. Does that come to you really as the result of complaints or from the observation of yourself and your friends?—As complaints reached me from labourers working in a few of the mills, I made investigations and researches at first hand, and then as the result of them we decided to form a labour union, and we have been working at it for the last sixteen months.

3552. Have you in mind always the danger that too much or too sudden action of the character you indicate might check the influx of British capital, which I think you will agree is very desirable in India?—I do not know that I would fully agree with that statement; it would take us altogether into a new line of thought.

3553. I do not wish to raise any economic question at all; if you do not think the influx of British capital into India beneficial, I have no more to ask you about that. I think your attitude is that it is not beneficial, is it not?

Chairman.

3554. Mr. Wadia did not say that; he said that it was a large question, that he could not answer in one sentence?—I would have to cover a fair plot of ground.

Sir J. D. Rees.

3555. Could you not say whether you thought it was beneficial or not? His Lordship does not mean to check you?—From one point of view it is beneficial, but from various other points of view, also, it is not beneficial.

3556. On the whole, which weighs most?—Unless a certain amount of reform is introduced in the method of the bringing in of British capital I would rather not have British capital as matters stand at present.

3557. You demur to the reservation of the settlement of labour disputes, do you not?—Yes.

3558. I am not quite clear about that. Do you feel that if different Local Governments can deal with a question like that, it would be possible so far as Government intervention occurred, if it must occur, to establish anything like uniformity of treatment?—The questio nfirst to settle is this: Do you want, and that is what I am really driving at in my question, do you desire that the Government in future should be made responsible for the settlement of disputes between private capitalists and private labour? You have to recognise the new power that is now springing up of the united action of trade unions; for instance, during the two strikes we have had with the tramway men in Madras, and the two locks-out that we have had in the the Buckingham and Carnatic Mills in Madras, the Government did not think fit to interfere; it left the conditions as they stood, and all the interference that we got—and I think very wisely got—was from the Police Commissioner, who saw that things did not go into excess; but they do not ever settle disputes.

3559. But you think they did well?—I think they did well.

3560. So do I.—Now as to the future, if the settlement of labour disputes is a reserved subject in all the Provinces, and if the trade unions should claim the right to speak, as I believe they will, then I do not see how we can reconcile those two points. I think the trade unions will claim a certain right and privilege to speak on behalf of their labourers in the settlement of any disputes that arise.

3561. Do you contemplate the development in India, whether for good or bad, which has been so marked in Europe, of the general interference of the Government in the settlement of labour disputes?—I hope that we may not come to such a point, and to safeguard that, as I pointed out in my Memorandum, we are already at this very early stage building up what in Madras we have called a Labour Board, where we try to get the representatives of the employers and the representatives of the trades unions to come together and work independently of the Government. As I suggest the Government might limit their action to the creation of such Labour Boards.

3562. You say that in the Bill before us you find no attempt to introduce any measure of reform which will give the labourer any voice in safeguarding his own interests. You mean by that that the Franchise proposals are not such as to give him a representation?—Yes.

3563. You know that special representation is given to Indian commerce through the agency of the Indian Chamber of Commerce?—Yes; but I may point out that I am not here putting forward a claim on behalf of the Indian merchant. The Indian landlord is a capitalist, and the Indian merchant is a capitalist also.

3564. You say is there any way to bring the Indian labourer into power; you mean power to deal with his own interests?—Yes.

3565. You say that their political instincts are clear and strong. You really feel that?—Yes; from my personal experience at these various Labour Unions, I think I can safely say that their political instincts are strong, and their judgment sound and full of common sense.

3566. You did not make this recommendation as to the occupants of houses and premises (this is the one you chiefly rely upon) of the annual rental value of 48 rupees in towns and 24 rupees outside, and so on anywhere?—Yes; it was published in a little transaction of the Neo-Fabian Society of Madras, which I hold in my hand. Those are my data.

3567. And you think that the Madras Government adopted a very obstinate and retrogressive attitude towards you? That is my opinion.

3568. What is the authority for the figure—it may be perfectly right, but it astonishes me—that the total number of workers in large industrial establishments is 17½ millions?—It is in the Statistical Abstract of British India, which the India Office publishes.

3569. I can look that up for myself. You propose that all labourers working in factories and earning a particular wage should be given the vote, and then you make certain proposals: Again, were they laid before the Madras Government when they were making their recommendations?—No.

3570. Then you finish your very interesting Memorandum, if I may venture to so describe it, by saying that in Madras, Muslims, Indian Christians, and Panchamas work harmoniously together for their own welfare, and no Brahmin or non-Brahmin question has ever arisen, which is a ridiculous movement started by some interested people, but that workers will not allow caste questions to affect their labour work, which is also true of politics. You think that to be correct, and adhere to it?—Yes, and I have given as an instance one of the best cases of the inter-dining, about which so much has been talked. You will see that at a dinner of 200 people, including Brahmanas and Panchamas, the left and right extremes, they come together, and as far as our labour unions works are concerned, they have found absolutely no difficulty.

3571. I thank you very much, and I want to say how deeply I agree with you in what you have just said.

Lord Sinha.

3572. Mr. Wadia, are your present proposals directed to enfranchise labour, as such?—Factory going labour as such.

3573. That is in towns, I suppose?—In towns mostly.

3574. Practically, the biggest towns, like Calcutta, Bombay, Madras and Cawnpore?—Yes; and also there may be a certain number of smaller towns in Madras and the Bombay Presidency where there are factories and mills.

3575. Would not they come in under the Franchise laid down for big municipalities and towns by payment of municipal taxes?—I do not think under the Franchise scheme of Lord Southborough's Committee, for instance, the labourers of Madras would come in.

3576. The payment is something very small, is it not?—Yes; but when you come to think of it, when a weaver in Madras earns between 15 and 20 rupees a month it is not likely that you will get people—as there are others earning still less in the carding and spinning departments—to be able to pay municipal taxes to that extent. I speak there tentatively, because I have not made inquiries into it.

3577. You have not considered as to whether the Franchise recommended by the Southborough Report would enfranchise the labour population in those big industrial centres, or to what extent?—No, I have not gone in a direct fashion into the matter. Under the recommendations that have been made certain municipal taxes and rates have to be paid. Now, I do not think that the ordinary labourer in Madras would be in a position from the earning capacity that he possesses to pay those taxes.

3578. Would they come in under the Rural Franchise, because I understand most of these people labour only in the factories for a portion of the year and go back to the land during the rest of the year?—Well, that is so to a very limited extent, and the Indian factory labour is getting less than less in that direction. It is not that for a few months they work in the factories and they go away, but rather for a few years they work in the factories and then go away.

3579. At any rate, your position is that the Franchise proposals of the Southborough Committee do not enfranchise the factory labourers in those industries?—That is so.

3580. You would not put it higher than that?—I would not put it more emphatically than that, because I have no first hand information on the subject.

Chairman.

3581. You would not say that you had sufficiently examined the facts and figures with regard to Madras to see how far they would have affected your view of the Franchise proposals?—No; I read the Franchise Report after leaving India, and I have written to Madras, and in the course of a few weeks we may get some information, and if it comes I presume I may send it in to your Lordship?

Chairman.] Certainly.

Lord Islington.

3582. Have you arrived at any idea of the number of agricultural labourers who will get the vote under the Southborough proposals?—I should think that the whole number that is given in the Southborough Committee's Report, would bring a portion of the agriculturists, whether they be landlords or peasant proprietors.

3583. I am asking about labourers. Out of the 500,000 odd electors to be established in Madras under the Southborough proposals, how many of those should you say would be agricultural labourers?—The actual figures of the electors is 542,000.

3584. How many of those would be agricultural labourers?—I cannot say. I am not prepared to give the figure.

3585. Have you any idea whether it would be an appreciable number at all?—Of those 542,000?

3586. Yes, of the 542,000 proposed to have votes, would you say that the agricultural labourer as such would have any appreciable representation?—He would have some representation, but I would not say appreciable representation. There, however, I speak very tentatively, because I have not looked into the figures carefully as I just said.

3587. You have looked into the question of the factories?—Yes.

3588. And as far as you can see, under those proposals there would be no representation?—As I say, when you take into consideration that fifteen rupees is the wage-earning capacity of the weaver in textile factories, which is higher in Bombay and Calcutta, then you will see, as I have just said in reply to Lord Sinha's question, he is not in a position to pay that municipal rate or tax, and thus he will not be able to come into the number.

3589. How many do you say that you estimate would get votes if the basis were fifteen rupees a month? Have you worked it out? You say that 4,000,000 would be too many in proportion to the number proposed?—Yes.

3590. Then you proceed on the other suggestions?—Yes.

3591. One of those suggestions, as I understand it, is alternative to the original proposal, but for Madras would you suggest that every labourer earning fifteen rupees a month in a factory should get the vote?—In the City of Madras.

3592. How many do you think would get the vote on that qualification?—Between 20,000 and 25,000 people in the City of Madras would get extra votes who are labourers.

3593. You are anxious to see the Services which deal with these factory and mine administrations transferred subjects?—Yes.

3594. Would you like to see them transferred subjects if the present electorate was established without any representation?—Yes, certainly; because, as I put forward the plea in my Memorandum, the Indian Ministers would be in a better position to understand, and therefore to deal with the troubles which are existing now, than the official Executive. Already in the past the administration has had the chance of improving the factory legislation and of dealing with this problem, and my contention is that they have not done sufficient for the factory labourer.

3596. So that you would admit that these subjects, becoming transferred subjects, would be incomplete in what you would like to see them realise, unless coupled with them was a workers' electorate?—That would be the first factor I would put forward. But, even supposing that nothing is done to enfranchise the factory labourer, if Number 25 of the subjects is transferred instead of being kept reserved, the Indian Minister will have to deal with the subject, and he will be able to deal with it better than the official Executive. That is my view, especially as Number 24, which is the development of industries, including industrial research and technical education, is to be transferred. That is going to be a transferred subject, and the legislation regarding the welfare of labour and regarding other things connected with the factory is kept a reserved subject, and my contention is that both should be transferred.

Mr. Acland.

3597. I forget for the moment the numbers that you told us belonged to your Union?—Roughly, 20,000—of the five Unions.

3598. Can you tell us what proportion of those are literate?—Literate in the sense of reading and writing?

3599. Yes?—I think, on the whole, perhaps you will find a few hundreds who can read or write.

3600. Is that proportion increasing, or tending to increase?—It would be, to give my own personal experience, too short a time to judge; but I think, from the general movement that is taking place in India, it is on the increase. I have come into contact with them for the last sixteen or eighteen months, and it is too soon for me to say whether it is appreciably increasing.

3601. Do you know of any movement that is taking place in Madras to found schools, or anything of that kind, where they would learn to read and write?—Since the establishment of the Labour Unions we have done certain constructive work, like opening dispensaries, selling rice and other stores, and a night school for the labourers, and there are other night schools in the vicinity of the mills now.

3602. There is just one thing I would like to understand about the ordinary life of men of this class. You said that generally they spent some years of their lives in working in a factory in the town, and other years in the agricultural districts. I am very much impressed with the low rate of wages you quote to us. Is the general system that they come in and do the work in the factories for a certain number of years until they have earned and accumulated a certain amount of money, which they carried back to their country districts, or is it, as one would perhaps be more led to think from your evidence, the fact that they appreciate life in the town so much that they come in from the country with the money they have made in the country until they have spent it all in supplementing their wages in the town?—I think I can explain that in this way: Generally the factory labourer is some kind of an agriculturist in a village. He is there living under very bad conditions, with an increasing debt and so forth, and then, out of sheer impatience, he makes the change in the hope of making some money, and goes to a factory. He works there for a few years under the conditions, and then I believe—and I think it can be proven from records—on account of the severe conditions under which he has to work he retires after a few years broken down in health.

3603. Without being able to save much money?—Yes, and that produces the very curious phenomenon which was observed by two Commissions appointed by the Government, that they did not find labourers in the factories above the age of forty as a rule. That is due to the premature exhaustion which steps in on account of the factory conditions.

Mr. Bennett.

3604. Mr. Wadia, do you know the industrial conditions of Bombay as well as those of Madras?—Not so well of Bombay as of Madras.

3605. You are a member of a well-known Bombay family, are you not?—Yes.

3606. I thought so. Will you give me your view of the manner in which the mill owners in Bombay as a class—they own something like eighty mills, do they not?—have performed their duties towards those whom they employ?—Some of them have done very well by their labourers. It is a very interesting question, because it relates to the new conditions which are arising in India. The labourer now is not satisfied to take better conditions as a matter of favour which the Indian capitalist in Bombay is willing to provide for him. I know of instances of mills owned by Indian capitalists who make admirable arrangements for their labourers in several mills. I cannot speak the same of all mills, but when you take into consideration the wages which are actually earned by the Bombay labourer and the dividends which are declared by some mills you will see where the grievance of the labourer lies. He wants something as a matter of right, and not as a matter of patronage.

3608. You speak in rather an ungracious way of services of that kind rendered by employers. However, I do not think it is very relevant to the question. You represent, I think, five establishments in Madras. Have the people employed there shown any capacity for organising for what we call nowadays self-government?—Yes. In those unions we have various organising committees for various kinds of work and managing committees to carry on the work of the unions, which are entirely composed of the labourers themselves

They

They elect their own representatives, they plan out their own work, and they carry through the work, and really what I do for them there is to plead their cause and their grievances in public, and generally to keep the movement going from outside, but the entire work of organisation of those unions is carried out by the men themselves, and visitors have been surprised at the intelligence and capacity which those labourers have displayed.

3609. I do not want to put it in a invidious way, as you will understand, but could they possibly have done without you? Could they have organised themselves, and placed themselves before the public without you?—I doubt it.

3610. In your Memorandum you say that you have had invitations from Calcutta, Bombay and various other places to organise their unions. Does not that seem to suggest that there is at all events an imperfect capacity for organisation among the labourers themselves?—The labourers themselves, yes; but at the same time you must bear in mind this, that any particular set of labourers who come forward to organise trade unions at the present moment in India would be marked men, and would naturally suffer in their factories and in all organisations to which they belonged.

3611. You think there is organising capacity amongst the people?—I am sure of it.

3612. Do you infer from that that they would be capable of organising themselves for political purposes?—I should think so, yes.

3613. We were asked the other day why it was that there was no representation of labour. I think it was Bombay factory labour, but labour, at all events, upon Lord Southborough's Committee. Would it have been possible to have found a single man in one of the Bombay mills who, if he had been selected for that Committee, could have spoken English or any language which was common to the whole of his colleagues?—If the language bar could be removed I am sure that you could find men in Bombay. I have now in mind a man in Madras who could very well advise such a Committee as the Southborough Committee if his own language, Tamil, or Hindustani was spoken. He would not be able, perhaps, to talk of subjects which were outside his province, and would not be able to advise, say, on agriculture or other matters.

3614. Let us carry that to the Legislative Council. You speak of the language bar; do you think you could have found a mill hand in Bombay who could have taken his place in the Legislative Council, where, of course, English is the official language? Do you think you could have found a man?—No.

3615. You would have had to go outside the mills to get a labourers' representative?—Yes, at the present moment that would happen. Supposing you give the vote to the factory labourers in Bombay. Calcutta or Madras at the present moment, I think an outsider would have to represent them.

Mr. Bennett—continued.

3616. As to their power to form opinions and to guide the representative, is it not the case that the factory hands in India are in a peculiar sense a gregarious people, and follow their leaders, very often, not knowing what they are doing, and what they are following?—I should not think so. From my own experience, and I have had to deal, as I have said, with two lock-outs and two strikes in a short period of 16 months, I can tell you that it took us many hours of discussion and debate to come to a settlement. They are not in a position to follow very meekly, and to say yea to everything their leaders say. They are rather given to a thorough discussion and debate of the points which are raised, and to come to an agreement after certain discussion.

Major Ormsby-Gore.

3617. I take it you suggest that if this Committee cannot see its way to widen the Franchise so as to include factory hands, we should try to make one or two special constituencies in the towns where there are mills, and to give a special Franchise to the factory worker. That is your alternative. Would you suggest that that Franchise should form, as it were, another communal electorate, or do you wish them thrown in with the rest of the voters to vote as part of the general constituency?—I would not mind at all their being thrown in to the general electorate, provided that they had the vote, because they would be able to influence the election.

3618. Do you think it would be just as valuable to them to have votes for one of the ordinary politicians as it would be to have a definite representative of their own?—Yes, because I am sure that the labourers will extract good terms from the ordinary politician before they send him into the Provincial Councils.

3619. Now for this experiment you suggest—that it should be applied in about five great towns?—Well, I have suggested a wage-earning capacity for large industrial establishments, and I think it would be more than five towns.

3620. About how many people would be enfranchised, do you think, in Calcutta?—As I said, I have no data for that yet.

Chairman.

3621. If you get the further information you have referred to later, you will kindly send it in?—I will do so, my Lord.

Sir HENRY CRAIK.
Mr. MONTAGU.
Major ORMSBY-GORE.
Sir J. D. REES.

The RIGHT HONOURABLE THE EARL OF SELBORNE IN THE CHAIR.

MR. M. A. JINNAH and MR. YAKUB HASAN are called in; and Examined as follows:—

Chairman.

3622. I think you represent the Moslem League?—(Mr. Jinnah.) Yes.

3623. You have been good enough to send in answers to the list of questions?—Yes, we have.

Chairman—continued.

1. Do you accept the proposition that it is desirable to bring about the progressive realisation of responsible government in India, and, if so, how do do you define the expression "responsible government"? And do you generally accept the proposition contained in the preamble?—The proposition that it is desirable to bring about progressive realisation of responsible government in India is sound, but a substantial step must be taken at once. We would define the expression "responsible government" as far as we can to mean that the will of the Legislature which is responsible to the electorates must prevail over the Executive, subject to veto. We accept generally the proposition contained in the preamble so far as it applies to the Provinces, but it does not contemplate to include the Central Government. In our opinion it is far more essential to introduce an element of responsibility in the Central Government. With these observations we accept the proposition contained in the preamble.

2. Do you think that the realisation of responsible government in the Provinces involves the establishment in Provincial Legislatures of a substantial elected majority (Clause 5)?—Yes; one of the principle things.

3. Do you think that the non-official members of the Provincial Legislatures should possess power to control the actions and policy of the Executive? Do you think they possess such power at present?—Yes; we think that non-official members of the Provincial Legislature should possess power to control the actions and policy of the Executive. At present they do not possess any such power.

4. Do you think that there are certain matters or functions of government in the Provinces in which at present the Provincial Executive must remain responsible to the Secretary of State and Parliament, and must therefore be in a position to enforce its wishes?—The All-India Muslim League passed the following resolution at its sessions on September 1st, 1918, in Bombay:—"That the following modifications and changes in the proposals contained in the Montagu-Chelmsford Report are necessary to render the scheme of reforms a substantial step towards responsible government. Reserved subjects in the Provinces to include only Law, Justice, and Police (except prisons), and there should be complete separation of judicial and executive functions at once." Since then the Government of India and some Local Governments adopted reactionary and oppressive policy after the Armistice was signed, which alarmed the people and the Anglo-Indian Press, the European community in India and the Indo-British Association in England in their campaign caused grave apprehensions in the minds of the people; so at the Delhi Sessions the All-India Muslim League, in December, 1918, passed the following resolution: "The All-India Muslim League, while affirming the principles underlying the resolutions passed at Lucknow 1916, Calcutta 1917, and Bombay 1918, demands that complete responsible government be granted to the Provinces." The deputation of the All-India Muslim League, however, has discretion in the matter of representing the Muslim views to the British Parliament and His Majesty's Government. We submit that in our opinion the Provinces are ripe for complete responsible government, and a sufficient number of Indians are available to be entrusted with all the portfolios of Provincial administration, and that under the guidance of a Governor selected from amongst men of public life in England they will be able to carry on the administration efficiently and successfully; but we also realise that the terms of the famous Parliamentary announcement made by His Majesty's Government on August 20th, 1917, and which was welcomed in good faith by India, provide for a progressive realisation of responsible government; hence we are prepared to accept the system of diarchy in the Provinces provided it is simultaneously introduced in the Central Government. We think that in the Provinces the transferred subjects should be at least those mentioned in our answer to question No. 19.

5. If you accept the propositions stated under questions 1 to 4, do you think that the dual form of government embodied in the Bill is the best means of securing them? If not, what are your objections to that feature of the Bill, and by what other means would you attempt to secure the objects in view?—We think the dual form of government embodied in the Bill is the best means of securing the objects in view.

6. If you have any other method to suggest, does it (i) provide possibilities of advance by stages and facilitate the "progressive realisation of responsible government," and, if it does, in what way (Clause 2, 3, etc.)? And (ii) does it afford means of judgment (a) to the electors and (b) to the Statutory Commission which is to examine and report on progress of the success or failure in results of the control exercised by the Legislature and those who represent it in the Executive?—We have no other method to suggest. Diarchy fits in more with the order of things as they exist at present in India, and it can be justified on the ground that it is for a transitional period.

7. If you consider a dual form of government acceptable in principle, are there any points of detail the modification of which you regard as necessary? If so, what are those points, and what modifications would you suggest?—Appointment of Governors.—Clause 2.—We submit that the same method of appointing Presidency Governors should be applied to all Provinces, namely, that every Governor should be selected and appointed from men of public life in England. Clause 3.—The salary of the Minister should be the same as that of the members of the Executive Council of the Provinces, not such salary as the Governor may determine. Clause 4 (1).—The provision in Section 47 of the Principal Act, that two of the members of the Executive Council of the Governor of a Province must have been for at least twelve years in the service of the Crown in India, should be deleted. We do not approve of "one" being substituted for "two." It will be open to the Secretary of State for India to select and appoint any person from amongst the members of the Civil Service. We think that it is highly objectionable to make statutory provisions of this character. One of the objects of the reforms is to take away in course of time the direction of policy from the members of the Indian Civil Service and place it in the hands of the representatives of the people. Therefore, there should be nothing in the statute that may establish the claim of the Service to these posts in future, though some of them may continue to be appointed to the Executive Councils in the transitory period by the exercise of the free choice of the Crown and not by statutory rights. Clause 4 (2).—We think it is unnecessary that any provision should be made by rules under the principal Act as to the qualifications to be required in respect of members of the Executive Council of the Governor of a Province. It should be left to the free choice of the Crown. In the appointing of members of an Executive Council the hands of the Governor in recommending, and the Secretary of State in appointing him, should not be tied down by rules as to qualifications. With reference to Clause 1 (1) (d), the Memorandum of the Secretary of State, paragraph 13, says:—"The terms in which the power of making rules as to allocation of Provincial funds is to be conferred, left open the question as to whether Provincial finance is to be on the basis of one joint purse or by two separate purses." We strongly oppose the recommendation of the Government of India for a separate purse. In our opinion it would be subversive of the fundamental principles and policy adumbrated in the Montagu-Chelmsford Report and further amplified by the Southborough Functions Committee. We, therefore, urge that it should be clearly laid down in the Bill, or at any rate we press that the rules to be framed should be strictly in accordance with the principles and policy laid down in these two Reports. The same observations apply to the business of the Governor with his Ministers, and his relation thereto contained in Clause 5, sub-Clause (2). We think the contemplated Deputy Governor unnecessary for the transitional period (Clause 12). The question of sub-dividing Provinces dealt with in paragraphs 245 and 246 of the Joint Report may be considered when the periodical enquiry is made by the Commission. We consider

Clause

Clause 12, sub-Clause (2) too wide. We think "backward tracts" should be clearly defined, and should in no case go beyond what is stated in paragraph 199 of the Joint Report.

8. In particular, do you think (i) that Ministers should hold office "during pleasure"—i.e., should be liable to removal if they are unable to support the action decided upon in their Department by the Governor or if they fail to retain the confidence of the Legislature (Clause 3 (1))? That the Governor should have power to disregard the opinion of his Ministers if he considers that action in accordance with that opinion is inconsistent with the due discharge of his responsibilities (Clause 3 (3))? (iii) That the Executive Council should in all Provinces normally consist of one official European and one non-official Indian (Clause 4)? (iv) That the Governor should have power to dissolve his Legislative Council (Clause 7 (4))?—(i) In our opinion the Minister should hold office during pleasure—i.e., should be liable to removal if they fail to retain the confidence of the Legislature only. It is highly objectionable that he should also be liable to removal if he is unable to support the action decided upon in his department by the Governor. The Minister's position should not be that of a person liable to fall between two stools. (ii.) Yes, the Governor should have power to disregard the opinion and advice of his Minister, but only in cases in which he considers that if he follows the advice of his Minister it will endanger the safety or tranquillity of the province or any part thereof, not on the ground that, if he considers that action in accordance with that opinion or advise is inconsistent with a due discharge of his responsibilities. The expression used in the Bill is too general, and would not prevent undue interference. (iii.) We accept that the Executive Council should in all provinces normally consist of one official European and one non-official Indian, and we have no objection, as stated in the Memorandum of the Secretary of State for India regarding the Bill, that if a second European member is added there will also be a second non-official Indian member, although we think no occasion is likely to arise for four members. (iv.) Yes; the Governor should have power to dissolve his Legislative Council; but here we may add that a provision should be made that the Governor should call a special meeting of his Council if a requisition is sent to him to that effect signed by at least 30 per cent. of the members for any emergency business.

9. Referring back to Questions 2, 3 and 4, if your answers to the first and third of these are in the affirmative, and if you think that the legislatures should be given greater powers of control and influence than they possess at present, do you regard the limitations imposed generally by Clause 9 of the Bill upon their financial and legislative powers as (i.) suitable, or as (ii.) unnecessarily severe, or as (iii.) inadequate to safeguard the responsibilities which the Government owes in the last resort to Parliament? Clause 9)?—The limitations imposed generally by Clause 9 of the Bill upon the financial and legislative powers are unnecessarily severe. We think the Legislature ought to be given greater power. In the formation of the Grand Committee the majority of the members to be nominated by the Governor is not defined. This will give power to the Governor to reduce the number to be elected by the legislative council. The Montagu-Chelmsford Report lays down that there should be a bare majority to be nominated. We, therefore, suggest that in this clause the majority should not be left vague and undefined as it is. Further, we find that no provision is made in the Bill as was promised by the Joint Report, that when the Bill is passed by the Grand Committee it should be reported to the whole Council, and that the Council should have the right to pass a resolution recording any objection to the principle, or details of the measure, and such resolution was to be submitted to the Governor-General and the Secretary of State, accompanied by the Act. Clause 9, Sub-Clause 2 (B).—The words "necessary for the carrying on of any department" are far too wide. The intention is to prevent closing down of a department during a crisis, and it should be so limited. (C).—Salaries of public services should not be excluded from the rôle of Legislature except those certain high offices. (D).—Proposal for increase under one head should be allowed, provided it is balanced by decrease under another irrespective of the question of transferred or reserved subject so long as the total expenditure budgeted for the year remains unaltered, subject, of course, to the Governor's power to restore the budget as originally proposed so far as the reserved subjects are concerned. Clause 9 (5).—We would suggest in line 10 the words "if he thinks fit and" should be omitted. If those words remain the Governor will not only have the power to certify the Bill or any clause of it, or the amendment which he thinks affects the safety or tranquillity of his province or any part of it or any other province, or the interests of a specified reserved subject, and thus may direct either that no proceedings, or no further proceedings, shall be taken by the Council in relation to the Bill, clause or amendment, or if he thinks fit, and if the Council so desire, the Bill, clause or amendment shall be referred to the Grand Committee, but if he does not think fit and the Council may desire that the Bill shall be referred to the Grand Committee, we take it that it cannot go to the Grand Committee. Therefore, we submit that the words "if he thinks fit and" should be deleted, from which it will follow that if the Council so desire the Bill, clause or amendment shall be referred to the Grand Committee. In our opinion, the Council should elect its own President and Vice-President, and no question should be disallowed by the Governor, but it may be left open to the member or Minister in charge to decline to answer the question on the ground of public interest.

10. In particular—(i.) Do you think that the legislature should have power with whatever limitations to vote supplies? (Clause 9 (2).) (ii.) Do you accept the plan of Grand Committees as the means of giving to the Government the power to secure essential legislation in the event of their failure to carry their propositions in the Council? If so, have you any modifications of detail to suggest? If not, what other method would you suggest to secure the object in view?—(i.) Yes; Legislature should have power to vote supplies. (ii.) We accept the Grand Committee subject to the observations made above.

11. Do you accept the position adopted in the Bill (Part II.) that the time has not yet come to give the Legislative Assembly a similar measure of control over the Central Government as that given to provincial legislative councils over provincial governments?—We do not accept the position, adopted in the Bill (Part II.) that the time has not yet come to give the Legislative Assembly a similar measure of control over the Central Government as that given to Provincial Legislative Councils over Provincial Governments. We think this decision is not warranted by the terms of the announcement of 20th August. The present condition and fitness of the people entitle them to have an element of responsibility introduced in the Central Government simultaneously with provinces. No case is made out why the Central Government should wait for more than a decade before any measure of control over the Central Government is given to the Legislature. We think there should be a division of functions in the Central Government as is proposed in the Provincial Government. In this connection we may draw your attention that the All-India Muslim League, at its special Sessions at Bombay, passed the following resolution:—"The Council of State may be retained provided that a system of reserved and transferred subjects, similar to that proposed for the provinces, is adopted for the Central Government, and that in the Legislature of India the certificate of the Governor-General in Council should not apply except to certain reserved subjects hereinafter mentioned. The reserved subjects shall be the Army, the Navy, Foreign and Political relations between the Government of India and other Powers (excepting relations with the Colonies and the Dominions), including the declaration of war and entering into treaties, and matters directly affecting the peace, tranquillity and safety of the country, and all other subjects shall be transferred."

12. Do you agree that it is advisable none the less to provide for a substantial elective majority in the Indian Legislature (Clause 16)?—Yes; but we submit that there should be a schedule of the composition of the Legislative Assembly similar to the schedule annexed to the Bill giving the constitution of the Legislative Councils in the Provinces.

13. Do you accept the plan of a bicameral legislature as arising out of this, as constituting both a satisfactory machine for the ordinary purposes of legislation and as affording the means to the Governor-General in Council to secure legislation which he regards as essential? (Clauses 14, 15 and 16.)?—No; the proposed bicameral legislation does not constitute a satisfactory machine for the ordinary purposes of legislation as it affords the means to the Governor-General in Council to secure any legislation by means of a certificate. Therefore, we suggest that the power of the Governor-General in Council to certify should be limited to certain specified subjects upon which depend the peace and tranquilliity of the country. We also submit that there should be a schedule of the composition of the Council of State similar to the schedule annexed to the Bill and giving constitution of Legislative Councils. We submit that the Governor-General should summon the Assembly if a requisition is sent to him signed by at least 30 per cent. of the elected members. No ruler or subject of any State of India should be nominated a member of the Council of State or the Legislative Assembly or any Provincial Council.

14. Do you accept the provisions of the Bill as to the course of legislation in the Indian Legislature? (Clause 20 (3) and (4).) Or do you regard them as unnecessarily restrictive on the popular will, or as an inadequate means of ensuring to the Governor-General in Council the discharge of his responsibilities?—We do not accept the provisions of the Bill as to the course of legislation in the Indian Legislature, Clause 20 (3 and 4).—We regard them as unnecessarily restrictive on the popular will. The certificate of the Governor-General should be limited to the specified subjects, and the words "interests of British India or any part thereof," are far too wide in Sub-Clause 4, and should be deleted. Clause 20 (2.)—Provision as to the persons to preside at the meetings of the Legislative Assembly should be made in the statute, and should not be left to the rules. In our opinion, the Legislative Assembly should elect its own President and Vice-President. In the rules it should be provided that no question should be disallowed by the Governor-General, but it may be left open to the member in charge to decline to answer the question on the ground of public interest.

15. Do you accept the changes made by the Bill (Clause 21) in the constitution of the Governor-General's Executive Council? If not, what are your reasons and what modifications would you suggest?—We do not accept the changes made by the Bill (Clause 21) in the constitution of the Governor-General's Executive Council. Clause 21 (1).—We are opposed to any statutory qualfication for the members of the Executive Council of the Governor-General. Section 36 of the Principal Act should be repealed, and the selection and nomination of the members of the Executive Council should be left to the free choice of the Crown. There should be a convention that half the number should be non-official Indians. Clause 21 (2).—We think it undesirable and unnecessary in view of what we have said with regard to Sub-Clause (1) above, and should be deleted.

16. Do you think that the development of provincial autonomy on the one hand, and of self-government in the provinces on the other, involves any modification of the provisions of Sections 2, 33 and 45 of the Government of India Act (Clause 23)?—Yes; with regard to Section 2 of the Principal Act, the powers of Parliament exercised through the Secretary of State for India with regard to transferred subjects require modification. With regard to Section 33, the Secretary of State for India will not interfere where there is unanimity between the Assembly and the Government of India, nor would he interfere with regard to transferred subjects in the provinces or Central Government. Section 45 will require modifications substantially in terms recommended by the Southborough Committee Report.

17. Do you agree that the gradual realisation of responsible government involves periodical examination of progress, by independent authority, and that the provisions of Clause 28 of the Bill are well designed to afford such examination?—The answer to the first part of the question—yes; but we think, with regard to the second part, that Clause 28 of the Bill should include Central Government for the purpose of periodical enquiry. (Clause 28 (2)

18. Are there any matters which it is proposed in the Bill to deal with by rule which you would suggest should be provided for in the Bill?—In the absence of the rules it is very difficult for us to say what matters should be dealt with in the Bill, and what matters should be left to the Rules. We have pointed out various modifications, and it is more for an expert draftsman to decide what should be incorporated in the Bill and what should be relegated to the Rules to be made.

19. Have you any observations to offer on the Reports of Lord Southborough's Committees and of the Committee on the Home Administration of Indian Affairs?—With regard to the Southborough Committee Report:—Franchise Committee's Recomdations: We generally agree with it except with the following matters. We think that it is advisable to remove the sex disqualification at the very outset. We hold a very strong opinion that the residential qualification for candidates, as laid down in the report in the case of Bombay, Punjab, and Central Provinces, has no justification. We will abolish the residential qualification throughout India. The qualifications laid down in the Southborough Report for electors in the Punjab are much higher than those in the other seven provinces, the Committee in this case deferring to the views of the local government. The result is that only 1.21 per cent. of the population are voters in the Punjab against 1.30 per cent. in the Central Provinces. We do not see any reason why the percentage of voters in this province should not be brought up to, say, 3.14 of the United Provinces or 3.33 of Bombay, or at least to 2.72 of Bengal by lowering the qualifications. Functions Committee Report.—With regard to the Functions Committee Report we urge that the following subjects should in any case be transferred, in addition to those on the transferred list of the Southborough Committee:—Item 6.—Irrigation and canals, drainage, and embankments and water storage. This item belongs to Public Works, and must go with that department—Item 5 in the provincial list. Item 7.—Land revenue administration. Item 13.—Forests, including preservation of game therein. It is proposed to transfer this subject only in Bombay. We suggest its transfer in all provinces except that of Assam. Item 14—Land acquisition. Item 23.—Development of mineral resources which are Government property. Item 25.—Industrial matters included under the following heads:—(a) Factories. (b) Settlement of labour disputes. (c) Electricity. (d) Boilers. (e) Gas. (f) Smoke nuisances; and (g) Welfare of labour, including provident funds, industrial insurance (general, health, and accident), and housing. This item has affinity to Item 24, Development of Industries, and both should form one undivided portfolio. Item 29.—Inland waterways, including shipping and navigation thereon, so far as not declared under control of Government of India, but subject as regards inland steam vessels to Indian legislation. Item 32.—Control of newspapers and printing presses subject to Indian legislation. Item 36.—Prisons and reformatories, subject to Indian legislation. Item 41.—Franchise and election for Indian and provincial legislatures, subject to Indian legislation. The following three subjects, so far as concern the administration of transferred subjects, should not be regarded as reserved subjects. Item 43.—Control, subject to Indian legislation, of members of all India services serving within the province and of other public services within the provinces.

Chairman—continued.

Item 44.—New provincial taxes—that is to say, taxes included in the schedule of additional provincial taxes, so far as not included under previous heads. Item 45.—Borrowing of money on the sole credit of the province, subject to Indian legislation. Committee on the Home Administration of Indian Affairs.—We are of the opinion that the Council of the Secretary of State for India should be abolished. We attach the greatest possible value to the recommendation "that where the Government of India are in agreement with the majority of the non-official members of the Legislative Assembly, either in regard to legislation or in regard to resolutions on the Budget, or on any matters of general administration, assent to their joint decision should only be withheld in cases in which the Secretary of State feels that his responsibility to Parliament for the peace, order, and good government of India, or paramount considerations of Imperial policy, requre him to secure reconsideration of the matter at issue by the Legislative Assembly." We look upon this as laying the foundation for India's independence, similar to that of the Dominions, in her domestic and fiscal matters, consistently with her Imperial obligations. We are otherwise in general agreement with the majority of the report. We urge that there should always be an additional Indian Permament Under Secretary of State for India. Public Services. —With regard to Public Services, we are not satisfied with the provisions of the Bill, Clause 24 and the following clauses. We strongly draw the attention of the Committee to—if we may say so—the very able Minute of Professor Keith, paragraphs 27, 28, and 29, in his minority report, and beg that effect should be given to them. We think that the control and supervision of Parliament should be relaxed on Indian affairs only in so far and to that extent—namely, those that are left to the popular control and responsibility of the legislature.

3624. Perhaps you will wish to supplement those answers by a statement?—Yes. I want to give the Committee a short history of the position of India with regard to this Reform Bill which is now before you, the Government of India Bill.

3625. That is rather a tall order?—If your Lordship will allow me, what I want to say is this: The first proposition that we contest very strongly is with regard to the Central Government, namely, that according to us no element of responsibility is introduced in the Central Government. We contest that.

3626. It is quite in order that you should make that point fully; but I do not want you to give a history of the whole of this question?—No; it would take me months to write down.

3627. I think it would?—I never intended that. I wanted to give you a short sketch and not a history in the sense that I am going to write down a history, but in the sense of what is the exact attitude of the people of India with regard to this particular question.

3628. If you are straying beyond the legitimate bounds of a statement you must forgive me for interrupting you?—But your Lordship is not going to prejudge that now. The position is this: Four formulas have been laid down in the Joint Report, and formula 3 is this: "The Government of India must remain wholly responsible to Parliament, and, saving such responsibility, its authority in essential matters must remain indisputable, pending experience of the effect of the changes now to be introduced in the Provinces. In the meantime, the Indian Legislative Council should be enlarged and made more representative, and its opportunities of influencing Government increased." That is in paragraph 190 of the Joint Report on page 157. What I want to put before you is this very shortly and very concisely. The All-India Moslem League, whose representative I am here to-day, in 1913, about the end of 1912 and also in 1913, March Sessions, adopted a programme, namely, the attainment of self-government under the ægis of the British Crown for India, and thereby came into line with the Indian National Congress. After that programme was adopted by the All-India Moslem League, the All-India Moslem League and the Indian National Congress, for the first time in the history of the Indian people, met together in Bombay in 1915. In 1915 both the Indian National Congress and the All-India Moslem League adopted certain resolutions. Lord Sinha was presiding over the Indian National Congress at that time, and we emphasised this that we wanted a declaration of policy from His Majesty's Government with regard to India. Both these bodies appointed Committees of representative men to formulate a scheme of reforms which should be introduced after the war. Now I will not go beyond that or what happened before that except this, that up to 1915, to put it very shortly, the Indian National Congress and all the political bodies in India advocated the transfer of power from the Executive or the bureaucratic Government to the Popular Government, that is to say, a voice in the direction and control of the Executive and in the direction of the policy of the Government. That demand was formulated in 1915 again. Those two committees formed to formulate the Reform Scheme met on various occasions. In 1916 —I am speaking from memory, but I think it was about August, 1916—the Government of India were contemplating a despatch on the reforms. This came to be known, and at that time what is known as the Memorandum of the 19, that is the 19 elected members of the Imperial Council, was drafted. They thought that they should not lose any time, but should put forward the views of the people of India as their representatives. They, therefore, in Simla, in September, 1916, drafted a memorandum, which is a well-known document, called the Memorandum of the 19. There again the two points were emphasised: Transfer of power, as I mentioned before, and fiscal autonomy. After that, in 1916, at Lucknow, the Indian National Congress met and the All-India Home Rule League met and adopted a scheme of reform which is well-known to the Committee. There again they emphasised the point that we wanted a transfer of power from top to bottom, not in any particular portion of the Government. The Government of India is divided in this way: Local Self-Government is one rung of the ladder, Provincial Government is the second, Central Government is the third, the Secretary of State and his Council is the fourth, and Parliament on the top of the whole of this structure. That was in December, 1916. After that, what comes is the announcement of the 20th August, 1917, which is welcomed because it definitely laid down the goal for India and the policy of His Majesty's Government in India. After that announcement His Majesty's Secretary (Mr. Montagu) arrived in India, and when he arrived in India he wanted to ascertain the exact position with regard to the reforms in India. Up to this time nobody thought of any other form of government except the unitary system of government, Mr. Lionel Curtis, who was in India about this time in 1917, after he had had many interviews and discussions with leaders of Indian thought, was the first, I believe, who suggested the dual form of government—that is, a diarchy. In 1917 the Indian National Congress met at Calcutta, and it again reaffirmed those very principles which I have mentioned, and said that as a substantial step towards the realisation of the goal we want what is known as the Congress-League scheme. But we had no other scheme before us at that moment, except the Congree-League scheme or the unitary system of government. After that the Joint Report came.

My point is this, that we expected in this Joint Report not to be confined merely to the Provinces, as it says in formula 2. Formula 2 says, "The Provinces are the domain in which the earlier steps towards the progressive realisation of responsible government should be taken." After this Report I must say naturally there was a great deal of dissatisfaction and disappointment, for this reason, that we have been urging reforms from top to bottom in the matter of controlling the Executive, having a voice in the direction of the policy of the Government, and emphasising a fiscal autonomy for India. I do not understand why the authors of the Report say that their principles will not allow them to go further than the proposals there. I cannot see what principles they are which prevent them from going further, because I do not see how it is opposed to the announcement of the 20th August; but still they say that.

After that we thought that as the Joint Report itself was placed before the public of India and the public public of Great Britain for criticism and opinions, therefore it was open to us to improve it, because it was not the last word on the subject. After the Report was published I venture to say before this Committee that there is no section of public opinion of any importance in India that has not urged that a simultaneous advance should be made in the Government of India, and has not emphasised the point of fiscal autonomy. What do we find? Notwithstanding the very strong current of opinion from one end of India to the other we find the next stage is this Bill which is now before you, and we find that this Bill does not go one bit further than the Montagu-Chelmsford Report with regard to the Central Government and the fiscal autonomy.

Now, my Lord, what is the reason for not making an advance in the Central Government? The only ground that I have been able to gather is the general arguments which are laid down, if I may shortly place them before you, in this way. The first ground really comes to want of confidence in the capacity of the people to govern themselves. I am analysing it. The second ground is distrust of the representative character of the educated section. The third is that the elected representatives of the people will make the government impossible by creating deadlocks. You find it summed up in the Montagu-Chelmsford Report. I am giving you the exact words. I am really reading from the annotation to the Government of India Despatch of the 5th March, at page 103. It is from the Memorandum of the Home Rule League, Bombay branch. I am the President of the Home Rule League, of the Bombay branch. This Memorandum was submitted under my signature as the President of the Home Rule League, and I took a considerable part in the preparation of this Memorandum. On page 103 you will find the reasons summed up as "(1) Electorates of sufficient size and quality cannot be called into existence for a long time; (2) the politically minded classes cannot be entrusted with the government of the remaining portion of the people, which is indifferent to politics and unfit to have any voice in the government either by reason of ignorance, poverty, or religious and social differences." Then, on page 104, we say: "The position taken up by the authors of the Report is thus defined: 'In the first place we wish to insist on the importance of these factors in considering the time necessary for the complete attainment of responsible government in a country where, in spite of rapid processes of growth, so great a majority of the people do not ask for it and are not yet fitted for it.' And further: 'The prospects of advance very greatly depend upon how far the educated Indian is in sympathy with and capable of fairly representing the illiterate masses.'" This is a quotation from the Report. Therefore, as I said before, these are the only reasons that I can gather for not making any advance in the Central Government.

What we say is this: First of all this is a highly exaggerated and incorrect estimate of the situation in India. I will deal now, first of all, with the question of there being no efficient electorates. That, I believe, is the strongest point as far as I have been able to gather of the Secretary of State for India. Now what is the position in India? It is admitted that you will find that you can get at least 5 per cent. of the population in the electorates. It is also admitted in the Report that you have, even according to the last census in 1911, 8.6 per cent. educated people; I believe there is a large number now, in 1919. Therefore you have certainly more than, roughly speaking—I am only guessing now—8.6 per cent. literates, and I put it down at not less than 10 or 12 per cent.

Now what was the position of the United Kingdom when there was a complete responsible government run in this country? In England in 1835 you had 4.6 per cent.; in Ireland you had 1.2 per cent.; in Scotland, 3.2 per cent. In 1871, England, 9 per cent.; Ireland, 4.2 per cent.; Scotland, 7.6 per cent. In 1881, England, 9.7 per cent.; Ireland, 4.4 per cent.; and Scotland, 8.4 per cent. In 1889 you had 15.8 per cent. in England, 16.6 per cent. in Ireland, and 14.2 per cent. in Scotland. We do not stop at England, but we go further. What do you find in other countries in Europe? You find, first of all in Sweden, there was 1 per cent. of the population that got into the electorate; in France 26.6 per cent.; the Chamber of Deputies in Italy was elected by 2½ per cent. of the population till the franchise was broadened in 1832; and you find as late as 1888 only 17.6 per cent. of the population in the United States of America took part in electing the most complete responsible Government in the world. Therefore, my Lord, it is no argument that you will not be able to get more than 10 per cent.—if you wish to lower the franchise, if the Southborough Committee had not put such a high qualification, you certainly would get at least 10 per cent. of the population in the electorate. But are we asking for responsible government to-day, although we have 10 per cent. of the population that can get into the electorate? We are not. What do you find in Canada? In Canada people had no municipal franchise even, they had no municipal experience when complete responsible government was established in Canada (see Lord Durham's Report). Therefore, I say this argument that we have not got an electorate is without justification. There is no warrant for it.

Then the next argument is that the politically minded people cannot be trusted. On that point I do not wish to say anything more than this. You have only got to look at the past record of the Congress of the Moslem League and other political bodies. I do not want to go into the details of it, but we have urged in season and out of season upon the Government measures purely intended for the welfare of the people. I say it is really a libel on the educated people to say that they will form an oligarchy, and they will think of their own interests and neglect the interests of their own people. Apart from any other consideration, politically minded people in India know perfectly well that if they neglect the interests of the masses—we have got enough experience of the world before us to know perfectly well (we all learn by experience of other countries, and India has got that advantage, at any rate), that apart from any other considerations, if we neglect the interests of the masses we shall never make any real advance; the country will remain in a backward state, and we shall never make a real advance. Therefore, in our own interests we are convinced that apart from our strong feelings or strong sympathies of kinship and relationship, and that they are our countrymen, apart from all those considerations, even putting it on the bare ground of the interests of the nation, they will be impelled to raise the masses to a higher level.

Then the next argument was that the representatives of the people will create deadlocks and obstruction. I can tell you this that I have had the privilege of being in the Imperial Legislative Council for many years, from the very beginning of the Council when it came into existence after the Morley-Minto Reforms. The representatives, whenever they have been put to the test by the Government at a critical moment, sometimes even when they were unwilling, sometimes even when they did not see eye to eye with the Government, have accepted the position as put by the Government before them, and voted with the Government. I will give only one instance. There are many other instances, but I will only give one, and Lord Sinha was an eye-witness to that because then he happened to be a member of the Viceroy's Executive Council. Soon after the Morley-Minto Councils came into existence, the Government of India decided to introduce a measure which was most repugnant to any man who loves freedom and liberty, namely, the Press Act. What happened? Unwilling as we were, as I say, revolting as that measure seemed to us on first principles, the Government of India gave us certain information and pressed us. They said it was essential for the carrying on of the Government, and that we should vote for it. What happened? Every non-official member gave his assent to that Bill except two. I have regretted since then that I gave my assent, because it is not properly administered; but there it is, one very strong instance indeed. There are many other instances that I can give, if you want to go into detail, where the representatives have co-operated with the Government and done their level best to see that no difficulties are put if possible. There are many other minor points raised about religious differences and so on. I can only say that they are highly exaggerated. Therefore

Therefore I confess that I cannot see any reason whatsoever why a beginning should not be made in the Central Government.

Now what is the position of the Central Government as it is proposed in the Bill? The position of the Central Government is this. You are leaving the Central Government in practically the same position in which it is at present. You will find this in the Joint Report, paragraph 217, page 178. After discussing various matters, this is what it says: "If on the other hand we delayed this step until the training period was over, we should have encouraged elected members of Council in the habits of irresponsible criticism, which has been the bane of the Morley-Minto Councils, and from which it is our aim to escape." Those observations are with regard to the Provincial Government. There the authors of the Report say: We want to introduce responsible government in the Provinces. Why? Because we want to escape from what is considered the bane of the Morley-Minto Reforms. And what is that bane? Irresponsible criticism. Now what are you are doing in the Central Government? You are doing exactly what the Morley-Minto Reforms did, because you are leaving the Central Government in practically the same position. What will happen? In the Central Government the Executive can run through any measure they like. The representatives of the people will come from all parts of India, I take it, and I hope that they will be the best men that India can produce. You call them there to the Sessions of your Central Legislative Assembly. What will they do? They will be irresponsible critics. They will harden into a permanent opposition, and I know that in some cases at present some elected members take this view. They say, "Our vote does not count, and therefore whenever any resolution has to be supported we have no responsibility," and therefore in voting upon a resolution they naturally say, "Let us vote for it." Then, if this is going to be the state in the Central Government, which must necessarily be the power that will lay down all the master policies concerning India, which will control the best part of the finance of India, surely this is a position which the Committee ought to very carefully consider whether you are going to leave the Central Government in this position.

I am aware of the recommendation of the Crewe Committee. The Crewe Committee has made a recommendation which if embodied in the Bill will make some difference. As I understand the recommendation of the Crewe Committee, it comes to this: At present the Executive Government can do what they like by means of a certificate of the Governor-General.

3629. You mean in the Bill?—Yes; I am talking of legislation now. Not only can they do what they like with regard to the affirmative legislation, but even if a Bill is brought by a private member into the Legislative Assembly it can be taken to the Council of State on a certificate, modified, mutilated, ruined, and passed in the Council of State without its ever coming back to the Assembly. So not only can the Government pass through any measure they like, but even in the case of a measure brought up by a private member, which is subject to a veto. The Governor-General in Council may not like to exercise his veto in rejecting it, he can mutilate that Bill by a certificate and have it passed in the Council of State as he likes. That is the present position. But I say I am aware of the recommendation of the Crewe Committee. The Crewe Committee lay down this, that a certificate of the Governor-General can only be exercised by the previous sanction of the Secretary of State for India, and that the previous sanction of the Secretary of State for India should be given if he is satisfied that it is necessary in the interests of good government, peace, tranquillity, and safety and so on. The Bill itself says that the Governor-General can use his certificate in the interests of British India. I do not know what that means. "The interests of British India" is a very wide term; it might mean anything. But the Crewe Committee go a little further, and restrict that in different language. To that extent it does, no doubt, seem to put a check on the certificate of the Governor-General in Council. But what will the Secretary of State for India do? The Government of India, who are on the spot, will tell the Secretary of State for India that it is absolutely essential that this measure must be passed, and we want to certify it. What will the Secretary of State for India do sitting here in Whitehall? Is he going to overrule the Government of India in a matter of that kind? Well, it will be a very, very strong Secretary of State for India who will say "I will take the responsibility and overrule you." That is the proposal of the Crewe Committee.

Then I am also aware of the other recommendation, namely, that the Government of India and the Legislature, if they agree with regard to any matter, the Budget or othewise administrative, then the Secretary of State for India should not withhold his consent, unless again, on the same formula, that it is likely to endanger the peace, tranquillity, and good government and so on. It comes to this really, therefore, that if the Government of India and Legislature agree, then we may be able to get on with some measure; otherwise we cannot possibly get on with any measure. Therefore, to put it again in one sentence, the question is this: Is the will of the Executive to prevail in every single matter, or is there or is there not any single matter in the Central Government where the will of the representatives of the people should prevail? That is the question. We say, and we lay very great stress upon this, that if you want the Central Government not to consist of irresponsible critics, but men who come there with a constructive programme——

3630. You do not mean the Central Government; you mean the Legislative Assembly?—Yes, men who come there with constructive programmes, men who come there armed with responsibility, certain obligations placed upon them, who realise the value of their vote, that their vote means a very serious matter one way or the other, then I say, and this is our demand, you must have division of functions in the Central Government.

Let us test this. Supposing you have a division of functions in the Central Government. I do not want to repeat those subjects, but we have all along, in fairness to all the representative bodies, I say it, admitted that there are certain matters which are essential matters and with regard to which the will of the Government of India must prevail. Now what will happen? If you have a division of functions what is the position? The position is this: You have got the Legislative Assembly and you have the Council of State. In the first instance, every Bill must be placed before the Legislative Assembly. If the Government are not satisfied with the passage of that Bill or measure it can be taken to the Council of State. In the Council of State the Government have a majority, and therefore that Bill can be rejected by the Council of State. In case of difference between the two you propose Joint Sessions. I accept that. I am not opposed to that. In the Joint Sessions, what is the position? In the first instance, you are leaving to the Joint Sessions what I call non-reserved subjects. Reserved subjects are set apart. The Government of India are supreme. They can run through any Bill they like with regard to these matters. It is only with regard to transferred subjects that the Legislative Assembly and the Council of State will meet in Joint Session. Now in the Joint Sessions, what is the position? Is it so dangerous? Will it upset the Government altogether? If you just look at the figures, what do you find? You find the figures are these: You have 73 officials and nominated members. I am talking of the Joint Sessions now, when you get both bodies together. You have got against that 103 elected. Out of 103 elected, you find, in my opinion, without any disrespect to anybody, you have really 75 elected men at the most. The others represent special interests, like landholders, European communities, and commerce. So really, even taking them as elected members (though their interests are really very different) they will more or less be the balancing element between the two if there is any friction at all —I mean the landholders and special interests, the European community and commerce. But even taking them along with the elected members, and assuming that they are people who will create deadlocks, who will obstruct government, and go out of their way to do do it, even then you have 103 against 73. Now, the Government have only got to convince 30 men out of those 103 to defeat any measure which the representatives of the people want in the Joint Sessions. I put the Europeans and the land-holders and the whole lot together along with the elected members, which I call properly elected, but even then the Government only wants 30 to defeat any measure in the Joint Sessions. I ask this Committee is that such a dangerous introduction of the element of responsibility in the Central Government? I do not know exactly the sentence the Prime Minister used only the other day, but he said that "you are going to approach Indian questions not with timidity and prejudice." I, therefore, use those very words and ask this Committee not to deal with Indian questions with timidity and prejudice. I say there is absolutely no case made out, so far as I have been able to gather, why there should not be a division of functions. I want to put another alternative, and that is this: As we have said, in any case the certificate of the Governor-General must be limited to specified subjects. That is what I have to say with regard to the Central Government.

The next thing that I wish to draw your Lordship's attention to is with regard to the Provincial Governments.

3631. If I might interrupt here for a moment, you have made, if I may say so, a very interesting statement about the Central Government, and I think you may fairly claim not to have merely repeated what others have said before you; but in the evidence we have received, the case of the Provincial Governments has been extraordinarily closely thrashed out, and you will be helping us very much if you merely signify your assent to the propositions which have already been put forward, so far as you can, without repeating the argument?—I have been following the evidence before this Committee with very great attention, and I have no desire to repeat anything that has been said. I only want to place before you the point of view which I consider is the point of view of India. Whether I am right in interpreting that or not is another matter, but I feel this is the point of view of India. With regard to the Provinces, I am only going to say this. I cannot possibly go into everything and say I assent to this or dissent to this. My answers are there, and we have pointed out certain modifications which we want. But I want to put the general case with regard to the Provinces, and the general case with regard to the Provinces is this. The Joint Report, in the first instance, lays down a certain cardinal principle on transferred and reserved subjects. I attack that. I say that again is based, if I may say so, on that which the Prime Minister wants to avoid, on timidity and prejudice. Now why do I say that? What do you find? Will you turn to the Joint Report? All the same arguments are advanced with regard to the Provinces which I have already mentioned with regard to the Central Government, and it lays down this at paragraph 238, page 194. It contemplates the Southborough Committee, and this is what they say: "Their guiding principle should be to include in the transferred list those Departments which afford most opportunity for local knowledge and social service, those in which Indians have shown themselves to be keenly interested, those in which mistakes may occur, though serious, would not be irremediable, and those which stand most in need of development. In pursuance of this principle we should not expect to find that departments primarily concerned with the maintenance of law and order were transferred." Therefore the Report takes it for granted that law and order cannot be trusted to the representatives at all; they are not fit for it. "Nor should we expect the transfer of matters which vitally affect the well-being of the masses, who may not be adequately represented in the new Councils, such, for example, as questions of land revenue or tenant rights." There is the same current of thought running underneath this, that the people are really not fit, and that the masses will not be taken care of. But, as I said before, we are not setting up a Washington Constitution. We are leaving immense powers, and we are all willing that immense powers should be left in the hands of the Central Government. We are talking of Provinces, and, to begin with, you lay down—you take it for granted—first, that no Provinces is fit for managinb law and order; and the second principle is that the interests of the masses must be looked after. Who is looking after the interests of the masses now? I do not want to take up, unnecessarily, the time of the Committee, but you will find in the Home Rule League Memorandum to which I have referred that we have dealt with this question of revenue; and I submit there is no answer to it, so far as Bombay is concerned, at any rate. You find it on page 107 of the Government of India Despatch of the 5th March. I do not want to repeat that. It is before the Committee, and I say there is no answer, as far as Bombay is concerned. And, what is more, you find the Bombay Government, who ought to know something — men like Mr. Curtiss, who has been in the service for a quarter of a century, ought to know something about it — the Bombay Government only wanted to reserve peace, order, law and justice, political, major ports and Imperial Services, but the hands of the Feetham Committee were tied down because the Report lays down that we would not expect those to be transferred. Reading the evidence of Mr. Feetham, of course, he has tried to explain that; but I feel certain that they were embarrassed because the Report lays down this. But I say, never mind what Mr. Feetham says, or anybody else; let us take the question on its merits, as it stands. Is there any reason when we see the steps that have been taken in Bombay with regard to the Land Revenue administration and policy, and the part which non-official members, with the little power they possess, hardly any power, have played? When the Government wanted to pass a measure in Bombay with regard to land revenue administration other members opposed it, and they were so strongly opposed to it that, as a protest, they left the Council Chamber, and Sir Claud Hill admitted —I think I am speaking correctly—that he has since inquired into it, and it has been a failure, and that the non-official members were right. Therefore I say there is absolutely no reason why you should transfer, as the Southborough Committe has done, only certain subjects. The whole protest has been this: The Local Government says one thing, the witnesses say one thing, the political organisations say another, and so on, and the Feetham Committee says: "All right, we will transfer so much." Surely that is not a process which will commend itself to this Committee. You have room to consider this. Are you really going to take a substantial step, or are you not going to take a substantial step? I say that really in the Provinces it is not a substantial step. Although the views of the Moslem League are that all the subjects should be transferred, and I personally feel that some of the Provinces are quite competent to manage if all the subjects were transferred, yet, as we have said in our answer, we are also met with this argument, that you have the announcement of His Majesty's Government, which says: "progressive realisation of responsible government." If you have got to keep within the four corners of that announcement, I am prepared to say this: Reserve police and justice and order, and transfer all the subjects, at any rate in all the major Provinces. I strongly object to all the Provinces being treated alike. That seems to be wrong on the face of it. You have got Provinces which are admittedly backward. They have never had even a Governor in Council. With slight exceptions or variations, with which I am aware, generally or mainly, I understand that they stand in the same position with regard to the transferred and reserved subjects. That is all I have to say with regard to the reserved and transferred subjects.

There is one more point, and that I want to emphasise. It has been urged on behalf of the Government of India that there should be a separate purse. I think all the fears of the Government of India, which were portrayed so beautifully by Sir James Meston, with which I do not agree, will, at any rate, substantially, if not altogether, disappear if you transfer all the subjects except police, law and order. Then you have only one reserved subject, and there will be less trouble. Although I do not agree with Sir James Meston at all—I am entirely opposed to the separate purse purse proposal—I say you get rid of even that unfounded fear. That is all that I have to say with regard to the transferred subjects.

There is one thing that I want to bring to your notice, and that is this. In the Montagu-Chelmsford Report it is admitted that a great deal of delay has been caused in handling the Indian problem, and hence the difficulties are greater, because they say that if earlier steps had been taken the difficulties would not have been so great. Now, the same argument will apply with more force and with more emphasis, in regard to the Indian problems of reform, to the future than to the present, for this reason. We want these reforms to be a success. Whatever may be the differences of opinion at present between the Civil Service and the popular bodies—there is a great deal of contest, a great deal of opposition, and a great deal of difference of opinion between the two—but our earnest desire is to make these reforms a success, and you cannot make these reforms a success by getting half a dozen men, or even more, however able they may be, to agree with you. They may agree with you for some reason or the other, and I think there is this feeling, and I want to put it frankly before the Committee, that if we did not support Mr. Montagu in his proposals there is a chance of this Bill being shelved. No doubt some people are weighed down by that fear, and therefore they say: "Well, beggars cannot be chosers; let us, at any rate, get what Mr. Montagu is offering, otherwise we will lose it." Well, it is a very sensible policy—I do not say it is not—from one point of view; but these reforms have got to be worked, and we want to make these reforms a success. In order to make these reforms a success, your Lordships' Committee must think of this, that you have a large body of educated men outside who are not before you except in a way through their representatives. And what is the picture in India to-day? Everybody, of course, agrees that Mr. Montagu is proposing reforms which are very valuable. I do not think there is any school of men which does not appreciate that, but what we feel is this, that it is not enough. We want the reforms to yield the best results, and who is going to work these reforms? It is the young men who have to take the burden, and if you cannot satisfy them—and I say their demands are not exorbitant—you will leave that feeling of dissatisfaction and of discontent, and the result will be that within a few years we shall get into more arrears than we have already. If I may say so, in a way it might be something like the Irish problem: the more you delay the worse it gets.

That is the short statement which I wish to place before you, and if there are any questions that anybody wants to ask me I will answer them.

3632. Does Mr. Hasan wish to supplement that by any short statement?—(Mr. Hasan.) Yes, my Lord. I have signed the answers given by the All-India Moslem League Deputation to the questions put by the Joint Select Committee, and I am in general agreement with the evidence given by the spokesman of the deputation, Mr. M. A. Jinnah. I wish to make, with your Lordships' permission, a few observatitons on some important points raised in the Government of India Bill. This I would do from the point of view of an Indian merchant. I am a merchant in Madras handling one of the principal articles of industry in the southern Presidency—i.e., skins and hides. I am an executive member of the Southern India Chamber of Commerce, which has, by a resolution passed on the 7th May, 1919, appointed me its delegate. The resolution runs as follows:—"Resolved that the Honourable Mr. Yakub Hasan be requested to represent the Chamber during his stay in England before the British authorities and public and commercial bodies of Great Britain, and to support the views of this Chamber on all matters that may come up for consideration and discussion in that country in respect of Indian commercial and industrial interests in relation to Indian constitutional reforms."

The letter communicating to me this resolution is signed by Diwan Bahadur P. Theagaroya Chetti, President of the Chamber. He is the co-leader with the late Dr. Nair of the famous non-Brahmin movement of Madras. He is my colleague on the municipal corporation of Madras, which has recently elected him to the Madras Legislative Council to a seat vacated by a Brahmin. I mention this to show that the Southern India Chamber of Commerce is manned and officered by men of all shades of political opinion whose differences on other platforms have not stood in the way of their union and co-operation in the field of commerce and industry. Though I hold no office in the Chamber, I was appointed its spokeman to give evidence before the Southborough Committee.

I am also a member of the Madras Legislative Council elected by one of the two Moslem electorates of the Madras Presidency. Lord Pentland's Government, for reasons best known to themselves, refused to extend the term of the Council for one year, as has been done in other Provinces and for the Imperial Council. Fresh elections took place last month, and my constituency has returned me to the Council in my absence in the teeth of keen competition by a candidate who is the secretary of the rival association called Islamiah League, which came into existence at the time of the visit of the Secretary of State and the Viceroy in connection with the Reforms Scheme. Under bureaucratic influence division was created in Madras not only between non-Brahmins and Brahmins, but also among Musselmans and between Europeans and Indians. The Government of Madras, in the administration report for the year 1917-18, wrote exultantly that the Moslem League was breakng up fast, and a section of Moulvis and others have dissociated themselves from the political leaders of the community that were running the Moslem League, and so on. (I am only quoting from memory.) The re-election of myself is a proof, if proof was wanted, that the secretary of the Madras Presidency Moslem League, which is affiliated to the All-India Moslem League, has the confidence of the Musselmans of the City and the Presidency of Madras, and that the League continues to be the sole representative exponent of Moslem opinion, notwithstanding the representations of the bureaucracy to the contrary.

I may also mention that the other Moslem member of the Council is also a merchant. It is significant that, whereas mostly lawyers and journalists are returned by groups of municipalities that under the present system form the general electorates, merchants are returned in Madras by the Moslem electorates. This is due principally to the fact that payment of Income Tax being the principal qualification of the Moslem voters, merchants predominate in these electorates. I feel sure that when general electorates are constituted on the basis proposed by the Southborough Committee consisting of vast numbers of urban and rural population, all classes of people will have a fair chance of returning their own class-men to the Council. This chance would have become a certainty if my suggestion of plural constituencies and proportional representation system of voting was adopted by the Committee. In the Memorandum I submitted to the Franchise Committee on my own behalf, I said that there need be no class electorates even for merchants and landholders because plural general constituencies would allow the return of members representing all classes, and that popular representatives would look after class interests as well as the representatives of those classes themselves. But as separate and excessive representation of European merchants and planters on the Councils was being demanded, and was most likely to be granted, I urged that Indian Commerce should have adequate representation. The Franchise Committee has provided for the representation of Commerce, Trade and Industries in various Provinces as shown in the Table, which I hand in:—

Practically strong communal representation is secured for the European community in India by means of these and other European-elected and nominated seats. I do not grudge the Europeans these seats, in fact I advocated in my Memorandum that some representation should be given to the European community. There has been a good deal of racial controversy, which has created much bad blood among official and non-official Europeans on one side, and Indians on the other. Unfortunately it was Madras where the controversy began. The Anglo-Indian Press started it, and the editor of the "Madras Mail," who can be said to be the originator of the movement, has carried the poison to a wider circle by becoming the Secretary of the European Association. Indian and European merchants were till very recently on very good and friendly terms with one another. The control of skins and hides by the Government for war purposes produced, rightly or wrongly, the impression in the minds of the Indian merchants that officials were showing partiality to Europeans. When embargo was laid on the export of tanned skins and tanning of skins was prohibited, the Indian merchants who held large stocks of tanned skins moved the Government for permission to ship the goods. European merchants who had no stock petitioned Government to the contrary. A deputation of leather merchants, of which I was a member, waited upon the President of the Munitions Board at Delhi, and there was again a Conference held at Madras to consider the same subject. Europeans and Indians were divided into two hostile groups at this Conference. Europeans, however, soon realised that Indian merchants are no longer their dupes. They are wide awake now, and can organise themselves efficiently whenever occasion demanded it. I believe Indian merchants have risen in the estimation of the European merchants on account of the bold stand they made for their rights, and I am glad to say that cordial relations have again been restored between the two sections of the mercantile community. The European Chamber does not now ignore the Indian Chamber and the Skin and Hides Merchants' Association, but on the other hand these bodies are constantly meeting to confer on subjects in which both are equally interested. In the Legislative Council I have often joined my European commercial colleague, and he has often sided with me in resolutions of commercial interest. I have no misgivings therefore about the part the European community has to play in the reconstruction of Indian polity.

As long as Indian reforms were only problematical, and, according to Lord Pentland, far remote from practical politics, European merchants and European officials did their best to resist their introduction. But once the present bill is passed and full responsible government become the goal within measurable distance of realisation, European merchants and European officials will, I am sure, reconcile themselves to the inevitable, and would rather co-operate than obstruct in the working of the reforms.

European merchants have no reason to be afraid that their interests will in any way suffer by the transfer of government from bureaucracy to the popular ministers. Racial disabilities will never be imposed upon Europeans in India in the matter of trade and industry, as they are imposed in South Africa upon Indian Settlers. Europeans are enterprising, more capable and better organised than Indians, and they command more capital, banking facilities and trained services, which have placed them in a position of advantage as compared with Indians. Besides, they have had a long start, and Indians are only now seriously realising their own position. We do not want any restrictions to be placed in the way of European trade and commerce. All that we want is that the handicap that Indians are suffering under now be removed. Europeans surely have too much belief in their own capacity and shrewdness to be afraid of Indian competition on equal footing.

Before I leave the Franchise Committee, I wish to state that communities are formed in India or, for the matter of that, in any Asiatic country, on religious and not on racial basis. The Indian nation consists mainly of two peoples—the Hindoos and the Musselmans. I want each of these two component parts of the Indian nationhood to remain intact without being subdivided. The new constitution should help in demolishing the castes, and not making the demarcating lines permanently rigid. I therefore mentioned in my Memorandum that the only other community that can rightly claim separate representation on religious basis was Indian Christians, and I advocated that wherever they form a good proportion of the population they may be given separate electorates. I am therefore glad that three elective seats have been alloted to the Indian Christians in my Presidency of Madras, and that one Indian Christian will be nominated to a seat in other Provinces except the Central Provinces.

With regard to diarchy, I accept the principle of diarchy, but not for the reasons which underlie the Joint Report or the recommendations of the Government of India. I am fully convinced that Indians are quite fit to-day to have complete responsible government in the Provinces as well as in the Centre. I do not also recognise the need of prolonged training and tutelage. The Indian National Congress and the Moslem League asked for an authoritative declaration of policy in respect of India's future government, and the Cabinet was pleased to give a pledge in the form of a Parliamentary announcement that there shall be "gradual realization" of responsible government in India by "successive stages." Of all the schemes put forward to attain this object that of the Montagu-Chelmsford Report appeared to me to be the best, and I welcomed it at once. I have seen no reason since to change my opinion. I accept the principle of gradual transfer of responsibility simply because it gives the services in India an apportunity to readjust themselves gradually to the changing conditions and to the bureaucracy, gradually to relax its hold and retire with good grace and dignity.

As regards the division of functions in the Provinces, I would have a via media between the two extremes—the demand of the Congress League and the proposals of the Government of India. The former, according to the resolutions of their special Bombay sessions, would leave nothing to the Executive Government, beyond law, justice and police, while the latter would give as little to the Ministers as possible. I would have the Departments equally distributed amongst the two ministers and two members of the Executive Council. The list of transferred subjects in the Functions Committee's Report appears to be quite formidable on paper; but if the two sets are weighed in the balance in respect of revenue and expenditure, the division between the two halves of the Government assume a ratio, according to Sir James Meston, between one-fifth and one-third and four-fifths and two-thirds respectively. This division is very unfair.

There are some Departments that should be transferred from the very begining—for example, education and industry. Personally, I do not see why law, justice and police, of all Departments, should be reserved; but since much importance is attached to these in the Joint Report, and some Departments are to remain reserved in the literal fulfilment of the pledge of August 20th, these Departments may as well remain reserved.

I am glad that item 27 on the Provincial subject list, i.e., development of industries, including industrial research and technical education, is to be transferred. I urge that item 25, i.e, industrial matters included under the following heads :—(a) Factories, (b) Settlement of labour disputes, (c) Electricity, (d) Boilers, (e) Gas, (f) Smoke nuisances, and (g) Welfare of labour, including provident funds, industrial insurance (general, health and accident), and housing, should also be transferred. Both are kindred subjects, and form one portfolio, and should not be divided.

Item 5: Public works, including (b) roads, bridges and ferries, (c) tramways and (d) light and feeder railways is transferred, and I do not see why item 29—Inland waterways, including shipping and navigation—should not be transferred at the same time.

I urge that provision should be made in the Bill for the transfer of some more subjects at the end of the first five years, as laid down in the Joint Report. The transfer should not be of only one or two subjects by way of concession to the public demand, but half the reserved subjects in charge of one of the two members of the Executive Council should be transferred at the second step whenever that step is resolved upon to take in the different provinces. It will mean that the Indian member of the Executive Council will cease to exist, and one more minister will be created to take over the portfolios of the departing member.

With regard to Central Government, by merely transferring a few subjects in the Provinces to the control of a minister or ministers, it cannot be claimed that "substantial steps" in the direction of "the progressive realization of responsible government in India, as an integral part of the British Empire," have been taken. It is more important to have a measure of responsibility introduced in the Government of India than even having fully responsible governments in the provinces. It is the Central Government that would give the tone and character to the Provincial Governments. It is no use dislodging bureaucracy partially in the Provinces if it continues to hold its own in the Central Government. If beginning of responsibility is to be made only in one or the other, and not simultaneously in both, I would rather have the reform introduced in the Central than in the Provincial Governments. The status of India among the members of the British Empire, of which it remains an integral part, will not improve until India as a whole has at least a partially responsible government. It is essential to maintain the new status that she has attained in the eyes of the world by her war efforts. It will hurt her self-respect if no beginning is made in this direction. "Such hybrid arrangements for which precedents are wanting" are tolerated—nay, they are even welcomed in the Provinces—for they are designed to lead automatically to fully responsible governments. But if the experiment is not to be tried in the Central Government, what guarantee can there be that the Central Government will not remain unreformed for an indefinite period, and that even the Provincial Government may not, on some pretext or other (for instance, on account of violent agitation for the reform of the Central Government), go back to the old system. Those who welcomed the Joint Report did so in the hope that they would be able to make the British Parliament realise the illogicality and inconsistency of the step if what has been decided upon in the cases of the Provinces is not equally conceded in the centre in strict adherence to the principles laid down in the announcement of August 20th, 1917. It was a great disappointment to them that the united voice of India was not taken into account in this respect in drafting this Bill. If even the evidence given before this Committee by the various deputations, unanimous as it is on this point, fail to move the Committee to amend the Bill in the suggested direction, it will cause very great disappointment in India, and the leaders of the community whose acquiescence in the Montagu-Chelmsford proposals as regards Provinces have already cost them their position in the community will lose their influence altogether. A reaction is bound to be created in their feelings, and they are sure to be as emphatic in their agitation for further reforms as any member of the most extreme school.

The mercantile community particularly desire an element of responsibility to be introduced in the Central Government, for the following reasons:—(1) The Industrial Commission has recommended that the Government of India should in future pay more attention to the industrial development of the country, that there should be an Imperial Department of Industries in charge of a member of the Viceroy's Executive Council, who should be assisted by a board to be called the Indian Industries Board, consisting of three members with separate charges. (2) In the list of the All-India subjects are included (18) commerce, including banking and insurance; (19) trading companies and other associations. (3) The Government of India will have the power to supervise the administration of transferred subjects in the provinces, including the subject of industries. (4) The ruthless destruction that Indian industries have suffered at the hands of the East India Company and the British Parliament and their agents in India does not entitle the Parliament to control this subject any longer. As a transferred subject in the Provinces, the Minister in charge of it will be responsible to the electorate. It is not reasonable that the member of the Viceroy's Executive Council in charge of the same subject should be responsible to Parliament. (5) Fiscal matters, for autonomy in which there is persistent and unanimous demand, should also be in charge of a Minister responsible to the peoples of India. There can be no autonomy if he is responsible to the Parliament through the Secretary of State.

As in future the Legislative Councils will have more merchants, industrialists and agriculturists than lawyers and journalists, Ministers could be recruited from all classes of people, and we hope to see commercial and industrial portfolios in the hands of merchants. I may mention that the Honourable Sir Ibrahim Rahmetullah, member of the Bombay Executive Council, is a merchant, and I believe he has already in his short term of office given a good account of what a merchant is capable of.

As to fiscal autonomy, I lay special stress on the grant of fiscal independence to India. Without it the industrial development of India is altogether impossible. It is also necessary, in the combined interest of the British Empire, that each component part of it should have the power to develop its resources to the best advantage without outside interference. England cannot supply India certain manufactured goods at certain prices, and if German goods are shut out by artificial or accidental means—by war, for example—their place is taken, not by British goods, but by Japanese goods. Everything that Japan manufactures, mostly from the raw materials supplied by India, India can manufacture if the Government of India is not restrained from affording encouragement for fear of British voters. At present India is also placed at a great disadvantage in its commercial dealings with the British Dominions. For example, England buys tanned skins and hides from India, but Australia has shut them out by a tariff of 15 per cent. On the other hand, Australia imports raw skins freely from India, for her own product is not sufficient for her requirements.

I may also mention that in the agitation against the imposition and for the removal of excise duty on cotton as a protective measure for Lancashire industry, the most emphatic protest was from several Englishmen in India interested in the cotton industry of India.

With regard to the home administration of Indian affairs, we strongly urge the abolition of the India Council. We endorse the recommendation that there should be a High Commissioner in London, through whom the Government of India should arrange to purchase such stores as they think necessary to purchase in the United Kingdom.

In conclusion, I may be allowed to observe that the smooth working and success of the reforms will not be possible unless and until the confidence of the vast Musselman populations in British fairplay and justice is restored. This can only be done by carrying out in full the Prime Minister's pledge in respect of the integrity of Turkey, as given by him in January, 1918.

3635. Can

Mr. Montagu—continued.

3635. Can you mention it to me?—The other day I supported the Government's Taxation Bill about the income-tax under the Imperial Council.

3636. You must have felt very uncomfortable?—No; I have supported the Government on various occasions.

3637. This Bill which is now before us, you realise, purported to be nothing more—with very trifling amendments—than a Bill to carry out the parts of the Montagu-Chelmsford Report that had to be translated into a piece of legislation. You realise that?—I do—much to my regret.

3638. I am not asking your opinion. I mean you realise that that is so?—Yes.

3639. And you realise that the reason that that procedure was adopted was that this Committee should decide how much further to go, or how much less to do, after it had heard evidence that was put before it?—I do not agree with you there. I think it was the business His Majesty's Government——

3640. That is not the point, if you will forgive my saying so. You may feel an objection to the procedure of His Majesty's Government?—No, I do not; not to the procedure.

3641. I say you may?—I do not.

3642. If you will allow me to finish, I say that you may feel an objection. I am merely asking you whether you were aware of the policy which was adopted by His Majesty's Government?—I am quite aware of that.

3643. Now you base your description of this Bill as inspired by timidity and prejudice mainly on the powers given to the Government of India and the Provincial Governments?—Yes.

3644. Those two things?—Yes.

3645. First of all, we will begin with the Provincial Governments. Were the proposals of the Congress and the Moslem League inspired by timidity and prejudice?—No; they were inspired by the conditions that existed in India, with the best materials that were before us.

3646. They were bold, far-reaching, Statesmanlike proposals?—I do not know about "bold."

3647. Well, they were not timid?—That is what we thought was the right thing to do.

3648. Yes, but you would contrast them with these proposals, which are timid, would you not?—I do not follow. The Congress and the Moslem League produced the scheme after investigating the conditions in India.

3649. You describe this scheme, in so far as it relates to the Provinces, as being prejudiced and timid?—Yes, I do.

3650. And your opinion is very valuable for that reason. Now, I want to compare that with something else. Supposing I compare it with the Congress and the Moslem League scheme, am I taking a good criterion or would you say they were timid?—No; you are comparing chalk with cheese.

3651. When the Viceroy and I toured India, am I right in thinking that you appeared before us in a deputation advocating the Congress and the Moslem League proposals?—I did.

3652. That was your opinion at that time?—Yes, with certain qualifications.

3653. You had in mind certain qualifications of the Congress and the Moslem League scheme?—Yes.

3654. At that time you had qualifications?—Yes, at that time my opinion was this, that so far as we could we would devise a scheme—the scheme was put forward because we were told we never put forward any kind of scheme, we, the politicians in India. We therefore tried our best to produce a scheme, and we produced a scheme, but I have always accepted that scheme with this qualification, that if anything better is placed before me I am willing to accept it. In the Indian National Congress in 1917, when I seconded the resolution, I made it clear, and I said that we should then have a special session of the Congress and consider the Government proposals.

3656. It is worse in your opinion?—It is better in some things and worse in others. It is impossible to compare the two things.

Mr. Montagu—continued.

3657. But you have stigmatised this, and repeated your stigma, as timid and prejudiced?—Yes, because of your reasons.

3658. And therefore it must be worse?—No, because of your reasons. You know your reasons, why you want to go so far and no further.

3659. We will come to the reasons later on. Am I right in my recollection that the scheme that you advocated until you could get something better, the scheme of the Congress and the Moslem League, gave you an executive in the Province of Bombay of two officials and two non-officials?—Yes.

3660. And that this scheme as embodied in the Bill, will in all probability give you an executive consisting of three non-officials and one official?—Yes.

3661. Is not that so?—Yes.

3662. Would you describe that as timid or prejudiced?—I have answered your question. I say, in some respects, it is better, in some respects it is worse. If you take the whole, it is impossible to compare the Congress League scheme with your scheme—impossible. They are two different things. In some respects, if you ask me, it is better; in some respects it is worse.

3663. I will not delay on that. You will remember I am part author of this scheme?—Yes.

3664. And you will remember that it is not very pleasant to hear that one has been timid and prejudiced?—I am very sorry.

3665. I do not mind your saying it, in the least?—That is my view.

3666. What I should like to put to you is that it has been your role in politics always to accentuate and increase your demand, as what is given you is increased in itself?—Mr. Montagu, that is absolutely incorrect, because I told you that my position is this, that I have openly disagreed with the Congress, I have openly disagreed with the Moslem League, and there are some views which the Home Rule League holds with regard to these reforms which I do not. Therefore it is absolutely incorrect for you to say that, and you know it, or, at least, you ought to know it. In the Congress my attitude has been very different; in the Moslem League my attitude has been very different; therefore it is not correct to say that.

3667. I accept at once your disclaimer, of course. I put it as a question to you. I wanted to know—that was all. Now I come to the next point. You stated that the evidence of prejudice and distrust was to be found, so far as the Provinces were concerned, in the remarks about what should be transferred subjects. I want to ask you this: The land revenue is very difficult to separate—you know much more about this than I do—from irrigation. You would assume that if land revenue was transferred you would transfer with it irrigation, tenant rights, and most of the questions connected with land?—Probably, yes.

3668. Now, are you satisfied that the franchise designed by the Southborough Report is really representative of the rural population?—My answer to that is this, that I think the franchise designed by the Southborough Committee will bring in, at any rate, the best elements of every section. It will not reach everybody, but certainly, I think, it will bring in the best elements in every section.

3669. You agree, do you not, that the theory of representative government is that an effort should be made to insure that Ministers really represent the people?—Certainly.

3670. And it might well be that the suggestion that land revenue should be reserved emanates from a belief that at the present stage those interested in land revenue, irrigation, and tenant rights would not be properly represented?—I know it emanates from that, but I say there is no warrant for it.

3671. It might not emanate from a belief in the incompetence or distrust of those who would administer land revenue; it might emanate from a belief that the electorate did not exist?—I do not think you were here when I said that your strongest point is that you have not got an efficient electorate at present. That is one of the points.

3672. Would you mind now turning to the Government of India? You gave the Committee some figures as to the composition of a Joint Session?—Yes.

Mr. Montagu—continued.

3673. Would you repeat them?—Yes. I take it in this way: I believe you have got 121 in the Assembly and 57 in the Council of State. That includes the Governor-General, but I exclude him now, and if you exclude him that leaves 176. Out of the 176, the officials and nominated members and 1 Burman, I believe come to 73. So that the Government have got 73 certain votes in the Joint Session. On the other hand, I put the elected, and the total elected members are 103. Of course, in that 103 I include the landholders, the European representatives, and the representatives of commerce, but putting them altogether, 103, the Government have only got to convince 30 men to defeat any measure which the representatives wish to run through.

3674. It is laid down in the Report, I think, and so far as my memory serves me, there is nothing to contradict it in the Southborough Report, that the officials in the Legislative Assembly and the Council of State may be the same men?—I do not know; they may be or they may not be.

3675. I say it is suggested in the Report, is it not?—But I do not know what you are going to do.

3676. You do not allow for that?—I think that you will have separate men.

3677. You made your assumption on that?—Yes.

3678. Would it alter your impression of a Joint Session if they were not separate men?—No, because I am giving such a tremendous margin. If you turn to the Southborough Report and see the number of officials, there is a tremendous margin, because in the elected I include the landholders, the European representatives, the commerce representatives, and I say this from past experience—I do not mean any disrespect to them in any way; it is very natural—they represent certain interests, and therefore they do not bother very much about what interests us most, and generally you will find as a matter of practice that the European members, and even the landholders, vote with the Government. I say if you deduct them from it then it leaves almost an equal number—the elected number is equal.

3679. Assuming for a moment that there was no power in the Bill to pass legislation through the Council of State alone, assuming that the paragraphs about certified legislation disappeared from the Bill, would you be in favour in India of an ordinary second revising Chamber, or would you prefer that there should be no such a thing?—I am in favour of a Second Chamber.

3680. Supposing it had no function to perform except revising, and supposing a difference of opinion were to be cured by a Joint Session, have you ever considered whether you could then support a Second Chamber which was nominated for a term of years?—Oh, no; not as a Revising Chamber.

3681. You could not allow it to be nominated?—No; it would not be a Revising Chamber then.

3682. Why not? I do not follow. Many Second Chambers are nominated in the world?—By whom? That is the whole point.

3683. I am not putting forward any suggestion to you; I am only asking your opinion of suggestions which have been made to me. Supposing they were partly nominated by the Executive Council and partly by the Ministers in the Provinces?—I am very much afraid of nomination.

3684. You are very much opposed to them?—Yes.

3685. You recognise the difficulty which has been expressed by witnesses, in the Press and here, about the form of election to the Council of State or the Second Chamber?—Yes; I do. The view I take is this. As the Bill is now before the Committee, the Council of State seems to me to have only one function, that is to record the decrees of the Executive. There is no other function that I can see in the Bill. That is useless, perfectly useless. Why have all this machinery if that is the only object? Then you will ask me why I support it. I support it in view of the criticism that I offer that if you modify this Bill, as I am suggesting, then this Chamber has certain functions, and what I am looking forward to in the future is that it might become a real Revising Chamber. At present it will not be a real Revising Chamber; but if you alter your Bill in the light of my suggestions its functions will increase—its usefulness will increase.

Mr. Montagu—continued.

Then comes the question, How are you going to get your representatives there? For the present—we are only thinking of the transition stage—for the present I am quite content to accept the Southborough recommendation, namely, that the Councils of the various Provinces should send their representatives to the Council of State, and the object would be really—the whole object is this, the utility of the Second Chamber can only come in as a criticising Chamber, and in case of Joint Sessions you have again the usefulness of the Second Chamber in having representatives there.

3686. I am sorry I was late and did not hear the whole of your evidence, but when I came into the room you were explaining that the Legislative Assembly as constituted in the Bill would have no real powers at all—it would be a critical assembly with no responsibility?—That is what it is, practically.

3687. If it were made clear that there were certain subjects which would be left to the Legislative Assembly, that would go far to remove your objection?—That is exactly what I suggested.

3688. Forgive me if am wrong; I am trying to put it as I think you put it—your suggestion in your answer to the questions anyhow——?—No. I have not made it clear there, because we were confined to your questions, and I did not like to trespass.

3689. Am I right in thinking that what you would like in the Government of India is transferred and reserved subjects and a diarchy comparable to a diarchy in the Provinces?—Yes.

3690. Now, I want to know, so that I shall be in a position to know when we discuss possible amendments, how far you insist from your point of view upon that diarchy. I am taking you step by step. You say first that the Legislative Assembly must have certain functions in which its will will prevail; and you would like those subjects entrusted to Indian members of the Government?—Yes.

3691. Do you wish that those Indian members should be Ministers at the outset?—Yes.

3692. Or do you wish that they should be members of the Executive Council?—No; Ministers just like the Provinces. I attach very great importance to the beginning being made in the Central Government. I attach the greatest possible importance to it. I say that if you really want us to work it should be done.

3693. They should be Ministers?—Yes.

3694. Therefore, you have no fear yourself whatever that diarchy is unworkable?—Well, yes, I am convinced that diarchy is the only possible way out of this difficulty that we have to face.

3695. There are Indian witnesses, who have been before this Committee, whom you have probably heard, who are doubtful about diarchy?—I am not doubtful. I think myself it is bound to succeed. I do not see any other way, and that is the very reason why I find the difficulty in the Congress League scheme.

3696. In your capacity, as representing the Moslem League, have you ever heard anything which would suggest to you serious dissatisfaction with the Lucknow Compact?—No.

3697. None?—None whatever. Well, in Bengal there is a little breeze; that is all.

Lord Brodrick (Viscount Midleton).

3698. A witness yesterday described this scheme as a colossal measure of far-reaching consequences. Do you accept that definition?—I should like to know who that witness is before I can accept it. It seems to me an imaginative opinion.

3699. You do not regard it as a large measure?—No.

3700. You do not regard the setting up of elected Assemblies for the first time with large powers as being a great constitutional change?—It is undoubtedly a great constitutional change, but India is quite fit for it, and a great deal more than the Bill gives. Every change depends upon the conditions and capacity of the country. What may be a very revolutionary change in one country is quite the right thing in another country. Supposing you were giving this Bill to Central Africa, I think it would be revolutionary and colossal; but not for India.

3701. I am not talking about Central Africa, but the difference between the present conditions of India as regards representation and that which is proposed to be given. You do not admit that it is a large change?—No, I say we have been absolutely gagged all these years, otherwise we would have made a great deal more progress.

3702. You gave the Committee a number of comparisons as regards the electorate in Great Britain and India at different times. You laid special stress on the fact that in India in 1881 there were 9.17 per cent. electors. Do you think the conditions of England in 1881, considering all the questions of education and communication and the size of the two countries, are really comparable with those of India to-day?—May I point out that you are not giving responsible government to India.

3703. As I understood you, you were contending that the electorate which it was proposed to give was insufficient, and you were comparing the electorate of England in 1881 with that which it is proposed to give of India to-day?—I do not say the electorate is not sufficient.

3704. I understood you were comparing the two electorates—the electorate of England of 1881 (you gave the figures) with the electorate of India which is proposed to-day under the Southborough Committee?—No; my point was this: That is India—even according to the Joint Report—you can get 5 per cent. of the population in the electorate. That is what the Joint Report says. But if you look at the census of 1911, you have a literate population of 8.6 per cent. We have not got a census since, but I take it it has considerably increased; therefore you have something like 10 or 12 per cent. of educated literate people. In England you had constitutional government, representative government, in 1833, when your electorate was 4.6 per cent., and there was complete constitutional responsible government in the United Kingdom when your electorate was 4.6 per cent., whereas my electorate to-day, even according to the Report, will get in 5 per cent. But I say if you put a literary base, and reduce the Southborough qualifications for a voter, you get much more.

3705. You would admit that the want of education of the Indian electorate, as compared with the other, has some bearing?—I am taking the education test. I am not taking any other test.

3706. You have treated the nominated members throughout your evidence as being almost a negligible quantity, because their votes are known beforehand, have you not?—I do not know about a negligible quantity.

3707. Of course, their votes will count; but, as a matter of opinion, you think they are sure to be cast on one side, and therefore are not what you consider representative votes. Is that so?—Yes; that is so—from past experience in the Council. It is very natural, because a man is nominated by the Government, and therefore, to put it roughly, his constituency is the Government; he is created by the Government; he looks to the Government, and he votes for the Government. It is very natural.

3708. You are aware of a system here that there is a large number of members of the Government in both Houses of Parliament, whose votes are always cast for the Government?—Yes; because they have got a mandate from their constituency to support the programme of the Government; but that is very different.

3709. Do you know at this moment there are nearly 100 members of the House of Commons who are attached to the Government in one form or another?—Because they are pledged to the policy of the Government. That is a very different thing from voting according to the order of a Government, which is your constituency.

3710. Are you quite sure that in every case every member on the Government side agrees with the policy of the Government?—I do not know. But that is a very different thing. You cannot compare the two.

3711. It seems to me the same thing. You expressed great fear that measures would be modified, mutilated and ruined by the Council of State. What class of measures were you thinking of?—Well, what class of measures does the Bill think of? I do not know. The Bill provides for that. The Montagu-Chelmsford Report says that. Why you are giving this power to the Governor-General, I do not know.

3712. I know the powers. What I want to know is what are you thinking of?—How can I tell as to what view the Governor-General will take of a particular Bill which they may propose to mutilate? I cannot say. There may be some Bills which they may not agree with. In that case they may say: "Very well, now we do not want this."

3713. What I was asking you was what is there in your mind which you think probably may be put up to the Council of State, and the Council of State will say: "We will have nothing of this class of measure." What sort of measure?—Do you mean what sort of measure I have in my mind?

3714. It is purely hypothetical?—No; it is not hypothetical. Every power is given for a particular purpose. I say, if I may with great respect, the burden lies on those who propose this power to explain why they are giving this power.

3715. Your mind is working entirely on the power. The question I want to get at is, in the practical working of this business, what it is you are afraid of? Are you afraid of a particular class of measures for the benefit of labour, or for some other class, being stopped by the Council of State? What is it you have in your mind?—That will depend upon the Government of the time, what view they may take of any measure I do not know. I cannot probe their minds. I cannot tell you what view the Government will take.

3716. You showed very great suspicion of the power which is reserved to the Secretary of State?—I did not.

3717. Have you any precedent in your mind in which the Secretary of State has intervened in the manner of which you are afraid he may, against the wishes of the Council of the Indian Government?—I did not say anything about the powers of the Secretary of State. I do not look upon him with suspicion at all. I did not say anything about that. All I said was that the Secretary of State for India will not be in a position, sitting here in Whitehall, to be a court of appeal over the Government of India, when the Government of India have decided to certify a measure. I say he will not be in a position to intervene. In many cases it is not possible; he is too far away; he has to get all the information; he has to go into everything, and in many cases he will be helpless because the Government of India will say: "We consider, in the interests of peace, tranquillity, and safety of British India, that this measure should be certified"; and it will be a very difficult thing for the Secretary of State for India to say "No" to the Government of India who are on the spot. I say, in most cases he will be helpless. It may be, in some cases he will put his foot down, and may be able to say "No." That is my point.

Sir Henry Craik.

3718. You said that you were in favour of a diarchy or dual system of government?—Yes; I am. I am driven into it.

3719. You mean there should be a division of functions, in which Ministers should administer a certain number of transferred subjects, and the Executive administer reserved subjects?—Yes.

3720. You see no difficulty whatever in that?—I cannot say I see no difficulty; but I say there is no other scheme.

3721. You said you thought all subjects should be transferred?—That is the view we take.

3722. Where would the diarchic system come in then?—It does not come in in the Provinces at all.

3723. Then, surely, your opinion is not very valuable in favour of a diarchy, when you, at the same time, say that you do not want any diarchy to exist?—No; still you have got the Central Government. If you get all the subjects transferred in the Provincial Government you have still the Central Government left.

3724. You are entirely in favour of a diarchy, but, at the same time, that diarchy is to administer all the subjects transferred?—No.

3725. You said, I think, that you thought that India was now completely ripe for responsible government, and you compared the United States of America——?—No, I did not.

3727. But I think in your opening words you said: "We are now ready for full government"?—No; I never said that. I said the Provinces.

3728. We shall see what the shorthand note says as to that. I certainly understood that you said it?—If you understood it it is incorrect, and if I said it like that—I do not think I have—but if I have then I made a mistake.

3729. In another part you said you were very much opposed to treating the different parts of India in the same way—that there ought to be divergence between the way they were dealt with?—The various Provinces.

3730. With regard to those Provinces which you do not put on a level with your own, you would, I presume, think that responsible government should be denied to them?—No.

3731. You admit they are not on the level of getting responsible government, and you admit that there are some that are backward?—No; what I said was this, that the Functions Committee Report lays down practically, with small exceptions, the same rule of transferred subjects for all Provinces. I am right there; that is the Southborough Committee's Report, and I say that is not a fair way of dealing with different Provinces, because there are some Provinces which are advanced Provinces.

3732. Is not the whole question of transferred subjects one in which it is contemplated that the number of transferred subjects may be gradually increased as is found expedient?—Yes.

3733. Is not that the whole plan upon which the Joint Report rests?—Yes: that is so—that they should be gradually increased; but I say that is no reason why you should fix the same standard for every Province; but it is fixed.

3734. You admit there are parts of India which are not in this forward state of being quite ripe for responsible government?—I say every Province, in my opinion, is ripe for transferred subjects—every Province.

3735. But you want the transferred subjects to vary?—To vary according to the conditions of each Province.

Marquess of Crewe.

3736. You were asked some questions about the electorate in this country and in other countries in the world, from your own statement, and I see that you say, in the Report of the Bombay branch of the Home Rule League, that the reasons against the grant of full responsible government to the Provinces are (1) the smallness of the electorate, and (2) that the politically minded classes cannot be entrusted with the government of the remaining portion of the people. I think that the Memorandum goes on to say that in no country has the introduction of the extension of responsiblity been delayed or qualified by similar considerations. I imagine you, in turn, would qualify that, owing to what you said just now about Central Africa?—I gave the instance of Central Africa to show that it is a savage country. Surely you do not put that on the basis of any civilised country. We are talking of civilised countries.

3737. Do you know anything about Nigeria?—No.

3738. You do not know that in northern Nigeria there is a very ancient Moslem civilisation?—No; I do not know that part of the world.

3739. You do not happen to have read that, and you do not know that in southern Nigeria, at Lagos, there are negro gentlemen, barristers and others, who would consider themselves in education and attainments quite on a level with either Indians or British men of the same education; and it is conceivable, is it not, that men of that stamp either in the north or the south might have the same view that you take of the representative quality of the educated classes in India?—It is quite possible for them to take that view. But my view is not merely based on the fact that there are a few barristers in India, nor is the view of this Memorandum based upon that. This Memorandum takes the argument in this way: You have had at least complete responsible government in various countries where you had a much smaller electorate than the electorate you can now get in India according to your own test, according to your own standard, which is recognised by the civilised world. But still we are not asking for complete responsible government. We say that at least, so far as the Provinces are concerned, make a substantial move, and so far as the Central Government is concerned make a beginning. Is not that a fair and logical argument?

3740. You asked for complete responsible government in the Provinces—that is to say, that taking Bombay as an advanced Province and as a good instance, that Bombay should be purely self-governing, except in matters of law and order?—It would not be purely self-governing, strictly speaking. It would be subject to the supervision of the Government of India in many matters. It is really getting more or less freedom in its internal affairs, that is all. It is getting, first, decentralisation, and then getting freedom to manage its own internal affairs; but it is subject to the supervision of the Government of India.

3741. Would you agree to the list of the central subjects which is suggested in the various Reports we have had? You will find some mentioned in the Montagu-Chelmsford Report?—I have no objection to the list specified in the Southborough Committee Report, namely, the Provincial subjects and the Central Government subjects. I have no objection to them.

3742. I was anxious to know exactly what your point of view is?—Except, perhaps, about the University; but I am not very keen about it. If the Government of India wish to keep some Universities, like the Benares University, and there was a further question about the Calcutta University, it is a matter upon which I do not want to trouble this Committee.

3743. And those Universities cannot be said to be in the strict sense Provincial?—Calcutta University is Provincial; Benares is not.

3744. No; Benares obviously is not?—That is so.

3745. It is not confined to the United Provinces. Now, I want to ask you a question about the British members of the Civil Service: Do you contemplate that they will continue to serve in large numbers in the Provinces?—My opinion of the Civil Service in one sense is very high, because they are practical men of common-sense, and they will soon settle down. No man likes to part with his power, and at present they do not like it. But I think once the matter is settled we shall all settle down and they will settle down. And India is not a bad place; it gives very good pay.

3746. The position of the existing Civil Servant is carefully safeguarded, and that no doubt you would agree is the right thing to do?—I have always said this; I have never disguised this fact, that I do not wish that the interests of the Civil Servants, those who are in the present Service, should be prejudiced in any way, because I look upon their interest as vested, and I do not propose any legislation which is going to interfere with their vested interest. But with regard to the future, I do not agree with the Bill. I think Sections 24, 25, and 26 deal with public services which give absolute power to the Secretary of State for India to do what he likes, and I do not agree with that, with regard to the future. I do not want the past in any way to be prejudiced. I will respect vested interests.

3747. Do you contemplate that, as a matter of fact, many young Englishmen would join the Civil Service as you conceive it?—It is very attractive in every way. At present the feeling is a feeling which I can quite understand. If you have been ruling the country for 150 years, and somebody comes and says, "Now, look here, I want a share in this," naturally there is a feeling of a little resentment, and some people feel, "It is no good our serving in India," but I say it will all settle down, because, after all, you come to practical considerations, and with a little thought I think the Services will attract just the same.

3748. As you approach the Dominion status, you must remember in the other Dominions the Civil Service is practically confined to the natives of those Dominions?—If your Lordship means this, whether we shall have more and more Indians in the Service, I daresay we shall. That is very likely, and of course that is the very object. The object is not that we should be burdened with foreign skill, so to say, permanently in India.

3749. You are looking forward to the time when the Civil Service will be entirely manned by Indians?—Very likely. I do not know. But I do not think that we shall ever say that other members of the Empire are not to participate in the Civil Service. They are welcome. What happens now in commercial enterprise? We employ very largely foreign skill, men from different parts of the Empire, and that will continue perhaps for a long time.

3750. You know that it has been said by possibly ill-natured critics that the connection which a certain school of Indian thought would desire to keep with the Empire is simply for the purpose of being defended?—I tell the Committee frankly, this is my firm conviction, and I believe in it, and I have always worked on these principles. I say that so long as India is part of the British Empire—and I maintain that it should continue, it is in the interests of both of us that it should continue—and I say so long as India is part of the British Empire it is open to any Britisher to come there and stand on an equal footing with us. That is my view of it. But India must be governed primarily for the benefit of the people, and not for any particular class—not even an Indian class.

3752. You said, in reply to a question, that you were afraid that if the younger and keener Indians do not now get all they want in the way of reforms, they will not take a proper part in attempting to carry out such reforms as Parliament does give?—May I explain that? I have not only talked with many other people, but, if I may give you a little bit of my own personal experience in the matter, I entered the Imperial Council in 1909, after the Minto-Morley reforms. I went solely with the idea that, here we have got these reforms given to us; let us put our heads together and make the best use of them, and make the best possible use of the opportunities, however small they are, placed in our way. I went there in 1909, and I was there for three years. After three years—much to my inconvenience, and prejudice, and so on—I felt that I was useless there. It may be said we should have been influencing the Government of India. That is a very fine phrase; but the Government of India is not easily influenced. It is a very difficult thing to influence them. I did not stand for the second election because I thought I might utilise my time in a way more useful to me. After three years again I go and I find that really we continued this feeling absolutely of despair, and we are disheartened. We say what is the good of standing there in the Council. We make suggestion after suggestion, move resoluton after resolution; there is an official block thrown out and nothing is done—well, I would not be quite unfair; I do not want to be unfair to the Government of India—I do admit this that in some cases, although they rejected our resolutions they have given effect to them in some small way or other. They have tried to make some improvement. But it is a very dispiriting, disheartening, slow process, and I say unless you give some life to men who want to work for their country and some responsibility, it is disheartening. That is what I mean.

3753. It is true, is it not, that people who remain for a very long time in all Assemblies everywhere are apt to be inspired with the same feeling of something approaching despair?—Yes; but here there is not even the hope of defeating the other party.

3754. You are speaking now of the desire which you have to make the Viceroy's Legislative Council partially responsible?—Yes, more real.

3755. What you have just said would not apply in the same degree, or the same sense, to the Provinces?—No. I recognise that in the Provinces there is a field provided.

3756. There would be a good opening for young, keen men to take a part in public affairs?—Yes. My only objection is this in the Provinces, that I say you are unnecessarily delaying it. It is undesirable to my mind to be so timid as this Bill purports to be.

3757. You would like to see a great many more subjects transferred. One question about the India Office, where you remember I had the pleasure of seeing you some years ago, with others. You and your friends took the vew that the Secretary of State's Council ought to be abolished altogether?—Yes.

3758. Supposing it were not abolished, would you rather, of the two, leave it as it is, with somewhat limited powers, rather on the lines of Sir James Brunyate's recommendation, or would you prefer to see it turned into a purely advisory body, rather on the lines of the majority recommendation of the Committee which is called after my name?—The view I take is this: First of all, I want the Council to be abolished, and shortly I can give you my reasons. The net result of this Council is this: The Secretary of State for India really is the master of this Council, practically, except for financial purposes; that is, the vote of the majority counts only in that respect, and nothing else. Practically, the Secretary of State for India is the master, so far as this Council is concerned. Now, what is the position? He takes shelter whenever he likes behind the Council, when he has got to face Parliament. Parliament naturally takes it for granted that here is the Secretary of State for India, undoubtedly assisted by his Council—men of ripe experience, men who have been on the spot, and so on—and naturally cannot very well interfere with the Secretary of State for India. He, therefore, really becomes the master of Parliament, taking shelter behind his Council practically. He also is the master of the Government of India, because he can order them about as he likes. Really, his position is that no one can challenge him; if he is an able man he can really do what he likes. If that is so, what is the good of having this Council? On the other hand, there is this danger, that if the Secretary of State for India listens to the advice of his Council, and he must—after all, he is a human being, and if you have fourteen men round you every now and then, and discussing things, a few things must stick—and if he listens to the advice of his Council what happens? He gets nothing more than the old bureaucratic ideas of men who have been nourished and nurtured in the administration of India. You do not get a fresh mind at all. Therefore, nolens volens, either he has got to fall into that pit, namely, to be guided by his Council, which to my mind is very prejudicial, and I can give you one instance of the delays that are caused unnecessarily. I happened to introduce a little Bill in the Imperial Council—the Wakf Validity Bill. Lord Hardinge and myself waited for two years to get a reply from the Secretary of State for India. My term of office was over, and Lord Hardinge then told me: "I did not get any reply from the Secretary of State for India; we cannot make any progress with that Bill. If I get a reply from the Secretary of State will you agree to be nominated to pilot this Bill?" I said I would. It was in the third year we got a reply from the Secretary of State for India.

3759. That might be accounted for by the fact that the Council does not always agree. You have spoken as if they always submitted one solid bureaucratic statement to the Secretary of State?—I did not mean that. I say mostly you get that.

3760. You may take it from me they sometimes differ among themselves?—I dare say.

3761. Also, you have forgotten the Indian gentlemen of whose advice the Secretary of State has the advantage?—Well, there again I do not want to say anything, but it seems to me that nomination is not always a happy procedure. I wish the Council to be abolished, but if your Lordship is going to put it to me like this: Supposing it cannot be abolished? then I say the next best course, to my mind, is this: I would rather have an advisory Committee, but I do not want this Council to continue for a day longer than is necessary.

3762. On the Advisory Committee you would like to see a larger proportion of gentlemen from India than are normally appointed at present?—Yes; I would like to see half and half by a panel.

3763. Appointed by a panel in the way suggested?—Yes.

Sir J. D. Rees.

3764. In the course of your evidence you have several times mentioned a problem of unimaginable magnitude—the uplifting of the masses. Did I rightly understand that you think British administration has done done nothing, or too little, in that respect?—If you ask me, the British administration has done very little.

3765. You feel that you and your friends in power could do more?—I am certain of it.

3766. This Bill will give you more power to do more?—Certainly, it gives us more power in the Provinces.

3767. You speak of wishing to make it a success. If it were a hopeless project, you would not want to do that?—No.

3768. In point of fact to-day, in answering a member of the Committee, you referred to an electorate of 5 per cent. as already in sight—a practical proposition in India?—More—I say 10 to 12 per cent.

3769. This scheme provides you with powder and shot for your own offensive?—I do not want to be on the offensive. I am a very mild man; I want to work.

3770. You have several times referred to, and objected to, the safeguards provided in this scheme, which, of course, are a great feature in it, and you said the Government of India, not easily influenced, as to which I express no opinion, can rush through any measure it pleases. I should like to ask you whether it has been characteristic of the Government of India while you were an additional member, have they been in any hurry to rush through measures of which their Indian members on the Council disapproved?—The last was the Rowlatt Act.

3771. I was coming to that; it had occurred to me?—But I can tell the Committee this, apart from the Rowlatt Act, which is a very exceptional case, that times out of number—and I think Lord Sinha will bear me out—Bills were placed in the Legislative Council in the morning when we arrived in the Council. Till then we know nothing about the Bill at all.

Chairman.

3772. So they are here?—There is no comparison between the Government here and the Government in India.

Chairman.] That makes no difference to the members who have to consider them.

Sir J. D. Rees.

3773. I am not referring to small matters which can be presented in the morning and passed in the afternoon; I am referring to large and important matters, and I ask you, except what you consider to be a conspicuous exception, the Rowlatt Act (which I think, from another point of view, was a conspicuous exception), has it been the custom of the Government of India to rush through legislation to which the Indian members were clearly opposed? Do you say that?—I do not know how you mean rushed through.

3774. It is a very clear question?—Pardon me, it is not. What do you mean by rushed through?

3775. Put through?—Yes, times out of number.

3776. You think they do?—Yes. Rushed through means two things. According to you it means hurry; they might not hurry. A Bill may be published and circulated for opinion, it may be weeks or months before the country; that is not rushing through the Bill.

Chairman.

3777. "Rushing" means hurry?—I say no; that is not very often. But the Government can get any measure through if they want. That is my point.

Sir J. D. Rees.

3778. Is it a fair description of the Government of India—I use your own words—to describe it as a body which even before these reforms came into force has been in the habit, and will under these reforms be in the habit, of really imposing its executive will?—I have no doubt that so long as the Government of India possess these powers they will impose their executive will whenever they like, and sometimes with a vengeance.

3779. You said that there was no need for a veto or a safeguard, because the Indian members, the non-official members of the Council, I think more particularly the Indian official members, almost invariably supported the Government of India?—I do not say almost invariably; I say in several important matters.

3780. I must confess I took your words down, and derived an opposite impression. I am glad you have been able to clear it up. Without suggesting for a moment that you could bring the African on the same plane as the Indian, I should like to ask you——?—I do not think it possible.

3781. I said without suggesting it—I was careful to say that. I ask you one question arising out of what Lord Midleton and Lord Crewe have asked you, because I am not clear what your answer is. Do you seriously suggest that a useful comparison can be made between the electorate which is now to be introduced as a new thing into an Oriental Empire and the existing electorates in Europe. Do you seriously suggest that?—I suggest this, that the sooner you give up your ideas of differentiating Oriental people from European people the better.

3782. But you are not examining me at the moment. I want to ask you this, geographically speaking India is in the East, and I will call it for the moment, with your leave, an Oriental country?—Call it India; it is more specific.

3783. Would you suggest that a useful comparison can be established in that way?—Undoubtedly, yes; that is exactly what we are doing.

3784. You want to transfer law and order—you want to make it a transferred subject in the Provinces?—Yes; I think some Provinces are quite capable.

3785. In answer to Lord Crewe, where he suggested some doubts about the propriety of doing what you suggested, or put it to you that it might be open to objection, you said after all there will be the supervision of the Government of India?—Yes; so there would be.

3786. You attach importance and value to that?—No. You are afraid that the Provinces will not be able to manage their affairs, if complete responsible government is given to them. That is the proposition. The answer to that is that, in my opinion, some Provinces are quite ripe for complete responsible government, and there is nothing to be afraid of, because you have the supervision of the Government of India.

3787. Do you mention that as a valuable thing?—I recognise it as a fact, that is all.

3788. Would you allow that the action of the Indian members of the Governor-General's Council, in respect of the Rowlatt Act, was apt to inspire some doubts as to the wisdom of transferring law and order, making it a transferred subject?—I am not suggesting the transfer of law and order in the Central Government.

3789. No; in the Provinces?—They cannot deal with any legislation which may be vetoed.

3790. They may have the administration of law and order under your suggestion?—That will be administered because you have to carry out the orders. Supposing I was a member. Under the constitution, even I, whatever may be my feelings, if I get any orders from the Government of India, which is my superior authority, my discipline will compel me to carry out those orders.

3791. Would the Deccan Ryots, in respect of their indebtedness to money-lenders, altogether welcome the suggestion you have made as to the transfer of all the business with which they are connected in Bombay—to make it a transferred subject?—I have no doubt in my mind they would have any day a Minister rather than an executive bureaucrat, whether an Indian or an Englishman.

3792. You say, in your Memorandum, that the appointment of Provincial Executive Councils should be left to the free choice of the Crown, and, further on, you make the same remark as regards the Executive Council of the Governor-General. Upon whose initiative, upon whose recommendation, would the Crown act in the appointment of Executive Councils? You object to the making of rules?—I object to the making of rules because I do not know what rules they are going to be. My view is the members of the Executive Council, both of the Provinces as well as the Viceroy's Executive Council, should be appointed by the Secretary of State for India, on the recommendation from India; but there should be no limitation of any kind placed upon them.

3793. As the rules would be made under the authority of the Secretary of State, is there any real difference? Is not this rather captious criticism?—No, —No, because what you propose to do is to frame rules as to the qualifications of the candidates for the Executive Council. That is what you are trying to do, and I say No; fix no qualifications for candidates for the Executive Council, but leave it to the Secretary of State for India and the recommendation of the Government of India.

3794. On page 6 of your Memorandum you quote the Montagu-Chelmsford report to the effect that the time has not yet come to give the Legislative Assembly a similar measure of control over the Central Government as is given to Provincial Councils. You take that from the Report, and then you say: "This position is not warranted by the terms of the pronouncement of the 20th August"?—Yes.

3795. I understand you disapprove of it, but how can you say it is not warranted when the first page of that book which you have says that the pace is to be set by the British Government?—What I mean is this. The pace is to be set by the British Government, but where does it say that it must be confined to the Provinces?

3797. You admit that the pace is to be set by the British Government?—What is your question now—whether I admit that the British Government should be the judge of the pace?

3798. I did not say so; I ask you whether you can maintain that this was not warranted by the pronouncement of the 20th August?—I do maintain that there is nothing in the pronouncement of the 20th August which would justify the fourth formula laid down in the Montagu-Chelmsford Report—absolutely nothing. It is an arbitrary stoppage. We will make the Provinces the domain of responsible government; Central Government, no.

Chairman.

3799. What you mean is simply that you take a different view of the words used by His Majesty's Government from that which they take themselves?—I should like to be corrected. What are the words which warrant this fourth formula?

Sir J. D. Rees.

3800. I will come to the next question. Do you think that the Indian civil servant is possessed of the average intellectual equipment?—I suppose so, because otherwise they would not pass their exams.

3801. Do you think that they have a real regard for the people of India and a desire to serve their interests?—Well, they are doing their duty, but I do not think they have much attachment for India. They are always looking forward to their leave and coming home, and they are always looking forward to retire. I mean they do their duty; I do not say they do not do their duty. They carry on the administration, and some of them are very efficient officers, but I do not think that many of the Civil Service men have a real attachment or feelings for the people of India.

3802. I will ask Mr. Hasan one question: You represent the Indian Chamber of Commerce; that is not the British Chamber of Commerce in Madras?—(Mr. Hasan.) No.

3803. In the course of a speech you said: "The Indian merchants are no longer the dupes of the European merchants." I should like to ask you if you really mean to suggest that European merchants, those you have seen, have made dupes of the Indian merchants with whom they have been associated? You understand that it is a serious thing to say?—I say that European merchants, so far, have taken advantage of the backwardness of the Indian merchants, and, of course, being Europeans, they have correspondence with England and other foreign countries, and Indians, not knowing English, had to depend on the European merchants for their business. Indian merchants were for a long time in the hands of the European merchants, to be guided as they wanted. So Indian merchants, in order to gain the goodwill of the European merchants, had to subordinate Indian interests sometimes. Now the position is reversed; they can take care of themselves, and, as I have said, they can organise themselves; they can advance their interests, and they are no longer in the hands of European merchants, and they are no longer their dupes.

3804. When you said that they had taken advantage, did you mean they had taken an unfair advantage?—Sometimes it was unfair.

Chairman.] I do not think anybody who has had experience of Indian merchants—as I have—would readily believe that they could be made dupes of by anybody.

Major Ormsby-Gore.

3805. Mr. Jinnah, you are the first Mohammedan witness who has appeared before this Committee?—(Mr. Jinnah.) I believe so, as far as I have read the evidence before the Committee.

3806. You appear on behalf of the Moslem League—that is, on behalf of the only widely extended Mohammedan organisation in India?—Yes.

3807. I was very much struck by the fact that neither in your answers to the questions nor in your opening speech this morning did you make any reference to the special interest of the Mohammedans in India: is that because you did not wish to say anything?—No, but because I take it the Southborough Committees have accepted that, and I left it to the members of the Committee to put any questions they wanted to. I took a very prominent part in the settlement of Lucknow. I was representing the Mussulmans on that occasion.

3808. On that point, you have nothing further to add in regard to the principle of communal representation or the actual proposed allocation of the seats in Bengal or elsewhere?—No. I have only to say this: The Lucknow compact we accept, and we are in honour bound to accept that, and, in my opinion, it should not be changed, because it was not merely a question of Bengal: it was a question of all India. You must have observed, if you have the resolution fixing the percentage that in some of the Provinces—take Bombay—it has only 14 per cent. of the Moslem population, but we get 33 per cent. of representation; in the United Provinces you have only about 14 per cent. of the Moslem population and you get 30 per cent. of representation. The whole question was an All-India question. The position of Bengal was this: In Bengal the Moslems are in the majority, and the argument was advanced that any section or any community which is in the majority cannot claim a separate electorate; the separate electorate is to protect the minority. But the counter-argument was perfectly true that numerically we are in the majority, but as votors we are in the minority in Bengal, because of poverty, and backwardness, and so on. It was said: Very well, then, fix 40 per cent., because if you are really put to the test you will not get 40 per cent., because you will not be qualified as voters. Then we had the advantage of the other Provinces.

3809. On behalf of the All-India Moslem League, you ask this Committee to reject the proposal of the Government of India——?—I am authorised to say that—to ask you to reject the proposal of the Government of India with regard to Bengal.

3810. You said you spoke from the point of view of India. You speak really as an Indian Nationalist?—I do 3811. Holding that view, do you contemplate the early disappearance of separate communal representation of the Mohammedan community?—I think so.

3812. That is to say, at the earliest possible moment you wish to do away in political life with any distinction between Mohammedans and Hindoos?—Yes. Nothing will please me more than when that day comes.

3813. You do not think it is true to say that the Mohammedans of India have many special political interests, not merely in India but outside India, which they are always particularly anxious to press as a distinct Mohammedan community?—There are two things. In India the Mohammedans have very few things really which you can call matters of special interest for them—I mean secular things.

3814. I am only referring to them, of course?—And therefore that is why I really hope and expect that the day is not very far distant when these separate electorates will disappear.

3815. It is true, at the same time, that the Mahommedans in India take a special interest in the foreign policy of the Government of India?—They do; a very, very keen interest, and the large majority of them hold very strong sentiments and very strong views.

3816. Is that one of the reasons why you, speaking on behalf of the Mohammedan community, are so anxious to get the Government of India more responsible to an electorate?—No.

3817. Do you think it is possible, consistently with remaining in the British Empire, for India to have one foreign policy and for His Majesty, as advised by his Ministers in London, to have another?—Let me make it clear. It is not a question of foreign policy at all. What the Moslems of India feel is that it is a very difficult position for them. Spiritually, the Sultan or the Khalif is their head.

3818. Of one community?—Of the Sunni sect, but that is the largest; it is in an overwhelming majority all over India. The Khalif is the only rightful custodian of the Holy Places according to our view, and nobody else has a right. What the Moslems feel very keenly is this, that the Holy Places should not be severed from the Ottoman Empire—that they should remain with the Ottoman Empire under the Sultan.

3819. I do not want to get away from the Reform Bill on to foreign policy?—I say it has nothing to do with foreign policy. Your point is whether in India the Moslems will adopt a certain attitude with regard to foreign policy in matters concerning Moslems all over the world.

3820. My point is, are they seeking for some control over the Central Government in order to impress their views on foreign policy on the Government of India?—No; because that is excluded. See my answer II.

3821. You say you want to transfer a considerable number of All-India subjects to the control of the Indian Legislative Assembly?—If you will look at my answer to question No. 11 you will see I say this: "The Council of State may be retained provided that a system of reserved and transferred subjects similar to that proposed for the Provinces is adopted for the Central Government, and that in the legislature of India the certificate of the Governor General in Council should not apply except to certain reserved subjects hereinafter mentioned. The reserved subjects shall be the Army, the Navy and foreign and political relations."

(After a short adjournment.)

Mr. Bennett.

3822. (To Mr. Jinnah.) You gave us some very interesting statistics regarding the percentage of literacy in various countries simultaneously with the extension of their political life. Have you any figures which show the growth of the electorate in England from 1832, the time of the Reform Bill? Do you remember how many were enfranchised at the time of the first Reform Bill, and then after 1867, and then after 1884? If you could give us those I think you would complete your statistics?—I have not got that; but I start with 1835, and I come right up to 1889.

3823. You have not the number enfranchised by Lord Grey's Act?—No.

3824. I think you admit that the gross electorate at present in India is something like half a million?—Roughly.

3825. And the Southborough scheme would enfranchise 5,000,000?—Yes.

3826. Do you regard that—increasing the electorate at a bound by ten times—as a small development or a small concession?—I do not regard that as a small development. That is not my point, it is undoubtedly a development. If you have, say, roughly, half a million of an electorate all over India, and you make it into 5,000,000, it is a big increase, undoubtedly.

3827. You would say there is no timidity in that, would you not? Would you not say that a Government which at a stroke increased the number of the electorate ten times was rather a courageous Government?—I would put it in this way, that the Government thinks there is a tremendous movement all over the country, so tremendous that you can make an electorate of ten millions or fifteen millions, but still you say: "We will make it five million." That I call timidity.

3828. You do not call that courageous?—Certainly not, because you have material for fifteen million, and you make a movement of five million, which is not very courageous. It is a big advance.

3829. Is not that a disputable question, whether we have such a large proportion of the population fit for political functions—is not that an open question?—No; in my opinion it is not. You can debate any question.

3830. Is not that one of the matters that have been carefully inquired into by a very competent and very representative Committee, the Southborough Committee?—If you ask me I tell you frankly that the Southborough Committee tried their very best to bring about settlements between various conflicting opinions, and no doubt they made a big advance. I am not disputing that it is a big advance.

3831. You spoke this morning of an attitude of mind in regard to this Bill indicated by certain people saying "beggars cannot be choosers, and we must therefore take the best we can get." Has there been any responsible statement or declaration in England which gives the people in India ground for contemplating the situation in that way? Can you recall anything which any responsible person in England has said to encourage that belief?—In so many words?

3832. No; I do not pin you to any particular words; I ask you if you can point to anything which has been said or done which warrants people in India looking at it from the point of view that beggars cannot be choosers?—I will tell you what—the people in India think like this: they think that you have got first of all the European community opposing the reforms; we have got the Memorandum of the European community annexed to the Despatch of the 5th March. The Government of India Despatch of the 5th March, if I may characterise it, is most reactionary; it destroys all value of the Montagu-Chelmsford proposals.

3833. All value?—I say most of the value. I put it in this way, that I think that the real things are destroyed, and, if you like, I can give you a list. I cannot possibly accept that the Government of India, with the competent men they have got, have realised that they have substantially given a blow to the Montagu-Chelmsford proposals if their recommendations are accepted. That is No. 2. No. 3 is that you have got the Indo-European Association here powerfully opposing these reforms. No. 4 is that you have the Local Governments pushing forward their schemes. Now this has led some men, for whom I have the highest respect, to take this view: "For goodness sake let us support Mr. Montagu for all we are worth, otherwise we will lose this."

3834. That is your view?—Therefore I say this is the view of some people, and the position is such that we are in the same position as a beggar who cannot choose.

3835. You spoke of the Indo-European Association. Surely this Committee will be able to take its measure of the significance and authority of any representations they may make?—I do not say that this Committee will not, and that is exactly why we are here. Our only hope now, at this stage, is to convince this Committee of our view; that is why we are here, and I hope that you will come to the right conclusion.

3836. Surely the attitude of the Local Governments in India is not illiberal. It may differ, it may be an attitude different from that of the Secretary of State, but it is not an illiberal attitude?—Not if you mean that they are in favour of making an advance, and that they recognise you must go forward. That I admit as to most of the Local Governments, except the Madras Government. I think the Madras Government seems to think——

3837. Do you not think that the expression "Beggars cannot be choosers" tends to create an unsatisfactory impression amongst people in India, and that it tends to undermine their confidence in the good will and good intentions of Parliament and the Government at home?—That is their feeling, and it rather rests with you to remove that feeling.

3838. I am sure that we will look to you to help in the removal of it, so far as you can?—I assure you that I will do my very best; but I expect this Committee and Parliament to meet us in a generous spirit.

Mr. Bennett—continued.

3839. Now you have very little confidence, I see, in the Secretary of State as a Court of Appeal as from the Government of India and the Legislature. Would you state why you would not trust the Secretary of State?—No. It is not that I do not trust the Secretary of State; that is not my point. It is nothing to do with the personality of the Secretary of State at all; but any Secretary of State who is in that position cannot possibly overrule the Government on the spot. When they put forward this formula that a particular measure is essential in the interests of good government, I say it would be very difficult for the Secretary of State for India to constitute a useful Court of Appeal.

3840. Would not the Secretary of State, if he were a man of statesmanlike temper and character, have courage to take his own line as between the disputants?—Yes.

3841. And would he not have behind him the backing of Parliament?—Yes.

3842. After all, he would know that he is acting for Parliament; would you not trust him to arbitrate in a matter of this kind?—The only man who really showed himself so competent as that was Lord Morley, and it is not very often you get a Secretary of State for India of that calibre, and even he had his difficulties. I know that.

3843. Mr. Jinnah, you more than once, in your Memorandum, refer to the appointment of Governors, and you insist upon the Governors appointed to India as being men taken from the public life of England. Now, does not that imply a certain confidence in the arbitral quality, if I may use the word, of the Governor in his temper and his attitude towards questions in dispute between various interests in India? You look upon public life, you admit, in England, as qualifying a Governor for taking a fair view of things and an impartial view of things?—Not only an impartial view but also he brings a fresh mind to bear upon the questions.

3844. Take a man from the front rank of public life in England, do you not think that fact, by presumption, invests him with an arbitral capacity which would make him a good court of appeal in matters at issue between the Government of India and Parliament?—I do not follow your point exactly.

3845. A Governor taken from the public life of England commends himself to you as an impartial person, a man capable of exercising a fair judgment and pronouncing a fair judgment between disputing elements?—Yes.

3846. The Secretary of State for India is chosen from the public life of England, and he is usually in the front rank of public men in England?—Yes.

3847. Does not that carry with it the presumption that he would fairly exercise his arbitral qualities in disputes between the Government of India and the Legislature; do you understand me?—I understand the question perfectly now. I am not disputing or questioning the desire and the intention of the Secretary of State for India, who undoubtedly will be one of the best men in public life in England, to do justice—I do not question that—but you cannot compare him with the Governor, for this reason: that the Governor will have a composite Government, one-half experts and one-half executive; the Governor will not be at Whitehall, but in Bombay, and in Madras, and so on, on the spot; he has got all the materials before him, he will have the views of the Ministers before him, he will also have the views of many of the members of the Legislative Council before him; and he is much better fitted by virtue of the materials before him to come to a right decision.

3848. May it not be an advantage that he is 6,000 miles from the area of dispute, and will he not be abundantly supplied with material, such as documents, on which to exercise his judgment? The whole of the facts will be before him?—We are talking of the certificate now. The Government of India decide. Supposing you are asking the Government of India to decide to run a measure by certificate, are you going to wait until the mail arrives with the dispatches six weeks afterwards? Certainly not. They will wire the Secretary of State for India that a particular measure is essential: "We want it certified; please give your consent." That will be done by wire. How are you going to get all the materials to place before the Secretary of State?

3849. We heard the other day of a decision which was given, and which took two years to arrive at?—That is by correspondence.

3850. That does not imply very precipitate action. However, I think we have exhausted that subject, and I do not press you further with it?—I think you know that there are certain urgent matters, and certain matters which are not urgent; some may wait for five years and others cannot wait for five days.

3851. As to matters of transfer, you would like law and order to be transferred, would you not, in the Provinces?—In my opinion the Provinces are quite ripe for it, but—I make this but—I say I also realise, which has been forced upon me very emphatically, the announcement of His Majesty's Government of the 20th August, which speaks of the progressive realisation of responsible government. As a compromise I say: "Very well; if that has got to be carried out then police, justice and law can be reserved subjects." I say that is also a primary function of the Government, and it is a very important thing, and I say: "I am willing that you should keep that to yourselves."

3852. I do not want to refer to any elements of discord in the past, but you remember probably three rather serious racial riots in Bombay in your time—I remember two in my time—Hindoo and Mohammedan riots—one in the late '80's or early '90's, and one towards the end of the 90's?—That was long before my time; I was at school.

3853. I am glad you are so young a man. Would it not be an advantage in the case of an occurrence of that kind if the maintenance of law and order were left with the executive side of the Government?—I do not think so, if you ask me, but I do not want to go into unpleasant matters, as you say.

3854. It is with no desire to bring up old troubles that I ask the question; I would like to forget them?—If you ask me, very often these riots are based on some misunderstanding, and it is because the police have taken one side or the other, and that has enraged one side or the other. I know very well that in the Indian states you hardly ever hear of any Hindoo-Mohammedan riots, and I do not mind telling the Committee, without mentioning the name, that I happened to ask one of the ruling Princes, "How do you account for this?" and he told me, "As soon as there is some trouble we have invariably traced it to the police through the police taking one side or the other, and the only remedy we have found is that as soon as we come to know we move that police officer from that place, and there is an end of it."

3855. That is a useful piece of information, but the fact remains that these riots have been inter-racial, Hindoo on the one side and Mohammedan on the other. Would it be an advantage at a time like that that the Minister, the representative of one community or the other, should be in charge of the maintenance of law and order?—Certainly.

3856. It would?—If I thought otherwise I should be casting a reflection on myself. If I was the Minister I would make bold to say that nothing would weigh with me except justice, and what is right.

3857. I can understand that you would do more than justice to the other side; but even then there is what might be called the subjective side. It is not only that there is impartiality, but there is the view which may be entertained by the public, who may harbour some feeling of suspicion?—With regard to one section or the other, you mean they would feel that an injustice was done to them, or that justice would not be done?

3858. Yes; that is quite apart from the objective part of it?—My answer is this: That these difficulties are fast disappearing. Even recently, in the whole district of Thana, Bombay, every officer was an Indian officer from top to bottom, and I do not think there was a single Mohammedan—they were all Hindoos—and I never heard any complaint. Recently that has been so. I quite agree with you that ten years ago there was that feeling what you are now suggesting to me, but it is fast disappearing.

3859. I am aware that it is diminishing. I have seen that myself, and I am glad to hear that it is fast disappearing. The feeling in India with regard to this Bill has undergone a certain change since the Montagu-Chelmsford Report was issued, has it not?—I do not say that it has undergone a change, and I think there is some misunderstanding created here probably. There really, if I may say so, are two or three schools of thought with regard to those proposals. There is one school which is a moderate school, and they say: "We are prepared to accept the Montagu-Chelmsford Report, whether the proposals are modified or not." There is another school, which says: "No; we want complete responsible government in the Provinces and also responsible government in the Central Government." There is a third section, which is willing to have some more regard to the announcement of the 20th of August, and they say: "Very well, there is a difficulty in asking for complete responsible government in the Provinces because of the announcement; therefore, if you like, as a matter of settlement to wait until we think we are ready for it, and some Provinces are certainly ready for it, keep police, law and order, and transfer the rest of the subjects or most of the subjects."

3860. But there were prominent people who at the beginning said the scheme was not worth the paper it was written upon, and they now take a much more favourable view of the Bill?—I think it was rather a hasty opinion to express on the proposals, which were just published then. The proposals did not call upon us to reject them or to accept them, because they were really for our criticism and opinion, and I think there was a misunderstanding.

3861. The Bill on closer acquaintance turns out to be a more liberal measure than many people at the beginning were disposed to admit?—That is so with regard to a few—I do not say many—because those who really understood I do not think disguised the fact that it was an advance, because even the Congress said so.

Mr. Acland.

3862. I have only one question, and it arises from what you said about the difficulty with some of the younger men in accepting the instalment of change and reform, which is represented in the Montagu-Chelmsford Report as being something worth their while to co-operate with. Young men have been sometimes in favour of violent courses very likely during the whole of history, and certainly since the time of Rehoboam, which is about 3,500 years ago, and one is anxious that there should be no section of the population which is not prepared to cast in its lot with the change which will be made, even although they may disapprove of certain parts of it as being an improvement. Now, when you were being asked about that by Lord Crewe, you described in a way which impressed me, your feelings as the result of your experience, and you said that as the result of your experience of being permanently in a minority and so on, you had felt it certain that you were not doing your best work in that capacity, and that everything you did came to nothing, and, of course, you pointed out that that position was not quite parallel to the position of a minority in the British Parliament, because a minority in the British Parliament may always hope to be a majority some day, and I sit here as a representative of what is at present a very small minority in the British Parliament, which may hope to be a majority some day sooner or later?—I hope very soon.

3863. I see your argument from that point of view, but is not that position of the younger men whom you perhaps represent, or used to represent, when you were younger, considerably modified by this fact that admittedly I think we are now at work on something which is intended to be only a stage, and a stage which will be modified in a comparatively short number of years, as reckoned in the development of a constitution, if not as reckoned in the development of a single human life. Do you not recognise that fact, that there may be further developments towards responsible government as being a reason which should influence the younger men to take their share in trying to make this stage which will follow the result of the recommendations of this Committee, whatever they may be, workable, putting their weight behind whatever may be done in the definite expectation that there will be development towards a further stage, not only in the Provincial Governments, but in the Central Government also. I understand what you said about your disagreement, with, I think, the expression of intention of the whole scheme, that there should be a progressive development, not only in the Provinces, but in the Centre; and do you not recognise that fact as the real test lying at the base of all our work and all the intentions of the British Government towards Indian constitutional developments?—Yes, in other words you asked me to have patience.

3864. Certainly; just as I am having patience now?—May I answer that?

3865. Please?—Of course, it is for this Committee and the Parliament to decide eventually as to what they are going to do. Which would you rather have? Enough draft has been made upon our patience. Remember the Councils came into existence in 1892; there are some small reforms in 1909, and now, in 1919, we find with the Bill you now propose that we are practically in the same position. I am absolutely convinced—and I think I can convince you—that we are practically in the same position as the Bill stands now. Which would you rather have? Would you rather have this: That we should wait for ten years, and allow a large portion of our people to be dissatisfied? You cannot help it; it is not a thing that you can work like a machine; the human element comes in; do you expect us to allow a large body of our people to be dissatisfied and discontented? And remember, as I say, that they are men of position. Take, for instance, the man of any position in life making a large income in Bombay Presidency or Madras Presidency, going to this Council, sacrificing his money, his convenience, his comforts, and everything, sitting in these sessions for two months, and he knows he cannot do anything! Can you get people to reconcile themselves to this position when we already have had an experience of it since 1909, at any rate, and you ask me now, "Mr. Jinnah, will you not have a little more patience, and wait another ten years?" My patience is exhausted, and I ask you to make the advance now; we are fit for it—we are ripe for it; make an advance in the Central Government, but proceed cautiously; I do not ask for anything but a cautious advance in the Central Government, but giving the Central Government a Government where the people of India will have a share. Do not keep us outside the ring as irresponsible people. Is it too much to ask this from Parliament?

Chairman.

3866. You have answered that question very fully?—That is my opinion.

Mr. Acland.

3867. Thank you very much; I quite see your point of view, although it is not usual to answer a question by asking another?—I am only putting it to you in this way, that this is my answer.

3868. I would jst say this: Personally, at this stage of our deliberations, that I would rather accept what would be a stage in the development which seems to me likely to be almost certainly followed by a successive stage, and therefore leading on to further stages, than take a jump on to something else which may not be a success, and which may, therefore, not lead to further stages?—That is where we differ as to what is a big jump; you call it so, and I do not.

3869. I see your point of view, thank you.

Duke of Northumberland.

3870. As representative of the Moslems of India, do you think the majority of Moslems in India agree with you about women's suffrage, which, you say, you are in favour of?—Yes; and am very glad to tell you that not only the Moslems of India, but I have had an opportunity of meeting all the leaders who are in London now, and they all agreed with me.

3871. You want Joint Sessions in the Central Government instead of the use of the Council of State alone for securing legislation considered essential by the Government; that is the case, is it not?—Yes.

3872. Can you tell me what would be the position of the Viceroy if your Joint Sessions did not carry the legislation considered essential. Do you expect him to resign, or do you expect him to carry on with the full responsibility for peace, order, and good government without power to do what he considers essential?—We have given that power to the Viceroy that he can carry any legislation that he considers essential. If you will read my answer to No. 11 you will find this is what we say. We first of all say that the reserved subjects shall be the army, navy, and foreign political relations between the Government of India and other Powers except the relations with the colonies and dominions, including the declaration of war and entering into treaties on matters directly affecting the peace, tranquillity, and safety of the country, and that all other subjects shall be transferred. Therefore the Governor-General in Council, if he considers there is any matter which directly affects the peace, tranquility and safety of the country can run a measure through by Certificate. The Governor-General in Council can if he gives a certificate place a measure before the Council of State without going to the Assembly; it can be passed, and it need not go to the Assembly; it becomes law; it is based on the Certificate.

3873. You spoke of Fiscal Autonomy. Will you explain whether you meant by the term Tariff Autonomy for India, or did you mean complete control by the Legislative Assembly over the Budget?—Both.

3874. Can you tell me which of the three Home Rule Leagues in Bombay you are President of?—I am President of the Branch of the All-India Home Rule League in Bombay.

3875. That is the Bombay branch?—No; the whole body, Mrs. Besant's, in which Mrs. Besant is no more.

3876. I have one other question to ask. You have made it quite clear that you think this measure of self-government provided for in the Bill is wholly inadequate, and that a very much larger measure of self-government ought to be introduced at once?—I do not say it is wholly inadequate.

3877. You think it is inadequate?—I think it is inadequate, certainly.

3878. And that a much more extended measure should be passed at once?—Yes; and I think it will serve the object which we all have at heart in making a further advance if this Bill goes.

3879. You think that the people of India would not be prepared to wait until ten years have elapsed, and there is a chance of getting this whole scheme revised?—I cannot tell you what the people of India will do.

3880. Can you tell me what effect you think it will have on the agitation which is going on in India in favour of self-government, and which has been going on for some time past, if the Bill is introduced as it stands?—I am clearly of opinion that it will have a bad effect unless the Bill is modified.

3881. That is to say, that so far from appeasing the agitation it will rather tend to increase it than otherwise?—It will certainly leave a great deal of dissatisfaction. I cannot say exactly, but there will be a tremendous amount of dissatisfaction because, as I have said, we have been expecting the transfer of powers from bottom to top, and there is a disappointment in the Bill because the future remains untouched.

Lord Islington.

3882. You told us a good deal about your opinion on the Franchise. Would you say that India, as at present constituted, might have a certain portion of its population granted votes on other qualifications than that of being literate?—I think myself that it certainly does leave out a very large section which might be included in the electorate.

3883. You think it leaves out a lot of sections which might have been included, and a section which could not be described as literate?—Even literates might be left out, because it is a property qualification.

3884. That may be, but what I want to get at is this: You would say that there are people in India who, though they be not literate, have a sufficient interest in the welfare of the country to entitle them to a vote?—I think so, and I think they have a great deal of common sense.

3885. People who have that kind of common sense which would justify them having a vote?—Yes; I was astonished when I attended a meeting of mill hands in Bombay when I heard some of the speeches, and most of them were illiterates.

3886. Would you like to see the Franchise extended in the direction of the industrial community being better represented than is at present suggested in the Southborough Committee proposals?—I think a certain number will get in as it is now, in spite of what Mr. Wadia said. I listened to Mr. Wadia's evidence. Of course, I fully sympathise with his point of view, but I would not like to disturb the Southborough recommendations at present.

3887. You consider that they go far enough for the first stage?—I think they do, and I think it would bring in a fairly good number of the industrial, or what you call the factory, workers.

3888. You think a great many would be represented?—That is right.

3889. You think the electorate goes far enough, but that the power of the Council does not go far enough with regard to those who are elected?—I am not opposed to extending the electorate, but I would rather not disturb it, that is all.

3890. You would be satisfied with a restricted electorate, but you are totally dissatisfied with what you regard as the insufficient power in the Council?—Not totally, partially.

3891. You have got to partially?—I think that is quite clear.

3892. That is quite satisfactory. You said just now about the communal representation, I think in answer to Major Ormsby-Gore, that you hoped in a very few years you would be able to extinguish communal representation, which was at present proposed to be established and is established in order that Mahommedans may have their representation with Hindoos. You said you desired to see that. How soon do you think that happy state of affairs is likely to be realised?—I can only give you certain facts; I cannot say anything more than that I can give you this, which will give you some idea: that in 1913, at the All-India Moslem League Sessions at Agra, we put this matter to the test whether separate electorates should be insisted upon or not by the Mussulmans, and we got a division, and that division is based upon Provinces; only a certain number of votes represent each Province, and the division came to 40 in favour of doing away with the separate electorate, and 80 odd—I do not remember the exact number—were for keeping the separate electorate. That was in 1913. Since then I have had many opportunities of discussing this matter with various Mussulman leaders, and they are changing their angle of vision with regard to this matter. I cannot give you the periods, but I think it cannot last very long. Perhaps the next Inquiry may hear something about it.

3893. You think at the next Inquiry the Mahommedans will ask to be absorbed into the whole?—Yes, I think the next Inquiry will probably hear something about it.

3895. One word as to the Provincial proposals you have made. You have urged very strongly that, as far as the Provinces are concerned, there should be autonomy, and that this proposal of partial transfer is inadequate; you want to see all the services transferred to the constitutional system?—Except police, law and justice. That is what the Government of India have practically accepted.

3897. Yes?—There would be one member, and at present there will be one only. Under the Bill there would be one European member and that one would be in charge of the police, law and justice.

3898. Not necessarily one; there may be two?—There may be—I know the provision is for four; but I do not think it is likely. We never have had more than three.

3899. You would have the law and order in the hands of the European member of the Executive, and all the others in the hands of the Indian Minister?—Yes.

3900. In answer to the question, you seemed to accept and approve the suggestion that the Provincial Government has a relation to the Government of India?—As recommended by the Southborough Committee, certain powers are given to the Government of India.

3901. The parts which come under the reserved category?—The transferred category; they have got some powers.

3902. But they have a much more remote character?—True.

3903. You consider that those powers which would be entrusted to the higher authority over Provincial Governments can better be represented as Parliamentary control by the Government of India than they could be by a Secretary of State?—Your Lordship mentions?

3904. You will try to have Parliamentary control, and I am talking of those services which remain reserved and those which are responsible to Parliament as distinct from being transferred services, which are to be responsible to the Legislative Council. I ask you which you consider is the most accurate channel of Parliamentary control—the Government of India or the Secretary of State?—I prefer the Secretary of State for India.

3905. You would prefer the Secretary of State for India; could you give briefly your reasons?—For this reason: That if his Council is abolished (otherwise it would not make much difference) I think he would be free from a certain amount of what I call the settled views surrounding him, and I think he would be able to bring a fresh mind to bear upon it. That is the only difference.

3906. You said you were anxious to see certain powers granted to the Central Legislative Council, and you laid great stress upon that, and I think you said, in answer to a question just now, that, amongst those questions you set store by was the power over the Budget?—Yes.

3907. You would like the Central Budget of India to be handed over to the Representative Assembly?—No; not the Budget handed over.

3908. You said the Budget just now?—But, you see, it will be the same as the Provinces—similar to what you have in the Provinces. There would be the transferred and reserved subjects in the Central Government, and the Budget will be subject to the same procedure as in the Provinces.

3909. You do not suggest that the power on the part of the Viceroy and his Council should be removed to raise money for the services for defence and order of the country?—No; I said that would be a reserved subject.

3910. They are to be reserved subjects. They are also to have full power to raise the money to maintain them?—Yes; because he will have the power. If they are reserved subjects it really follows.

3911. You have put very emphatically this point about the Central Government, and it has not been discussed, either in the Joint Report or in any of the subsequent Reports, but we have had several witnesses who have advocated the same position as yourself. Are you in a position to tell us the services which you would like to see handed over to the constitutional system in the Central Government?—As a matter of fact, this question has got more or less out of the arena of discussion.

3912. You very emphatically argued this this morning; you said that India would not be satisfied unless something was done in this direction, and now I want to take you a stage further. You have given us a broad statement; are you prepared with the detail?—Unless I know exactly how the various departments are worked it will not be possible for me to submit a scheme before you. I must know how the departments are worked.

The whole thing is going to be so much altered; for instance, take the devolution of subjects from the Central to the Provinces, what will be left is the balance, and what is to be done with the balance?

3913. We have got that quite clearly; we have the line of demarcation between the Provinces and the Central Government. You have advocated very strongly that you should divide those subjects in the Central Government into transferred and reserved, and I presumed that, taking up the very strong attitude you have taken up with regard to that, you would have gone a little further and satisfied yourself as to the services you would like to see transferred?—I cannot do that for this reason, that unless I know the balance of departments left in the Central Government, how they are going to be reorganised, I cannot answer.

3914. You know the balance?—I do not know how they are to be reorganised. It is a very difficult thing to submit a scheme of this kind unless you know the inner working of the administration; I am not of the administration, but my answer is, first, that at some stage I hope that responsibility is going to be introduced into the Ceneral Government, and I take it that it would not be with one bound. How would you do it then?

3915. I know that you are asking me that question; I started by asking you?—Unless I know the working of the administration, unless I have access to the papers of the Indian Government I cannot answer or suggest a scheme.

3916. Up to now you have not got further than advocating it as a bad principle?—I cannot go further, because I have not got the materials. I can only guess.

Lord Sinha.

3917. I want to confine myself to the Bill and to ascertain if I can whether I have understood your evidence correctly without adjectives and without reasons. Do I understand this to be the effect of your evidence? First, you think the announcement of the 20th August is not only consistent with, but absolutely requires the introduction of the element of responsibility in some measure into the Central Government, but you are not prepared to put forward a scheme with regard to that because that has not been thoroughly investigated?—I have not access to the materials I should like to have, namely, what is behind.

3918. Secondly, so far as the Provinces are concerned, it is your opinion that it would be possible to have complete responsible government for some, if not all, of the Provinces; and thirdly, in any case the only subjects which need to be reserved in the advanced Provinces are law and order and justice; and you and those you represent are prepared to acquiesce in the arrangement for diarchy so far as the Provinces are concerned?—Yes.

3919. May I take it that your view is that, although that would not be completely satisfactory to all parties in India, every party would try locally to develop and work whatever scheme the Joint Committee may work out: may I take that?—I did not catch that.

3920. Every party would try loyally to develop whatever scheme the Joint Committee of Parliament might work out?—I think all the thoughtful people in India, however much they might be dissatisfied and discontented and disappointed, would certainly make an effort to do the best they could under the circumstances.

3921. To make the best of whatever powers are proposed to be conferred, with a view to obtaining further powers later on?—Every thoughtful man would do that.

3922. May I take it that is your view of the situation, because you have been asked a lot of things about what you think is going to happen, and I am putting it to you whether you do not think this is what is going to happen——?—I apprehend trouble—I honestly do—unless you meet this strong volume of opinion for a further advance in the Provinces and the Central Government I think you will not satisfy the people of India; I frankly say that before the Committee.

13 August 1919.

MR V. S. SRINIVASA SASTRI and MR. M. RAMACHANDRA RAO are called in; and Examined, as follows:—

Mr. Montagu.

3923. Lord Selborne has asked me to take the Chair, as he has to ask a question in the House of Lords, and he will be back again shortly. Mr. Sastri, do you desire to add anything to the statements you have already put in?—(Mr. Sastri.) Yes, sir, I have several things to say, but I will try to be as brief as I can, and to bring it under certain heads. I think it would be an advantage if at the outset I said to you how I meant to divide my evidence. In the first place I would like to take the Joint Committee, if they will permit me, through the Bill and its various clauses. That is work which has not been done yet. I want to take the clauses in a certain order and to point out what in my opinion requires amendment here and there, but I will reserve the discussion of Clause 9, which deals with the Finances of the Provinces to the end, and when I have done that I propose to address to the Joint Committee a few general remarks on the Grand Committee. I will not say what has been already said. But it does seem to me that one or two things may well be placed before the Joint Committee which have not yet been drawn to their attention. Then I will deal with the Instrument of Instructions which is proposed to be issued to the Governors of Provinces. I will then state what I consider to be a very important omission in the evidence which has been so far tendered, for which it seem to me nobody in particular is responsible, but which is, all the same, very unfortunate. We have no knowledge whatever of the rules which are going to be made under this Act; but, as I cannot deal fully with the subject, I think the least I can do, with the Joint Committee's leave, is to place before them two or three very important matters which may have to be borne in mind by those who draw up the rules hereafter. I will, in conclusion say just one or two words, and not more, about the vexed question of Brahmin v. non-Brahmin in the Province from which I come. I will now take, by your leave, the Bill, and I will first of all refer to Clause 3 of the Bill, and there I add no more than this: That I agree with those who think that the Minister should be placed in a position of perfect equality with the members of the Executive Council with regard to salary, status, and powers. When there are more than one Minister the Ministers should be able to form one entity similar to the Executive Council, meeting together and voting together, and, further, that the Governor of the Province should exercise his power of overriding the decisions of the Ministers only to the same extent as he exercises his overriding power with reference to the Executive Council. Then I come to Clause 4, with regard to which I have only to say that I favour the original suggestion adopted in the Montagu-Chelmsford Report, that the Executive Council in the Provinces should consist only of two members, one a European official and the other a non-official Indian. The point has been fully dealt with in the Memorandum, and I will not take up the time of the Joint Committee any further. In Clause 6 there is a certain omission which I might point out. On Sub-Clause (3) (a) the term of office of members of Governors Legislative Councils. This is a most important item, which, in my opinion, should not be left to be decided by the Rules. The analogous requirement is not left to be decided by the Rules in the case of the Governor-General's Legislative Council, in which case, for example, the time is fixed in the Bill, and it is stated to be three years. Why it could not be fixed for a similar period in the case of the Governors' Legislative Councils I fail to see. Then the Governor-General is, in Clause 17, empowered under certain circumstances to extend the lifetime of the Legislative Assembly. A similar power ought to be given to the Governor of the Province, but it is not so given. In Clause 8, and specially Sub-clause (3), which deals with the restrictions proposed to be imposed on the legislative power of Provincial Legislative Councils, there are several important things to say, but I will leave it to my honourable friend to deal with that part of the subject. Clause 9 I said I would deal with a little later, as it deals with a most important subject. I will now come to Clause 12, which empowers the Governor-General in Council, with the sanction of His Majesty, to create new Provinces, and likewise to create new sub-Provinces, with Deputy-Governors over them, whose status and powers, however, are left in an indefinite condition, to be determined in each particular case by the Governor-General in Council. I think this is a provision which requires to be carefully scrutinised, and I am not prepared to support it, as it is embodied in this particular clause. In the first place, I would like to point out the very serious omission to consider the feelings and sentiments of those who, having been living under one Administration, would be, under this provision split up into two or three Administrations. We have had a very unfortunate example of the evil consequences which may follow when the people are so split up against their will. Provision should be clearly made that their wishes would in every case be consulted. Then I do not quite approve of the creation of a sub-Province with a Deputy-Governor. I do not understand, because it was not at all mentioned in the original Joint Report, the necessity of creating a sub-Province with the Deputy-Governor, and possibly—I only say possibly, because I do not know what is really contemplated—without even a Legislative Council, without any of the powers that the people of the Province, sub-divided, may have enjoyed, nor is there anything in this clause to indicate the circumstances under which such action should be taken.

I now come to Clause 20, and Sub-clause (2) deals with very important matters, which are vital to the functions and status of the Legislative Assembly and the Legislative Councils correspondingly. The point is that the Bill proposes to leave these very important matters to be decided by the rules hereafter; for instance, the arrangements for presiding over the Assembly and the Legislative Councils are certainly of such great importance that they should be settled in the Bill itself. Personally, I am inclined very strongly to adopt the view that the Legislative bodies, especially where they happen to be popular houses, must be allowed, as, of necessity, to elect their own Presidents and Vice-Presidents. I certainly deprecate the proposals made both in the Joint Report and in the Bill before us for allowing the heads of Governments to nominate the President and Vice-President. I am not aware of any great Constitution in the world where a popular House is presided over by the head of the Government or by a nominee of his. It is of the first importance for the growth of free institutions that the popular House should have its own President and its own Vice-President. Then the number of members required to constitute a quorum and the rules for prohibiting or regulating the asking of questions on and the discussion of any subject specified in the rules—these deal so entirely with the very scope of the functions of the Legislative Assembly that I should personally like them all to be embodied in the Bill itself. Sub-Clause (4) describes the class of cases in which the Governor-General in Council may certify certain legislation for treatment by the Council of State in preference to the Legislative Assembly. I do not object to the words "safety and tranquillity," but I object to the words "interests of British India or any part thereof." The Governor-General in Council may if he is so minded use the words "interests of British India or any part thereof" in such a way that the Indian Legislative Assembly may have almost nothing to do, for I cannot conceive of any serious administrators bringing forward Legislative measures which were not in the interests of British India or any part thereof, and if when any such interests are concerned the Council of State may be invoked, it might be invoked on any occasion. I shall perhaps be told that this expression already is found embodied in another Statute, and that it has not been there used at all. I am aware that the expression is used in the 50th Section of the Government of India Act. In that section the Governor is empowered to over-ride in certain cases the decisions of the Executive Council, and the words "interests of British India or any part thereof" are used there. That may be so, but we are now dealing with the application of these words in a sphere entirely new. The Governor in such cases has to deal with the measures of the Executive Council. If you interpret those words in reference to measures brought forward in the Legislative Assembly, which is the popular House, in which his official advisers may may conceivably be out of sympathy, he may be induced to interpret the words "interests of British India or any part thereof" much more widely than he has ever been used to do. I do not see personally why those dangerous words should be retained. Sub-Clause (6) allows Standing Orders for the conduct of the Legislative Assembly, and by analogous provision of the Legislative Councils, to be amended in future by these bodies, but the amendments are made subject to the consent of the Governor, or subject to the consent of the Governor-General, as the case may be. It is difficult for me to understand why the Standing Orders which are merely regulations for the business of the Legislative bodies, should require the sanction of the head of the Government. Any statutory body may well frame rules for the conduct of its own business.

I now come to Clause 1, and Sub-clause (2) reads: "Provision may be made by rules under the principal Act as to the qualifications to be required in respect of members of the Governor-General's Executive Council in any case where such provision is not made by Section 36 of the principal Act as amended by this section." I need only say, with reference to this, that I support the general requirement that one-half of the members of the Executive Government of the Governor-General should be Indians. Of course, when I speak of one-half of the members of the Executive Government, I am using the expression "Executive Government" advisedly, so as to include any Minister who may be appointed if the Joint Committee adopts the recommendation unanimously given by the Indian Deputations as to the liberalisation of the Government of India. I am personally very strongly in favour of the liberalisation. On Part IV., "The Public Service in India," I consider that it is a great misfortune that a mighty Government like the Government of India, with enormous powers over vast millions of people, should be under an obligation to start their great career with a body of servants whom, however, they cannot fully control, whom they cannot appoint, and whose salaries are fixed for them by higher authority. Really, responsible government in India starts under a great handicap, when all their servants are to be controlled, to be regulated, and to be recruited by the Secretary of State for them. I am aware, Sir, that this arises from the circumstance that the Statute vests all the revenues and resources of the Indian Empire in His Majesty's Secretary of State for India, and not in the Government of India and the Legislature of India, as would ordinarily be the ase if the Joint Committee were dealing, for example, with a self-governing dominion. This naturally necessitates the Government of India coming up to the Secretary of State over small matters relating to their own servants. I recognise gladly that the Bill confers on the Secretary of State power to devolve rule-making power both on the Governor-General and on the local Governors. I only hope that this power will be very liberally used, so that the great Governments with which we shall have to deal in India hereafter may really be started on a level which is consistent with their dignity. Part V., "Statutory Commission," Clause 28, deals with the ten years' Commission which is to inquire into the growth of representative institutions in British India. At the time the original Joint Report was published, criticism was strongly made that the terms of reference, already enunciated therein, did not make provision for this periodical Commission inquiry into the way in which the Central Government of India was coming under popular control. I am very sorry to find that the Bill, even as placed before us, does not rectify that omission satisfactorily. The Commissioners are to be charged not merely with the duty of inquiring into the way in which responsible government in the Provinces should be improved, but the way, also, in which responsible government in the Centre should be improved. I hope that is an omission which has come in by inadvertence, and which will be removed without difficulty when the Bill takes shape in Parliament. The last important remark I shall make in this series is that Clause 30 really seems to me to embody a very defective provision. Clause 30 speaks of the way in which the rules under the Act, for which provision is made in various ways, should be made alterable. The original rules are to be made partly by the Governor-General in Council and partly by the Secretary of State in Council. They having been so made, it is declared in this Clause 30 that they should not be alterable by the Legislature either of India or of the Provinces. It seems to me that this is a provision which is very drastic and sweeping, and is likely to cause immense inconvenience in actual working. Unfortunately, the rules have a very wide range, and are likely to cover provisions of great importance and provisions of very small importance. I can understand provisions of Constitutional importance, which deal with Imperial interests, and deal, really, with the Constitutional development of India, being left over for consideration by the Secretary of State, but small rules, of which the scope is really internal, should be alterable by the Legislatures concerned. It is possible to divide the rules up into two classes or categories. I do trust that that division will be worked out, and that the Clause which says "and shall not be subject to repeal or alteration by the Indian Legislature or by any other Legislature," will be altered accordingly. The whole question of rules under the whole of this Act will be dealt with by my honourable friend when he comes to make his statement to supplement mine. I now come to Clause 9, which deals with the Budget, and I will try upon this head to be as brief as possible. I wish to preface my remarks by saying that, in my humble judgment, the provision made in the Joint Report of the Secretary of State and the Viceroy with regard to the provisional Budgets was a piece of able and wise workmanship, and any departure therefrom would take away seriously from the value of the Reform scheme. The power of the purse, the power of determining the revenues to be raised and the way in which the revenues should be expended, is one of the elementary powers recognised in the English Constitution and in the constitutions modelled on the English Constitution. That elementary right has yet to be conceded. That is the way in which, even in India, we have understood the development of the Constitution. Long before we had the power of interpellating the Executive Government, long before we had the power of moving resolutions, long before we ever had the power of influencing the Administration in practical matters, the Budget was to be placed before the members of the Executive and Legislative Councils and discussed, if not altogether voted upon. We began in that way. Many years have elapsed and it is high time, when you are inaugurating a great experiment in self-government, that you gave us the power of the purse outright. Without the power of the purse responsible government can only remain in a very inchoate and unsatisfactory condition. The Joint Report, however, did not propose to give us the power of the purse altogether. It placed upon us a very serious and, in my judgment, necessary limitation. It limited the power of the purse by vesting in the Governor of a Province the power of restoring items struck out by the Legislative Council. This would almost always have had the effect of preserving the integrity of the reserved services. Whatever the reserved services were, they were services that had been more or less well developed. I may say, after a long series of years, that the reserved services as proposed in the Feetham Committee's Report are those which have had a larger share than was perhaps their due in the revenues of the Provinces, the transferred services having come a bad second. It is time now, when you are transferring these services to the control of popular Ministers, that you gave these services an innings. In my opinion, therefore, it is perfectly reasonable to make a provision which will prevent the reserved services from continuing to enjoy precedence in this matter of the adjustment of local resources. The expedient by which the Joint Report secured this result was to make Provincial taxation a transferred subject, and make all proposals come before the Legislative Council for additional taxation only with the consent of the Minister. I consider that a most important provision. I consider, further, that any proposals which will give any member of the Executive Council similar powers of taxation of the Provinces are retrograde, and calculated to take away seriously from the power of the purse, which it is time was granted to the people of the Provinces. I can understand the great reservation in this regard in the case of the Government of India,

Mr. Montagu—continued.

India, where it is not intended to confer responsibility on popular representatives, at least to the same extent. But I always understood that the merit of the Montagu-Chelmsford scheme was that it proposed a generous measure of Provincial autonomy, restricted, it may be, in various ways, but not restricted so dangerously in the matter of finance as to preclude all chance of development. The proposals made by the Government of India in their recent Despatch might lead to that result.

"Having made these preliminary observations, I will now say one or two words about each one of the sub-clauses or provisos made in them. I believe the whole provision is defective, inasmuch as it excludes the raising of revenues or taxation from the scope of the Legislative Councils. The Budget, as we have understood it in Madras hitherto, a tall events, includes two heads—the head of revenue and the head of expenditure. The whole of the head of revenue is excluded from the scope of the 9th clause, to that extent constituting a very serious defect. I hope it is intended that that will be rectified before the Bill takes final shape. The proviso (b) deals with what I may call the transferred section of the Provincial Budget. Proviso (a) deals with the Reserved Budget. Proviso (b) is apparently intended, although it is not expressly stated, to deal with the whole of the Budget, but really will deal only with the transferred part of the Budget, and it is proposed that the Governor should have it in his power, whenever he considers it necessary, to incur expenditure, even in the case of a transferred department. I have no doubt, considering the matter very carefully, that it is quite conceivable that an angry Legislature, wishing to bring about a deadlock, might in some cases go the length of denying the finances necessary to carry on one of their own departments, say registration. It is conceivable, and it is perhaps necessary, to clothe the Governor with power in such circumstances for getting over the deadlock and carrying on the department which is so starved, although it happens to be transferred. But if that is what is intended to be provided against by sub-clause (b) it should be clearly stated. I would secure the object by saying "for the carrying on of any department for which the Legislature has failed to vote the necessary amount," or something of that kind, if that is the object intended. If any other object is intended I cannot support the provision so far as I can understand it. Then when the Governor exercises this extreme power even over the transferred services he ought to issue a certificate stating what the emergency is which compels him to carry on a department in the face of the Legislative Council's opposition. Then under Sub-clause (c) "Nothing in this sub-section," etc., it is intended here to enact something like a consolidated list. I have no objection whatever to such a fund being provided for, and certain items being taken out of the annual vote of the Legislative Council, but I do trust that the Legislative Council will take power to examine items connected with the salaries of the smaller officials. When the Colonies had their responsible government provision was made to secure from their vote, from the capricious vote, if I may say so, the salaries of people of great dignity appointed directly by the Crown. It was necessary to save them from the indignity of having their salaries cut down or refused by the Local Government, but the salaries of other officials—the monies which might be necessary to carry on a large body of services—should not be so exempted. That is the remark I would make on sub-clause (c). On sub-clause (d) there are one or two things one would like to say, and I will now indicate them. I approve of the principle underlying it. It should not be open to a private member to spring on the Legislative Council and on the Executive Council all kinds of financial resolutions for which the Budget may be unprepared; but I would point out to the Joint Committee that in India so far the private member has enjoyed the right of moving financial resolutions, which are now treated as recommendatory, of course. It would be rather hard to take this away, and I would humbly submit to the Joint Committee that it is desirable to retain this power. The Government of India themselves do not wish the power wholly taken away. They think it is a power which may be well given still to private members of the Legislative Councils, only they make a limitation that the increase and the decrease which the private member may propose should not belong to different halves of the Budget—the reserved and the transferred—or that they should belong to the same half. It might be necessary to introduce such a restriction where there was a divided purse, but since we are strongly in favour of the original joint purse idea of the Joint Report we do not see the necessity of that restriction. I next come to certain provisions of importance in the same clause. Sub-clause (3) deals with the appointment of a Grand Committee, but it takes away the power of appeal which was left to the Provincial Legislative Council against such a decision to the Governor General in Council. In our Memorandum we have stated the grounds upon which we should like this power of appeal to be restored. There is only one argument I would add to the arguments set forth in the Memorandum. In other constitutions these difficult matters of conflict were left to be decided by judicial tribunals which had authority to go into all these disputed matters. By a certain section of your Bill, with which I have no quarrel whatever, you propose to exclude the Courts altogether from jurisdiction in respect of these constitutional disputes.

Lord Sinha.

3924. Clause 30?—Clause 30.

Chairman.

3925. Will you please continue your statement?—The way I am inclined to be in favour of that restriction is that being in favour of that restriction I urge that as an additional reason for your leaving this power of appeal to the Governor General in Council. Under sub-clause (5) the Governor is to be vested with the power, which he has not hitherto enjoyed, of blocking legislation altogether which he may not like. I am not aware that the Governor General in Council is to be invested under this Bill with such a power. I do not see the necessity for the Governor having this new constitutional power. It is a dangerous power for any Governor to have to exercise. The Governor has the power in the last resort of vetoing legislation. I put it to the Joint Committee that it would be considered an extraordinary thing to empower the Governor to go to the Legislative Council and say: "Now you are discussing this subject I will not allow you further to discuss this subject." It would lead to a very dangerous situation, and it is not necessary. Where the Governor is strongly of opinion that any legislation would be risky or dangerous or undesirable, he has it in his power to veto it at the end. Perhaps if he allowed the discussion to go on he might change his mind and he would see that it was a measure which he could on the whole accept. You propose, further, to invest him with the power of returning such a Bill for the re-consideration in certain respects of the Council before he gives his assent. That power should be enough. I am strongly, therefore, against the blocking power proposed to be vested in the Governor under sub-clause 5. Then there is an emergency provision made in this Bill against which also I wish to raise my voice in protest. The emergency provision in the case of the Governor-General seems to me to be unnecessary. He has got power in the shape of his ordinances and he, acting with his Council, has got the power too, in the shape of his own regulations, lasting for six months, of coping with all emergencies which may arise. Why it is necessary to duplicate this emergency power by further giving him the liberty to set aside the Legislative Assembly and have things suddenly pushed through the Council of State, I cannot see. If there are real emergencies, let him meet them by issuing ordinances and then coming to the Legislative Council for sanction.

Now I want to say a word about the Grand Committee, against which many things have been heard in the course of the evidence. I am, on the whole, inclined to favour the expedient of the Grand Committee. In addition to the reasons already employed, I have to draw the attention of the Joint Committee to what I consider to have been the underlying reason for the devising of this extraordinary expedient. On the face of it it looks somewhat cumbrous and unusual, and it does require, therefore, a somewhat elaborate defence. Lord Sinha asked Sir James Meston whether he did not consider that the Councils of the future would in law really have less power than the Councils at present have, and the answer was in the affirmative. But in order to correct the impression which might be produced, the Secretary of State asked later: "Are not the representatives of the people really gaining in the Grand Committee the power they are losing in the Legislative Councils?" and the answer was "Yes"; but I do hope that the Joint Committee will bear with me while I urge the consideration from a slightly different point of view. One of the great objects of the Montagu-Chelmsford Report was to advance in the Provincial sphere the power enjoyed by the people's representatives in every respect, and not to reduce it in any respect. Now, in the present Legislative Councils a private member has got the power of bringing forward legislative measures on any subject whatsoever, whether it belongs to those which are now called reserved or whether it belongs to the group which is now called transferred. On any subject a member of a Provincial Legislative Council is now at liberty to bring forward a Bill, and so long as he can get the non-official majority to be on his side, which is not certainly inconceivable, he can obtain leave to introduce a Bill, he can push the Bill through all the further stages, and he also enjoys the power of defeating any Bill which the Government may introduce. I quite remember in the Madras Legislative Council years ago the Government bringing forward a Bill and the non-officials—the nominated and the elected members—combining together and refusing leave to the Government. It made a sensation at the time, but we now have got the power of refusing legislation that even the Government may introduce. That power would be lost to us if the subjects were to be divided into transferred and reserved, and the Legislative Councils were to have full power over the transferred but not to have full power over the reserved subjects. That power must be reserved to us according to the dictum of the Joint Report, that we are not to lose anything we have got. The constitution of the Grand Committee is an expedient intended to secure that result. In the Grand Committee under the Joint Report the elected members and the nominated non-official members together would still be in a very considerable majority over the official members, and, therefore, there is preserved this right —it may be academic to a large extent—but a legal right of refusing Government measures as presented to us in the Grand Committee. Any other expedient which has been suggested as an alternative to the Grand Committee would leave us without that right; for example, if the Governor-General in Council or the Secretary of State were to have the power of issuing ordinances to secure Provincial affirmative legislation, and the Assembly refused, we should certainly lose that theoretical power. The Grand Committee secures us in this right, and it seems to me that is one of the considerations which this Joint Committee might remember in dealing with the question whether the Grand Committee is to be retained or not.

Having said so much, I wish to say one word about the composition of the Grand Committee as recently recommended by the Government of India. The Government of India proposes to cut down the strength of the Grand Committee from 40 per cent. of the Legislative Council to about 33 1-3 per cent. on the average. It differs in the case of each Province, but that is about the average. I cannot support this contention that this very important legislation to meet a Provincial need should be put through in Councils which are even smaller than the Provincial Legislative Councils at present.

One question was asked of the witness who sat here before me whether the majority, if only one, of the nominated members was not a very risky expedient for the Governor to rely upon when he wanted certain essential legislation. According to the recommendation of the Government of India, the majority is really not one. The figures show a majority of one, perfectly true, but they seem to me, in their Despatch, to exclude the Governor, and, in other Provinces, some members of the Executive Government, as well. It is not made perfectly clear on a reading of the Government of India's Despatch, whether, when the Grand Committee is constituted, members of the Executive Government shall be nominated to it or not. Apparently it is not intended to nominate them, as they would be ex officio. If they sat ex officio on Grand Committees the strength of the Grand Committees would by that very fact be increased, so that the majority of nominated over elected members would not be one, but really four, and in some cases, perhaps, five; so that there would be no risk whatever of the Government not being able to obtain the legislation they wanted.

Now I come to the Instrument of Instructions, and I request the Joint Committee to bear with me, because this is a very important point, one of the most vital in the whole scheme. The Instrument of Instructions, as drafted, is included at pages 64 and 65 of Volume III. of the Views of the Government of India upon the Reports of Lord Southborough's Committees. I have two or three faults to find with this Instrument of Instructions. In the first place, it is defective in that it conveys to the Governor no instructions whatever as to the circumstances under which he is to exerise some of the most delicate and difficult powers entrusted to him. He is not told when exactly to refuse his assent to the Bills passed by the Legislative Council. He is not told when exactly he is to dismiss a Minister. He is not told when exactly to over-ride the decisions of Ministers. He is not told when exactly he is to resume subjects which Ministers usually administer; and, so far as I can read the Government of India's recent Despatch, he is allowed, even when he has dissolved a Council, and the new Council supports the policy of the old, to go on, with or without Ministers. I consider this to be in many ways a most extraordinary step for the Governor to take. He is displeased with the local Legislative Council; he is displeased with his Minister. He dismisses the Minister, and finds that insufficient; perhaps no other Minister is forthcoming; and then he dissolves his Legislative Council. Practically, in Constitutional parlance, this would mean an appeal to the electors of the country. When he has appealed to the electors of the country, and a new Council comes into being, and that Council endorses the decision of its predecessor, one would expect that the Governor would be instructed definitely to accept the decision of the Council. Any other action on his part which seemed to defy one Council and also another would create almost a civil commotion; and yet it is contemplated by the Report of the Government of India that, even in such a case, the Governor should have the power of carrying on the administration as if there were no transferred subjects and as if there were no Ministers I take it that the Instrument of Instructions must be amended accordingly.

There is one other general observation that I should like to make under this head. In many places the Governor is enjoined specially to safeguard legitimate rights—specially to safeguard the recognised rights and privileges of the services. Now the recognised rights and privileges of the services include what are called legitimate privileges, but meanwhile privileges cease which it is necessary in the public interests to remove. For instance, in some Provinces I know, as a matter of fact, the officials have the privilege of impressing carts and conveyances into the service. This may become in course of time unnecessary, if it is not already unnecessary. I know it is objected to very seriously. Now it is open to the Governor to consider that this was a recognised privilege, and it certainly is a recognised privilege. If when the people attempt to get rid of it on suitable representations, it should be open to the Governor to come down and say, "This is a recognised privilege, and I will safeguard it all I can." It would be using his power in a way in which he could not use it to-day, and I am particularly anxious that the removal of inequalities and privileges and immunities and monopolies, which, in the ordinary course of things, may be removed to-day by well-directed agitation, should not be barred in future merely on account of the Instrument of Instructions structions conveying a general instruction that the Governor shall always safeguard these things. That is no doubt intended, but it should be made clear.

With regard to one clause about educational institutions conducted by missionary bodies, the Instrument of Instructions seems to me to be particularly defective. "The Governor is required "—I am reading XI.—" to secure that the interests of existing educational institutions maintained or controlled by religious bodies are duly protected in the event of any changes of educational policy affecting them adversely." Now this it too wide and too stringent; it will certainly, I think, lend itself to an interpretation which will prevent, for instance, one of the questions in which I have interested myself recently—the introduction of a Conscience Clause into the Education Codes of India. Interpreted stringently, this particular instruction might be used by the Governor to block such introduction. I am perfectly willing to adopt the language which the Southborough Committee on Functions has recommended in this regard. For instance, it says only " to take care that no change of educational policy affecting adversely Government assistance afforded to existing institutions maintained or controlled by religious bodies is adopted without due consideration." That seems to me to be particularly cautious language, free from the danger of any revolutionary change. That ought to be sufficient.

Now I come to the rules. I will only mention four points on the rules which are necessary. I make the complaint that the rules are not appearing there. In the first place I should like a rule made in the conduct of the Legislative Council that matters of urgent public importance could be brought forward without the requisite notice by private members. There is no such provision now, and we have very often suffered from the lack of such a provision. Then the power that is now vested in the Governor of disallowing questions or resolutions is very drastic. He has got the power merely by saying, " I consider this is injurious to the public interests " to bar any questions which might be asked, and to bar any resolutions which might be moved. I know of one Government at least —the Government of Madras—which has used this power in a way to cause widespread dissatisfaction. Tht power, it seems to me, ought no longer to exist. Then the rules for the conduct of the Legislative Council are very often suspended, and it is necessary to suspend them, I will grant, but the power of suspensions must vest in the Council itself and not, as in the case of several Legislative Councils, in the President acting singly. No rules for the conduct of business should be suspended by the act of the President only.

Now I come to the last head that I mentioned, and on this head I will be brief, for reasons which may be obvious—and that is the question of the Brahmin versus non-Brahmin. Yesterday evidence was tendered here which seemed to indicate that the very unfortunate condition of the Panchamas in Madras is in some mysterious way the work of evil-minded Brahmins. I am one of those who think that the Panchamas are in an extremely bad condition, but I may be allowed to point out in the social service that is now being undertaken on a very wide scale in that Province in order expressly to improve the condition of the Panchamas, the Brahmins are taking a most honourable and conspicuous part. The presidents and the working members of nearly every social service institution are Brahmins; Brahmin judges, Brahmin advocates-general, Brahmin barristers, and Brahmin professors take a very active share in this work.

The next point I will mention is with reference to the Varnashrama Dharma Association, of which so much was made. There is a new body which has come into existence within the last twelve or thirteen months in Madras, of which the avowed object is to maintain caste on its present footing, and perhaps also to make it more rigid. I deplore the starting of such an institution. I have nothing to do with it, and I might go further and say that no politician in Madras of any consequence who has borne a share of the work of public agitation in recent years has anything to do with that Association. It is an obscurantist body, which we discountenance. It was wrong to have suggested that many of the members of that body are also political workers, and that the political workers therefore might be generally charged with a desire to bring back ancient institutions of a cramping nature. As a matter of fact, I may state further to this Committee that the Varnashrama Dharma was started partly for the purpose of protesting against a Bill for which I was responsible, which might have interfered with some of the interests of our Province. It is intended really to attack social reformers, to attack all advance in the direction of unifying castes, and we have nothing to do with it; no political worker of any consequence has anything to do with it. Against the proposal to reserve certain seats in plural constituencies to which mixed electorates should elect candidates, the idea was started that the men who actually came out of the election successfully would be those who would not represent the class intended to be represented. To be concrete, if there was an electorate composed partly of Brahmins and partly of non-Brahmins, any non-Brahmin candidate who might be elected by such a mixed electorate would be a person whom the Brahmins had favoured and who was favourable to the Brahmin aspect of things. I venture to think that that view is entirely without foundation. As was pointed out subsequently to the Southborough Franchise Committee, in nearly every constituency the non-Brahmins enjoyed a preponderance of nearly five to one. If, therefore, any non-Brahmin candidate was really elected by this constituency he would come in on the strength of a majority of votes coming from his own community. The Brahmin, being in the very small minority, would contribute very little towards his success. There is no danger, therefore of the successful non-Brahmin being a Brahmin non-Brahmin. I must draw up a rider to this: that, in my own judgment, the increased power is in the hands of people who may be described as Brahmin non-Brahmins or non-Brahmin Brahmins. We want people of that class. We strongly dislike non-Brahmin non-Brahmins and Brahmin Brahmins, people who stand at the opposite extremes and tend to pull the community to pieces. We want people who can take cosmopolitan views, Brahmins who can sympathise with non-Brahmin views and claim to represent them, and non-Brahmins who can claim to sympathise with Brahmin views and claim to represent them. The whole of our future depends upon the way in which we allow mixed electorates to bring forward people who conciliate both sections, and are anxious to take a broad and national view of all public affairs, and bring, therefore, a catholic outlook to bear on the conduct of public affairs. I am, therefore, without the slightest apprehension as to the result of the experiment which will create mixed electorates and give to non-Brahmins the security of a large specific number of seats for their own community. I am all in favour of that expedient. The reason why the Southborough Committee could not recommend this in their Report was that they were not satisfied that that expedient would meet the wishes of the non-Brahmin community. That was all. If we had been assured that that would end the dispute satisfactorily I think the Southborough Committee would not have had any hesitation in recommending that expedient. The only thing I need add under this head is that if such an expedient is finally decided upon the proportion of 30 to 61 seats that the Government of India have recommended does not seem to me to be excessive, and it is a proportion which I should certainly support. The further remarks under this head I will make if I am asked by the Joint Committee in cross-examination, and my friend Mr. Ramachandra Rao is in a position to answer all questions on this head with great personal experience and knowledge.

(Mr. Ramachandra Rao.) May I make a statement, my Lord? In the first place, I will refer to the last point which has been taken by my friend, namely, this question of Brahmin and non-Brahmin. With regard to this matter, the impression conveyed yesterday by the statements made by the Witnesses before your Committee led one to suppose that the non-Brahmins had not in the past been returned adequately to the Legislative Council. I therefore propose to state very briefly to your Lordships' Committee the facts from 1893

as to the number of men who were elected. From 1893 to 1909, when the Minto-Morley reforms came into force, there were seven elective seats in the Madras Legislative Council. One of them was allotted to the University and another to the Chamber of Commerce. With regard to those two seats, they were generally represented by Europeans on behalf of the University and the Chamber of Commerce. There were exceptions with regard to the University, and Sir S. Sivaswamy Aiyr represented the University for some time before 1909. Then we have the Madras Corporation, and with regard to this institution, Mr. Rangayya Naidu, Mr. Theyergarayachty, Desikerchary, Mr. Vakata, Ram Anujulu Naidu, Dr. Nair and T. Rangachary were the representatives from 1893 up to 1918. Of these, Mr. Rangayya Naidu, Mr. Theyergarayachty, Mr. Venkata Ram Anujulu Naidu and Dr. Nair were the non-Brahmins, and the two Brahmins for those sixteen years were Desikerchary and Mr. Rangachary. Mr. Rangachary got into the Council in 1916 with the active support of Dr. Nair himself. With regard to the other representatives to the Council, there were two groups, known as the northern group and the southern group, of the Municipalities and District Boards. There were two representatives of the northern and two of the southern group, one voted for by municipalities and the other by the District Boards. In the northern group we had generally one non-Brahmin representing the District Boards, and the representatives were Mr. Subba pathy Modelyar, Mr. Jambiliger Modelyar and Mr. Kesava Pillai. In the southern group of municipalities and District Boards we had Mr. Ratnasahatpathy Pillai and Mr. Krishnan Nayar, who represented the District Boards continuously for a long time, that is, so far as the state of things from 1893 up till 1909, when the Minto-Morley reforms were introduced, and afterwards we have had several members who were non-Brahmins in the Legislative Council. I can say this with knowledge, because I have been on the Council since 1910. We had Mr. Sambardan, Mr. Shanmugan Pillai, Mr. Modeili, Mr. Chidambaranatha Mudaiyar, Mr. Mappili Nayar, Mr. Kesava Pillai, Mr. Ram Menon, Mr. Kamevasu Naidu, Mr. Venkatapathy, and Mr. Habebulle, who represented a mixed territorial constituency consisting of Hindoos mainly, but they preferred to be represented by a Mohammedan gentleman. I am, therefore, anxious that your Lordships' Committee should see that from 1893 up till 1909—that is the period at which the Minto-Morley reforms were introduced—and after 1909 up to 1916, there were a large number of members who were non-Brahmins in the Legislative Council. The next point I should like in this connection to mention is to give to your Lordships an idea of the electorate which is to be constituted under the new Southborough proposals. I will illustrate it by referring to my own constituency. My constituency consisted of 490 voters in the three districts who were members of local boards and municipalities; they were the principal voters who represented the general population of these districts. They had a system of indirect election, and, under the present arrangement, we are to have eleven members instead of one—four for the one district, four for the second, and three for the third. As regards the voters, they are 20,744 in the one district, 37,576 in the second district, and 25,032 in the third district, making a total of nearly a lakh. This is on the proposal made by the Madras Government, subsequently much enlarged by the Southborough Committee, and I take it that if those recommendations are given effect to the constituency which I represented in the Legislative Council would not have anything less than a lakh and 20,000 voters. We would have eleven members representing them as against one and 490 as against a lakh and 20,000 voters. As regards the proportion of Brahmins in these electorates, your Lordships' Committee will see that the proportions which are indicated on the figures of the Madras Government have been brought out by me in the Memorandum I presented to the Franchise Committee, and in most of the districts this proportion goes as low as 10 and 11 per cent. of the total number of voters. In one of the districts it would amount to 13 per cent.

3925A. You need not give us all that detail?—My point is that whatever members there may have been under the system of indirect election, where the whole body of electors are only 490, as we are to have such a large electorate now by the system of direct election, the number of members should be considerably larger than they ever were before. There is absolutely no conceivable way in which those seats could be rushed by the Brahmins, and any Brahmin who can now get into these constituencies can only get in by the good will of the large majority of non-Brahmins in these districts. I have given these figures with a view to giving you an idea of the new constitution which has been recommended by the Southborough Committee. My Lord, I should also like to say that in the past, as I have already stated, the whole population has been represented both by Brahmin members and by non-Brahmin members. There are various mixed motives with regard to the election of members to the Legislative Council and distinguished service, and generally the character of the candidate has always been one of the main considerations with the electors whether Brahmins or non-Brahmins. This idea of a Brahmin voting for a Brahmin and a non-Brahmin voting for a non-Brahmin has never hitherto predominated except after this agitation in 1917, which was organised after the defeat of three or four candidates in the elections of 1916. A great deal has been said on this question of the Brahmin preponderance on the Madras Legislative Council, but I have already pointed out the state of things until 1909. That I have already placed before your Committee. There were, in 1910, when the new Councils were constituted under the Minto-Morley reforms, six Brahmin members; in the next term there were seven, and in 1916 there were ten. Of these ten two came in uncontested, and in two constituencies there were no non-Brahmin candidates at all. So that for the four constituencies there were no non-Brahmin candidates, and with regard to the fifth, namely, Mr. Rangachary, of the Madras Corporation, he got in by the active support of Dr. Nair himself. So with regard to four of these seats there was no contest by non-Brahmins, and in the fifth Dr. Nair himself put up a candidate who was a Brahmin and assisted him to get into the Council. The point I should like to place before your Lordships is as to whether anybody who appeared before your Lordships' Committee or anybody else is able to point out to us who have been doing public work in Madras whether we have done anything in the course of these ten years in the Legislative Council to the detriment of non-Brahmins or to the detriment of any particular community in Madras, and in order to elucidate the point I have placed before your Lordships' Committee a summary of the work of the Madras Legislative Council for the last ten years. I invite the attention of members of your Committee to that summary, which is fairly exhaustive, of the activities of the Madras Legislative Council, and from that the members will be pleased to see that most of the work of the Council—it begins at page 13—consisted of questions which were of vital interest to the ryot population, and in several respects we tried to improve the economic position of the ryots as well as to improve the position of the other classes. I invite your attention specially to page 26, where the questions arising with regard to the depressed classes have been dealt with, and where the activities of the Council for the amelioration of the social conditions of the poorer classes has occupied the attention of the members of the Council. I claim, on behalf of the members—more especially the Brahmin members—that we did our level best to initiate a new policy, even against the wishes of the Madras Government, who in several respects opposed this, having regard to financial and other general considerations. My Lord, I only wish to say that there are other considerations which apply to this question. If you introduce this system of communal electorates, what is to become of our District Boards and Municipalities? For the last thirty-five years we have been working side by side in our important District Boards and with the Municipalities, without the system of communal representation, and the moment it is conceded for Legislative Council elections, I am certain that in the field of local self-government there would be a great many complaints which would arise by the demand for communal electorates, torates, and it would result in the homogeneity of the present system being disturbed. I do not wish to dilate further on this matter; but I am prepared, with reference to the statements made by a witness here yesterday, to answer any questions so as to throw as much light on this question as I possibly can, to the satisfaction, I expect, of your Committee.

There is only one word I should like to state, as something has been said about the influence of the Brahmin officials. I beg leave to state that, during the last ten years not a single petition has been presented under the Election Rules to set aside any election on the ground of undue influence of the official class, or anybody else, and that is a circumstance which has to be borne in mind with regard to this matter.

I have a few observations to make on the text of the Bill, if you will permit me to do so.

3926. I want you to be as brief as you can?—I will be as brief as possible. With regard to the powers of legislation conferred by this Bill, Sir James Meston stated, with regard to the matter of Hindoo and Mohammedan law, that he would like to see this made the subject of Central legislation. I am one of those who hold, in this matter of the reform of Hindoo and Mohammedan law, that the Provinces should have the widest possible freedom, and any attempt to curtail their activities by previous sanction of the Government of India is detrimental to the best interests of social legislation as well as legislative reform. There are many questions with regard to Hindoo law especially; we have the Mithakshare law in Madras, the Mayugha law in Bombay, and the Duyabhega law in Bengal, and there are many questions of Hindoo law which require legislative action. The question of legislative activity is also bound up with the question of the public opinion of the Provinces. The public opinion, as well as legislative opinion, varies, and I therefore think that, in order to give liberty to the Provinces, to undertake necessary legislation for the reform of Hindoo law will be a step in the right direction. I may say that in Madras we have already moved in this direction, and the Act which was placed on the Statute Book to get over the decision of the Privy Council known as the Tagore case, has resulted in drawing public attention to the subject and inducing one of the members of the Imperial Legislative Council to take it up. With regard to another branch of Hindoo law, I introduced a Bill four years ago, which was supported by the Madras Government, by the High Court, and by the public opinion of the Province, but it is still being hung up for want of the sanction of the Government of India. Therefore, I ask for the utmost liberty in undertaking this reform. I have prepared in regard to the statutory rules a note which I placed before the members of your Committee, and to that I invite the attention of the Committee. I make it part of my evidence now because I shall be glad to answer any questions in elucidation of the facts which are mentioned in that note. The chief point I should like to urge with regard to the Legislative rules is that so far as the composition of the Legislature is concerned, they should be set free to undertake supplementary legislation for the modification of any regulations which may be framed with regard to the composition and qualifications of members as well as other things. This Bill is obviously a Bill for conferring self-government, and that being so, it seems to be rather hard that the Legislature should be tied down by outside regulations in the matter of the composition of the Legislative Councils in regard to questions relating to qualifications, in regard to the increase in number of the members of the Council, and as to the matter I have stated in this note, I trust, the facts being stated, it will induce your Lordships' Committee to recommend this power, namely, the power of modification of any regulations which may be made at the present time. I may say, with reference to the Rules Business, that is the next head I have in this note. I have also prepared another note on Budget procedure which I have circulated to the members of your Committee, and I trust that the points therein stated will receive your attention, and in further elucidation with regard to these points I am prepared to answer questions.

Chairman—continued.

Then there are only two other subjects I should like to press upon your attention, and one is the question of transferring Land Revenue from Madras, with regard to which I shall be able to say a great deal if necessary, and the other is as to transferring the subject of Provincial Services to the control of the Minister, which is not contained in the recommendations of the Functions Committee. I have also to add that with reference to the Provincial Railway policy there is no foundation in the Note of the Government of India that it would be detrimental to the interests of the Provinces. I strongly support the suggestion that the Provinces should be in a position to initiate Provincial Railway policy for the development of light or feeder railways. We in Madras have suffered greatly in that matter. We have now 350 lahs collected from ratepayers, which is now lying idle without any schemes for railway construction and without any possibility of such schemes being furthered. All this has arisen on account of the obstructive attitude of the railway companies, over whom the Provincial Governments have no control, with regard to the attitude of the Railway Board. I think, in the interests of the future welfare of the Provinces, it is absolutely necessary that the Provincial Governments should have a considerable voice in the railway administration of the Provinces, and it is somewhat curious—and it has struck a great many people as somewhat curious—that the whole administration of railways should now be carried on by a central authority in India—namely, the Railway Board. This is the old question of the evils of the centralised system. I do not wish to underrate the importance of a general control, but it ought to be subject to all reasonable limitations. The Provincial Governments should have influence over the railway administration with regard to third-class passengers, platforms, and many other things which have arisen during many years past, and which have been ventilated in the Provincial Councils without success. In all these matters I think there would be greater contentment if the Provinces were allowed to deal with these matters and set free to pursue their own line with regard to them.

Major Ormsby-Gore.

3927. Mr. Sastri, you have been in public life in Madras or the Government of India for many years?—(Mr. Sastri.) Yes.

3928. How many contested elections have you had to have, in one form or another?—On the Madras Council I was a nominated member. I had a contest one time, when I competed for the Indian Legislative Council. We had then, as a matter of fact, six people contesting two vacancies. One candidate was Dr. Nair, and he was defeated in that election.

3929. Was that in the city of Madras?—The constituents consist of the non-official members of the Provincial Legislative Council. The election took place in the city of Madras, but the electors came from different parts.

3930. Were both the persons elected out of the six Brahmins?—Yes.

3931. How many of the voters would you say were Brahmins, and how many non-Brahmins?—I cannot say exactly. I cannot say at once what the figures were, but I think there were more Brahmins than non-Brahmins—perhaps one or two more, that is all.

3932. Therefore, the experience of the elections of the past, with a very limited Franchise, is nothing to go by, looking to the enormous increase in the Franchise now proposed?—Nothing whatever. On the contrary, if I may disclose some of the facts of the election, it was the majority of the non-Brahmin votes which sent me up, and Dr. Nair had perhaps more Brahmin votes than non-Brahmin votes.

3933. You spoke, in connection with this controversy which we have heard so much about, of certain organisations for social service in India?—Yes.

3934. Are you referring to a body like the Servants of India?—Not only to the Servants of India, but there are branches in several places, and a good many Social Service

Service Leagues have been started for the express purpose of ameliorating the condition of the poorest classes, among whom the Panchamas are the chief in point of number. They exist all over the Presidency, and a very large number of them are to be found actively working in the City of Madras. The great majority of these workers are Brahmins of the higher class.

3935. Brahmins of the higher class do not nowadays perform these social services actually in the districts where these Panchamas live?—Not at all. I myself have been in the Panchama dwellings and have examined into their condtion and resources.

Chairman.

3936. You mean, Mr. Sastri, that there are Brahmins who take up that work, but you would not say that all do?—I do not say that all Brahmins do; but amongst the workers the very considerable majority are Brahmins.

Major Ormsby-Gore.

3937. All the Brahmins who take part in political life, or the vast majority of them, behave as you do—that is to say, they are not so rigid as some Brahmins in regard to social service?—I can only say that I am by no means exceptional.

3938. To go to quite another question, you spoke in your opening statements of the liberalization of the Government of India: could you give me something a little more in detail, especially after the evidence we have had from Mr. Jinnah this afternoon, as to what you have in your mind with regard to the liberalization of the Central Government?—I mean that some Departments, however few and however unimportant to the control of the Legislative Assembly, ought to be administered by a Minister.

3939. You think that at the outset it is a feasible suggestion to introduce diarchy in the Central Government?—I think it is feasible.

3940. If you take the list of All-India subjects as proposed by the Feetham Report, which I understand you accept as the list of All-India subjects, and if you take out the Navy, the Army and foreign policy, and the relation with other States, all those subjects which were reserved even by Mr. Jinnah, and the subjects like railways, which are bound up very largely with the problem of finance, do you not leave only certain technical services, such as survey and archæology and things of that kind in the hands of the Central Government? There are practically no important subjects in the All-India lists which are suitable for transfer?—I was not thinking particularly of any very important subjects; even if they were unimportant, I should like the principle of responsibility in the Government of India recognised at the very start—I have mentioned the subject of the salt revenue; I have mentioned the subject of income-tax and general stamps as probably subjects which might suitably be transferred, but there is in Sir James Brunyate's dissentient Minute to the Crewe Committee Report a further list of subjects which seem to me to be fit for transfer.

3941. You would ask this Committee to consider the proposed division of All-India subjects contained in Sir James Brunyate's Minute of Dissent to the Crewe Committee Report?—Yes.

3942. Otherwise they are largely subjects of revenue, the subjects which you contemplate the transfer of. Is not that the case?—Not so much the transfer, but the working from the start.

3943. What generally are to be the powers of the Indian Legislative Assembly over the revenue and expenditure? Would you not say that the liberalization of the Central Government of India meant increasing the powers of the Legislative Assembly of India in finance?—I think so; I think the problem might be so stated.

3944. That would be almost equivalent to liberalizing the Central Government?—Yes, it would be.

3945. If you will come to another question, you said you atttched great importance to the Legislative Assembly of India and to the Legislative Councils of the Provinces selecting their own Presidents and Vice-Presidents—that is to say, in no case do you want an official?—Exactly.

3946. Who presides over the Legislative Council—the Governor General?—The Governor General in person.

3947. You wish that to cease?—Yes, in the case of the Legislative Council, but not in the case of the Council of State.

3948. In the Provinces I understand it is proposed that the Governor should preside at the Legislative Council; you think that is a mistake?—I think that is a serious mistake.

3949. You would think that neither the Governor nor a nominee of the Governor should preside in the Provincial Legislative Council?—That is so.

3950. You think that you would have men elected to the Legislative Council who would have sufficient past experience of deliberative assemblies to preside over them in the first instance?—I would not say that the men should have experience of presiding over a deliberative assembly, because that would be impossible.

3951. Well, of the working of them?—And so would it be impossible to find officials to answer that description.

3952. Now you were on Lord Southborough's Franchise Committee?—I was.

3953. What view do you personally take on the women suffrage question?—I do not wish to differ on that matter from my Committee, having signed the Report, but I did think at the time of signing it, although there were great considerations in favour of the women's suffrage, that it would not be wise at the very beginning to take a step for which, as I estimated the demand, there was not sufficient demand at the time.

3954. Your experience being mostly in Madras, do you think the demand varies a great deal in different parts of India?—It does; and in the case of Bombay, perhaps, it is most pronounced. Perhaps Madras comes next, or perhaps Bengal comes next, and then Madras, and it goes down in the other Provinces.

3955. Do you see any real objection to having a different Franchise in one Province as against another?—You mean in respect of this particular question?

3956. Yes?—I do see serious difficulty. It might lead to invidious distinctions, and disputes might spring up, and in my judgment it is not necessary at all to make any discrimination. After all, even in Bombay the women's suffrage, if granted, would be taken advantage of by only a small section. It may be that if in Bombay one hundred women took advantage of the privilege, in Madras only fifty or sixty might take advantage of it; but the particular circumstances need not necessarily lead to giving the Franchise in Bombay and denying it in Madras.

3957. Another Franchise question: Did you hear Mr. Wadia's evidence with regard to the possible enfranchisement of factory workers?—I am very sorry I was not here at the time.

3958. Do you think it would be possible, in view of the possibility of the rise of industrialism in India, and the labour problems which this tends to bring with it, in certain towns in India, to create a special Franchise for factory workers?—I generally endorse the opinions on that subject advanced before the Joint Committee by Sir Frank Sly. I think, for the next few years, it is not necessary to create any special Franchise. At the next opportunity the necessary steps might be taken in this direction.

3959. You are one of those who are pressing for fiscal reforms, as we used to call them in this country, for India as a whole?—I am.

3960. In order to develop the taxable capacity of India, by encouraging local manufactures?—Quite so.

3961. That operation will considerably increase the industrial classes?—It will; but it is not a fact that has yet emerged into practical politics, and it may well wait.

3962. You think it can wait for ten years, until the next review by the Parliamentary Commission?—I think it can; I was thinking about fiscal autonomy in connection connection with the question of enfranchisement of industrial workers.

3963. One question, now, about the Feetham Report. We had evidence just now that the Government of Bombay favours the transfer of land revenue. What is the attitude of the Government of Madras, do you know, with regard to the possibility of transfer of land revenues?—I think it is strongly against it.

3964. Do you, personally, think that there would be considerable practical difficulty at this stage of the Land Revenue Legislation for transferring it in Madras?—I do not think so at all.

3965. You would be in favour of transferring land revenue in Madras?—I should be in favour, but I am not pressing for that at this particular juncture.

3966. I see in your remarks, in reply to questions with regard to your comments on the Crewe Committee, you attach considerable importance to and have emphasized the desirability of the proposed Select Committee on Indian affairs?—Select Committee of the House of Commons.

3967. You wish to confine it to the House of Commons?—Yes; I wish it confined to the House of Commons.

3968. You think that Indian opinion, generally, is in favour of its being limited to the House of Commons?—I think, so far as I have been able to judge of it, that is so 3969. What do you think educated Indian opinion considers that Committee will do?—It has great hopes, I must say, that the Select Committee will practically be equivalent to a revival of the periodical inquiry that we used to have into Indian affairs before the Crown took over the administration. Perhaps that hope is doomed to disappointment. This proposal is the lineal successor of a series of proposals we have had for a restoration of that periodical inquiry which used to be thorough, and led to good results. Perhaps in these days the Select Committee of the House of Commons which the Crewe Committee contemplates may not yield those particular results, but I do think it is a step in advance, and I should like it on the whole.

3970. Do you think that it could in any way do some of the work which the Council has hitherto done with regard to finance?—I am not intimately acquainted with the actual work of the Secretary of State's Council. Judging from a great distance, I have never been a great believer in that Council. Although it has had the power of controlling the expenditure of Indian revenues, I do not think that there is a record of any conspicuous instances of the use of that power in the directions that we should desire. I therefore view with perfect equanimity the disappearance of that Council.

3972. It would review the past Acts of the Government of India. Is that your idea, or that it should in any way influence future policy?—Our original idea was that the Select Committee should have power even to interrogate the Secretary of State, and ask him to make statements about affairs as they were taking shape in India. For instance, were a Government in collision with this Legislature, the matter would first be represented to the Select Committee of the House of Commons before the decision was actually taken as to how to deal with it by the Secretary of State. But I am by no means certain now that that idea is still kept in view. It has perhaps receded.

3973. May I put this difficulty: That, as responsibility increases, and so-called liberalisation takes place in India, do you not think it would be very difficult for a Secretary of State, who would have to obey a majority of a Select Committee of that kind here, to enforce the wishes of that Committee of the House of Commons, either on a Provincial Government or on the Government of India; because if you have a Committee of the House of Commons I presume you must let it vote and decide by a majority—I am sure that would lead to a difficulty; but are we not really confining this Select Committee of the House of Commons to an examination of those matters in respect of which the local Legislative Council has not yet been endowed with power?

3974. That is to say, you would limit its functions?—Yes.

Mr. Bennett.] Could you give us a little further exposition of the work that has been done by societies, like the "Servants of India," for instance; have not they great religious fairs?

Chairman.] Do you think that bears very closely on our work?

Mr. Bennett.] It is with regard to the social work which is being done, and the bringing together of all classes.

Chairman.] There are so many extraordinarily interesting things in India which we cannot touch.

Mr. Bennett.

3975. You know, further, that in the Deccan just now there is at work a league called the anti-Untouchability League?—Yes.

3976. Is that characteristic of the new attitude of the upper classes—the educated classes—in India, or a considerable portion of them, towards the lower classes and the depressed classes, of whom we heard so much yesterday?—It is; and it is one of those things which bear the greatest promise for the future.

3977. You referred to the desire to put the election of Presidents in the hands of the Legislature. Do you attach much importance to that?—I attach very considerable importance to that, because if there were a permanent official presiding over a Legislative Assembly with popular traditions I foresee a time when every time the President takes his seat and gives a ruling an atmosphere of hostility might be generated, and the whole House will have to conduct its proceedings in a very unpromising environment.

3978. What kind of training or preparations or experience for that post do you look upon as possible in India?—Where would you look for your men?—Among the members of the Legislative Council. I would look for a man who had taken part in practical affairs, and perhaps had also either administered or practised the law for a number of years—I would look for such a man.

3979. Would you regard a district officer who had had some years' experience in presiding over district boards as a man qualified by his experience for such a post?—Not at all. All his experience would have been gathered at Boards of people with Executive business to transact, and he would be out of sympathy altogether with the proceedings of a body which settled matters by continuous and thorough discussion. A man who thinks that despatch and quick decision is the essence of business is not likely to be a person who will be the most safe guide of the deliberations of a popular Assembly.

3980. You make a reference to practice in other countries, I think. What is the prevailing practice?—What I was thinking of was the Presidency of the Representative Assembly in America or the popular Assembly in the German Constitution, or the popular Assembly in the Japanese Constitution, or in France. We never hear of the head of a Government sitting and presiding over the deliberations of these popular Houses.

3981. But in some countries is it not the case that the Crown nominates the President of the Assembly?—Not of the Assembly.

3982. Of the Legislature?—Where the reigning monarch does not himself preside over the Upper House he has his own nominee for that House.

3983. How would you regard a practice which prevails in some countries of the Chamber providing a panel of three or four members, and submitting that to the head of the Government?—As a first measure it is worth consideration.

3984. You would look upon that with favour?—Yes.

Mr. Bennett—continued.

3985. You refer to a passage in the Instructions to Governors about the Conscience Clause in schools. That is rather important. Would you tell us exactly how that stands? What is the exact ground of your objection to that, because I did not quite understand it?—What I meant was this. I will make a statement which may take me three or four minutes.

3986. I hope not more?—The introduction of a Conscience Clause in our Education Code is a matter——

Chairman.] What is the point?

Mr. Bennett.] The point is, the instructions of the Government are, in Mr. Sastri's view, defective, in so far as they say that the Governor is required to secure that the interests of existing education establishments managed or controlled by religious bodies are duly protected. One gets rather anxious when one learns that Mr. Sastri is not satisfied with that. I think it is a very important point that the interests of educational institutions managed by religious bodies should be duly protected.

Chairman.

3987. Will it take some time, because, if so, I would prefer a Memorandum on the subject?—It may take me three or four minutes. I have already stated that I prefer the formula which the Feetham Committee recommend in that regard. You have read the recommendation of the Government of India on the subject, which goes too far, and is framed in very stringent language.

Mr. Bennett.

3988. Perhaps it will be sufficient if we refer to that?—I am quite prepared to submit a memorandum on the subject. (See Appendix P.)

3989. I will leave that to the Chairman?—If the Chairman will allow me to do so, I will.

Mr. Acland.

3990. I asked Mr. Reddi yesterday a question on the vexed difference of opinion with regard to communal representation for the non-Brahmins, and I realise, of course, that we should not be able to arrive at a general agreement in anything that we recommend at the present time. But my question tended to suggest that the differences and difficulties which now, unfortunately, exist might tend to disappear in the course of time better if Brahmin and non-Brahmin throw in their lot together than if there is a separate representation. Can you make any comment bearing upon that one way or the other?—I quite agree with the suggestion contained in your question that separate representation by means of separate electorates would really act as a bar towards that union in political affairs which we consider is the necessary condition of a good future for India. But if the non-Brahmins could be brought into line with the political development only if suficient safeguards were introduced into the Constitution, I am prepared, as a compromise, to consider the suggestion of a certain proportion of the seats in plural constituencies being reserved for them. I am only suggesting it as a compromise, if it proves satisfactory to all the parties concerned.

3991. You would be willing to go so far in recognising the special interests of the non-Brahmins as an accepted compromise?—Yes; I would be willing to go so far to respect their feelings and their wishes.

3992. On the whole, do you agree with the view which I suggested in the course of argument, that probably in the long run the difficulties and differences would tend to disappear rather by a common system of election than by a separate system?—Certainly; that is the best way of looking at it. That is how it appeals to me, decidedly.

3993. I had the disadvantage of being away during some portion of your evidence, and I only propose to ask you one question following on what Mr. Acland asked—I do not know if you have answered it already—about communal representation. Is it the fact that this agitation with regard to separate electorates for non-Brahmins in Madras is of recent origin?—Quite recent origin.

3994. The question was raised by the Madras Government, was it not, at the time of the Morley-Minto reforms when the first Councils commenced under that?—Yes.

3995. Do you yourself know as to what the opinion was then of the leaders of the non-Brahmin section?—I know they objected strongly to it.

3996. They objected strongly to their being separately represented?—Yes.

3997. And, amongst others, the Maharajah of Venkatagiri, who was President of the Madras Landholders' Association; the Maharajah of Bobbili, who was afterwards a member of the Madras Executive Council; the Rajah of Kollengode and the Honourable Mr. Krishna Nair, who afterwards became the Dewan of Travancore, all strongly objected to separate electorates?—Yes.

3998. And they are all leaders of the non-Brahmin community?—They are.

3999. The Madras Board of Revenue also strongly objected?—Yes.

4000. And considered that it would have most untoward consequences?—That is so.

4001. And afterwards practically all the non-Brahmin zemindars, big rulers like the Rajah of Pittapur and the Rajah of Karupam and so on, all objected to being separated from the rest of the community, and the Madras Government, on considering all those opinions, abandoned the scheme for communal electorates?—That is exactly so.

4002. And I believe on the last occasion, when the matter was being considered by the Madras Government, and there was a Franchise Committee appointed, Mr. Ramachandra Rao served on that Committee?—(Mr. Ramachandra Rao.) Yes. It was a preliminary conference called by the Madras Government just before the arrival of the Franchise Committee to frame their proposals.

4003. To consider the proposals from Madras?—Yes.

4004. The Madras Government convened the conference?—Yes.

4005. You took part in that?—Yes.

4006. And there all these opinions of the non-Brahmin leaders were brought forward?—I think so.

4007. And you yourself put in a Memorandum?—I did.

4008. Have you got a copy of the Memorandum to give the Chairman?—Yes, I have a copy of it. I will give it to the Chairman at the end of my evidence. (See Appendix L.) I wish it to be placed on the record this Memorandum was before the Madras Government when it framed its own proposals.

4009. And it is only since 1916 that the movement for separate electorates has been started?—Yes, that is so.

4010. And all the non-Brahmin leaders have throughout been taking part in the National Congress?—Several of them. Dr. Nair was in the Congress.

4011. He was himself a very prominent member?—Yes; and Mr. Reddi was in the Congress in 1916, when these Reform School proposals came up for consideration, and when the Congress League scheme was passed in Lucknow he was there.

4012. This was in December, 1916?—Yes.

4013. Up to that time there had been no question of separate electorates or communal electorates for non-Brahmins in Madras?—Certainly not.

4014. Is it a fact that the non-Brahmins of Madras are a homogeneous body or do they consist of various castes differing from each other?—If I may draw your attention to the Memorandum to which you referred your Lordship will find 36 Tamilas castes and 40 Telingus castes, which are homogeneous, which do not intermarry and do not interdine, and there is no reason why they should be regarded as a homogeneous community for the purpose of elections, and the Brahmins alone should be separated from this category. The Kshatriyas, the fighting class, are not interested in this demand.

4015. We heard something about the Brahmins not having tried to help in the war and only the non-Brahmins having done so. Is that a fact?—It is a most unfounded allegation. I may say that in Madras, first of all taking the recruiting for the Indian Defence fence Force, a Brahmin, Sir P. Swaivaryaiyr, was the President of a Committee to encourage recruitment, and several of us were members, which was organised with the intention of securing the recruiting of students. Madras was one of the first in India. The largest number of persons recruited from any single caste was from Brahmin caste.

4016. It was a University Corps, was it?—No, they were recruited on the Indian Defence Corps. Of the others, five of the prominent men in Madras—Brahmins—were invited to the Delhi Conference for war work by his Excellency the Viceroy, and they did considerable work of organisation and they have served on the Committees. Two of them are here. In the Province itself considerable work was also done in the District Committees by Brahmins and also in the Provincial Committees. As regards recruitment, some of the recruiting officers employed by the Government were Brahmins, and in the District Committees some of the influential men who served were also Brahmins. I served on the Committee of my District.

4017. They took their proper share?—Undoubtedly, not only by actual work in recruitment, but also by contributing to the various funds in connection with the war.

Mr. Montagu.

4018. In the Joint Report, page 200, paragraph 246, you will find this: "We believe emphatically that redistributions of Provincial areas cannot be imposed upon the people by official action, and that such a process ought in any case to follow and neither to precede nor accompany constitutional reform. But we are bound to indicate our own clear opinion that wherever such redistributions are necessary and can be effected by process of consent the attempt to do so should be made." And at the end: "In Orissa and Berar, at all events, it seems to us that the possibility of instituting sub-Provinces need not be excluded from consideration at a very early date." I draw your attention to those extracts because you said in your evidence that you did not understand the relation of Clause 12 of the Bill to the Report. May I ask you whether your objection to that clause would disappear if the same words were added to it to insure that the action should not be taken, except after consulting the Legislative Council?—(Mr. Sastri.) That is one thing. Then there must also be some guarantee that the constitution under which the separate Governments will work would not be less advanced than the combined one out of which they are formed.

4019. Now, if I may go to Clause 20 of the Bill, Subsection 4, you dislike intensely the formula "Essential for the safety, tranquility or interests of British India or any part thereof." You said they were very wide words?—Yes.

4020. I think I am quoting you correctly in saying that any Bill that the Government of India brought forward they could claim was in the interests of British India or any part thereof; but surely they could not claim of any Bill that it was essential to the interests of British India or any part thereof, could they?—Certainly. The work of legislation is so difficult that unless it was felt in some degree essential people would not put themselves to the trouble of formulating Legislative proposals and inviting public criticism.

4021. Do you think that is so? Then let me ask this question. I think this question was asked of another witness before. What do you anticipate would be the position of a Governor-General—you do not want him to certificate a thing unless it is necessary for safety or tranquility—if he introduced a Bill which he believes to be essential in the interests of British India, and it is thrown out? He must not certificate it to the Council of State, according to your view, because it is not necessary for safety or tranquility. Is he to continue in office, or would you expect him to resign?—I should not expect him necessarily to resign.

4022. Then you would expect him to go on, responsible for the interests of British India, although he could not get the legislation essential in his opinion in the interests of British India?—You eliminate the words "interests of British India or any part thereof"?

4023. If you eliminate those words?—Then he should be persuaded that it is not essential to the interests of British India. He has had the benefit of a discussion in the Legislative Assembly which takes a different view from his. I expect, as a reasonable man, he will see that that was a more sensible view, perhaps.

4024. If you were Governor-General of India, would you go on with the enormous responsibilities of that office if you could not persuade yourself to agree with the Legislative Council on something that you regarded as essential?—On something which I regarded as essential?

4025. Yes?—Essential to safety and tranquility?

4026. No, to the interests of British India. I may be tempted to argue with you, but I will not?—The Crewe Committee themselves recommend that these words are too wide, and they would like the substitution of the formula "peace, order and good government." I should be inclined to support that suggestion.

4027. You would prefer "peace, order and good government" to "safety, tranquility or interests"?—Or "general interests," yes. That is the second alternative.

4028. That is what I want. On the subject of exclusion of revenue from the Budget discussion, you point out that Clause 9 of the Bill deals only with expenditure and not with revenue. We have always to remember that in this country we are dealing with a situation in which the Provincial revenue is mainly derived from land revenue and excise, which do not depend upon any statutory action. I think I am right there?—Yes.

4029. But there is nothing in this Bill which would prevent, on some future occasion, the Legislative Council passing a Statute to make its revenue annual or to make its revenue included in Bills? Such a Bill would be subject to the veto; but, supposing that happened, is not the real remedy not to make revenue part of the Budget, but to make revenue, as it is in this country, dependent upon Statutes and Acts?—That would be the real thing. Yes, I should be in favour of it.

4030. When the Governor certificates, you want the appeal kept. The appeal, you recollect, was only to be on the question of fact?—Yes.

4031. Would it not be sufficient to have the power of disallowing a Bill still vested either in the Government of India or in the Secretary of State or in His Majesty? Do you really attach importance to delaying matters of appeal as to fact?—It is an appeal on a small matter, but an acute feeling on the part of the Legislative Council might be immediately allayed. Where the Legislative Council felt that a wrong certificate had been given by a Governor in order to curtail its activity an immediate and prompt decision by the Governor-General in Council might probably clear the atmosphere one way or the other.

4032. With regard to Clause 9 (5), I do not quite understand you. You do not want the power to block Bills left in?—That is so.

4033. This point also arises: Supposing it is not the intention of a Governor or the Governor-General to refuse his assent to a Bill when it goes through, but supposing he is quite prepared to accept it and not to refuse his assent, provided certain amendments are made in it, and therefore he wishes it sent to the Grand Committee where he has a better chance, rather than lose it altogether, the Sub-clause (5) gives him power either to block it or send it to the Grand Committee. Do you object to the retention of power to send it to the Grand Committee?—No, I only object to the blocking power, which is new to the constitution.

4034. I think you said you protested against the fact that the rules were not before you?—Perhaps I used the word, yes.

4035. You realise that under this Bill such rules as are to be made are to be made by the Governor-General in Council?—I am under a difficulty in stating my case. It is really so under the Bill, but we are objecting to the Bill in that regard. We think the Bill leaves too much to the rules, so that the real scope of the reforms will be unascertained under the Bill until it has become an Act, and the rules of the Government of India come in. We want to know what those rules will be like, so that we might ask that some of them should be put in the Bill or some of them altered.

4036. If they remain rules the rules cannot be made till after the Act is passed?—No. We therefore want a draft so that nothing is settled now. When the draft came and we examined it, and we thought that certain portions could with advantage be put into the Bill, we could make such a representation to the Joint Committee.

4037. But cannot you suggest to the Committee yourself the things you want put into the Bill?—I have suggested one or two things.

4038. That removes your objection if those things were granted?—Not altogether.

4039. With regard to land revenue, I think you said that you did not press for the transfer of land revenue in Madras at this stage. Would you suggest that land revenue would be a more suitable subject to transfer if something like Sir Sankaran Nair's suggestion had been adopted first. You remember he talked about a statutory enactment?—Land revenue being placed on a statutory basis?

4040. Yes?—There is nothing in the idea to which I am opposed; but I do not see how it is a necessary preliminary to the transfer of land revenue.

Lord Sydenham.

4041. In a Memorandum which has been laid before us you are quoted as using these words: "It is unusual to make special arrangements for the protection of an immense and overwhelming majority; but it is also unusual for a numerically small class to enjoy a decisive ascendency over most other classes in culture and social and political influence"?—Yes.

4043. You could not have described the basic conditions of India—and especially of Madras—more accurately than in those words. Is it not the fact that those conditions do not exist in any other country in the world?—I have said so. I have said it is very unusual.

4044. Would not you admit that they are unique?—Yes, in some ways they are.

4045. They arise from customs which have been ingrained in India for 2,000 or 3,000 years?—That is so.

4046. Do you agree that if what you have called this decisive ascendency is continued or extended by the operations of this Bill the first principles of democracy would be violated?—Quite so; but I do not agree to the condition. This Bill is not likely to perpetuate that ascendency.

4047. I put it quite conditionally: if you perpetuated or extended it, you would agree that it would violate the principle of democracy, would you not?—Yes.

4048. You say some way must be found for overcoming this decisive ascendancy? Do you propose to fix a maximum for the little Brahmin minority?—That was my first idea as a possible solution, but I find that most of my countrymen would prefer, if they were driven to it, the other alternative of reserving a certain number for the non-Brahmin community out of plural constituencies, and as the two work towards the same result I do not see much difference.

4049. You would rather reserve seats for non-Brahmins than limit the number of Brahmin seats?—We find that plan to be more generally acceptable.

4050. You think either of those plans would be better than any form of communal representation, which you oppose?—Decidedly.

4051. Did you hear the evidence of Mr. Samarth?—Yes, I was here.

4052. Would you also say that if you do not get what you want in the Bill there would be an agitation throughout India which would stagger imagination?—Perhaps I should not have used such language.

4053. Do you think it is really wise to make threats of that kind?—I would prefer not to be asked to answer that question.

4054. You do realise what this great agitation throughout India would mean—where the people are so ignorant and so easily excited? They always lead, do they not, to the loss of quite harmless lives? Is not that the invariable experience?—It is by no means an invariable experience.

4055. It is fairly common experience?—It occurs now and then. Probably in England it occurs also.

4056. We have been told that the Home Rule League has a rule prohibiting students from having anything to do with it. Have students been made use of for political purposes in Madras or not?—Not to my knowledge.

4057. You have never heard of it being done?—I have heard of it being done, but I do not think there is truth in it.

4058. It has not come to your knowledge. Now, you are president of the "Servants of India Society"?—I am.

4059. I took a great interest in that Society in its early days, and Mr. Gokhale assured me more than once it would never become a political body. Can it be said it is a non-political body now?—I am not aware that at any time Mr. Gokhale intended it to be a non-political body.

4060. He told me so more than once. Is it a political or a non-political body now?—It is a political body. It was a political body from its very inception.

4061. That is not what was explained to me. Now, you are going to put in a Memorandum of your views as to conscience clauses?—May I say a word about that last point? I was present when your Lordship visited the Servants of India Society. Mr. Gokhale was there, and I had the honour of taking tea with you.

4062. I remember?—I think at that time a conversation took place which pointed to the fact that we were all studying political questions and administrative questions with a view to their being agitated. I remember discussing with your Lordship at that time the report of the Police Service Commission, which had recently been issued. I remember discussing it with some particularity.

4063. I quite understood the subject was being studied, but I also understood certainly that the Servants of India was never to be made a political body?—Your Lordship made a present of several books to the library. I hope you went over the list of the library books. It was a strongly political library that we had.

4064. I do not remember giving political books. You said you were going to put in a Memorandum about the Conscience Clause?—Yes.

4065. Did you graduate at the Madras Christian College?—No, I came out of the Kumbakonam College. It was a Government college.

4066. Were you at one time before you embarked on a political career the headmaster of a school?—I was.

4067. In those days did you admit Panchamas to your school?—No, we did not admit Panchamas to the school. I was the headmaster, but I was not the manager. During my headmastership several applications were made from Indian Christians and Mohammedans to be admitted to the school, and, although I personally recommended it, the management would not listen.

4068. Then you were personally willing?—I was personally perfectly willing.

Mr. Montagu.

4069. May we know what the management was at the school?—It was a Hindoo high school.

4070. Managed by private individuals?—Yes, intended specially for caste Hindoos.

Chairman.

4071. I want to ask a question about this communal vote. Your principal reason for objecting to communal representation is that it retards the blending of castes and classes?—I am not one of those who look forward to the blending of castes or to the elimination of caste boundaries. That may or may not be possible. But I am certainly looking forward to the softening of those distinctions and acerbities until all communities learn to regard themselves as harmonius parts of one people—of one political people. More than that I am not prepared to say with regard to the future of the caste system.

Chairman—continued.

4072. Is it not rather strange, as has been represented to us several times in evidence, that the co-operation of Hindoos and Mussulmans has become much more cordial and general since the Lucknow Compact?—That is a fact; but I am not prepared to say that the entire explanation is to be found in the Lucknow Compact itself. Very possibly a great deal of explanation is to be found in the circumstance that Hindoos and Mohammedans have had many over-mastering causes for acting together, quite apart from the removal of the cause of difference that the Lucknow Compact composed.

4073. Still, it remains a fact, does it not, that this happy achievement of the power of co-operation between these two great communities did synchronise with the promise to Mussulmans of communal representation in the Lucknow Compact?—Yes. I am quite prepared to admit that the immediate effect of the removal of a cause of difference is certainly to bring the two communities together. But may I add a word: Quite apart from this beneficial egect, this also had, in my judgment, so far as I have been able to observe, the very undesirable consequence of the great majority of the representatives of the different communities considering themselves in some way or other as bound to safeguard the interests of the particular communities they happened to represent. There is that tendency also much more strongly noticeable than before.

4075. I want to put two or three questions which I should have put to Mr. Jinnah if I had not been called away, but which you will be able to answer. Whether you think that the system of government proposed for India should be extended in its responsibility or not, you admit that the ill as it stands to-day would constitute a real extension of responsible government in India?—Yes; the Bill is so framed that it only needs a few modifications—some of which I have suggested—to make it a satisfactory beginning.

4076. That is not the question I am asking now. I quite understand that you would like various modifications in it, to make it better; but you would admit that, such as it is to-day, it is an extension of responsible government?—It is.

4077. Can you think of any greater extension of responsible government that has ever taken place in a civilised state at the same time in one step?—Oh, yes, surely.

4078. Which?—When responsible government was conferred on Canada it was an immensely bigger step than this.

4079. A bigger step than this?—Very much bigger, I should think, as I read things.

4080. But surely there had been forms of self-government in the Canadian Provinces?—It was a higher form of self-government than we enjoy; but we have also enjoyed some measure of self-government for a number of years.

4081. You would regard this as a lesser step than the Canadian step?—Much less.

4082. That is a matter of opinion. I am surprised to hear you say so. I hope some impartial person will examine that proposition. Can you think of any other. I think when some of the Australian States were erected into self-governing States they also took a bigger step than we are now taking.

4083. I should like that proposition examined also. I presided over one part of the Dominions when it passed from Crown Colony government to responsible government: I do not think the step was a bigger step?—May I ask a question or make a statement?

4084. Both?—Did your Lordship ever hear of a measure of self-government coming thirty years after representative institutions began in which the financial resolutions of a Legislative Council should have no effect whatever—should only be recommendatory in both the reserved and the transferred spheres?

Lord Sinha.

4085. That is not this Bill?—Well, it is that modified slightly.

Lord Sinha.] Modified by the Despatch, you mean, not the Bill.

Chairman.

4086. Our estimate of the comparative importance of steps would not always agree. Therefore we will not pursue it. You wish that the Governor of one of these Provinces should be a politician sent from England—you would prefer that? The scheme, however it emerges, will have to be worked in a Province by Indians and Englishmen in conjunction?—Yes.

4087. Has it ever occurred to you that not a single one of those Indians or those Englishmen in any Province except the Governor will ever have had any experience of responsible government?—That is so.

4088. You admit that?—Yes.

4089. Do you consider ten years a great span in the life of India?—No, I could not say that at all.

4090. Twenty-five?—Twenty-five is longer than ten, surely—much longer, and at the pace at which we are moving twenty-five years would make an enormous difference.

4091. On that view of arithmetic you and I are quite at one. Would you regard fifty years as anything but a speck in the life of India?—I should regard fifty years as nothing but a speck in the life of India, surely, as an academic proposition, but your Lordship and I talking together over this matter are practical politicians, and I suppose neither of us will venture to start on any drastic changes with a certain knowledge that only after fifty years such-and-such things will happen. We shall always have in view a much shorter period during which what we do may be expected to bear fruit. Revolutions may happen in fifty years, and all our calculations be frustrated.

4092. Do not you think the patient genius of India may be a wholesome corrective to the rather hasty actions of Europe?—It is a mistake to suppose that the genius of India is any longer patient if we are to consider the politically-minded classes. Really, as somebody stated here, our patience has been sorely tried.

4093. I was not using that word in relation to any action of the British Government, but the teachings of your own history?—Your Lordship is perfectly justified in expecting that India would take steps with caution, on constitutional lines, with regard to matters to which she is not accustomed. I have not met with any proposals in the whole course of recent history which have not been characterised by a very proper amount of caution in most cases, and by an excessive degree of caution in some. I am not prepared to say that the experiment embodied in this Bill errs on the side of haste or of rashness; it is an exceedingly cautious measure. In my judgment it is over-cautious.

4095. That is not the whole picture, is it?—If other parts of the picture have to be filled in I am prepared to give answers to questions.

4096. I asked the same question of Mrs. Besant, and she gave me a perfectly definite answer. I speak in her presence. I think she would have said exactly what you said, so far; but, beyond that, I understood her to say that development would differentiate in certain definite ways, according to the genius of the people. Is that your idea or not?—I have no doubt it will.

Chairman.] Thank you.

MEMBERS PRESENT:

Marquess of CREWE.
Earl of SELBORNE.
Lord BRODRICK (Viscount Midleton).
Lord ISLINGTON.
Lord SINHA.
Mr. F. D. ACLAND.
Mr. BENNETT.
Mr. MONTAGU.
Major ORMSBY-GORE.
Sir J. D. REES.

THE RIGHT HON. THE EARL OF SELBORNE IN THE CHAIR.

MR. A. H. CHOWRRYAPPAH, is called in; and Examined as follows:—

Chairman.

4097. I think you came to England primarily to help Dr. Nair?—Yes.

4098. And to secure the inclusion of the Madras Christians in the non-Brahmin communal representation?—That is so.

4099. And you were deputed for this purpose by the Indian Christian Association of Madras?—Yes.

4100. You are here in the witness chair as a substitute for what Dr. Nair might have said on behalf of that association?—Yes.

4101. May I ask what that association represents in Madras?—It represents the Indian Christians of the Madras Presidency.

4102. Of more than one Church?—Of all the Churches except the Roman Catholic Church.

4103. You have been good enough to send in answers to questions?—Yes.

1. Do you accept the proposition that it is desirable to bring about the progressive realisation of responsible government in India? and, if so, how do you define the expression "responsible government"? And do you generally accept the proposition contained in the Preamble?—I accept the proposition that it is desirable to bring about the progressive realisation of responsible government in India. I would define "responsible government" as that form of government in which the Executive carries out the will of the people as a whole, and not that of a minority. If a legislature should consist mainly of representatives of any one particular class it cannot be said to represent the will of the people. I accept the proposition contained in the Preamble provided that "responsible government" carries with it the meaning indicated above.

2. Do you think that the realisation of responsible government in the Provinces involves the establishment in Provincial Legislatures of a substantial elected majority (Clause 6)?—I am of opinion that the realisation of responsible government involves the establishment of a substantial elected majority in provincial legislatures.

3. Do you think that the non-official members of the Provincial legislatures should possess power to control the actions and policy of the Executive? Do you think they possess such power at present?—The actions and policy of the Executive Government should be guided to a large extent by the non-official members of Provincial legislatures, provided always that measures have been taken for the due representation of all classes of people, thereby preventing the preponderance and undue influence of any one particular class. They do not possess such power at present.

4. Do you think that there are certain matters or functions of Government in the Provinces in which at present the Provincial Executive must remain responsible to the Secretary of State and Parliament, and must therefore be in a position to enforce its wishes?—Most decidedly. Nothing should be done to weaken the provincial Executive Government in regard to certain subjects which ought to remain "reserved."

5. If you accept the propositions stated under questions 1 to 4, do you think that the dual form of government embodied in the Bill is the best means of securing them? If not, what are your objections to that feature of the Bill, and by what other means would you attempt to secure the objects in view?—The system of Diarchy is undoubtedly a novel one, and certainly a very bold experiment. There are many objections against it, but considering that there is no other reasonable or satisfactory alternative that would actually fix the responsibility on the people themselves, we accept, provided that so far as the Madras Presidency is concerned, the principle of Communal Representation is extended to the non-Brahmins.

6. If you have any other method to suggest, does it (i) provide possibilities of advance by stages, and facilitate the "progressive realisation of responsible government," and, if it does, in what way (Clause 2, 3, etc.)? and (ii), does it afford means of judgment (a) to the electors and (b) to the Statutory Commission which is to examine and report on progress, of the success or failure in results of the control exercised by the legislature and those who represent it in the Executive?—I have no other method to suggest.

7. If you consider a dual form of government acceptable in principle, are there any points of detail the modification of which you regard as necessary? If so, what are those points, and what modifications would you suggest?—I have no modifications to suggest.

8. In particular, do you think: (1) that Ministers should hold office "during pleasure," i.e., should be liable to removal if they are unable to support the action decided upon in their department by the Governor, or if they fail to retain the confidence of the legislature? (Clause 3 (1)). (2) That the Governor should have power to disregard the opinion of his Ministers if he considers that action in accordance with that opinion is inconsistent with the due discharge of his responsibilities? (Clause 3 (3)). (3) That the Executive Council should in all Provinces normally consist of one official European and one non-official Indian? (Clause 4). (4) That the Governor should have power to dissolve his Legislative Council? (Clause 7 (4))?—(1) Yes. (2) Yes. (3) Yes. (4) Yes.

9. Referring back to Questions 2, 3 and 4, if your answers to the first and third of these are in the affirmative, and if you think that the legislatures should be given greater powers of control and influence than they possess at present, do you regard the limitations imposed generally by Clause 9 of the Bill upon their financial and legislative powers as (1) suitable, or as (2) unnecessarily severe, or as (3) inadequate to safeguard the responsibilities which the Government owes in the last resort to Parliament (Clause 9)?—(1) They are suitable. (2) They are not severe. (3) They are adequate to safeguard the responsibilities referred to.

10. In particular: (1) Do you think that the legislature should have power with whatever limitations to vote supplies. (Clause 9 (2)). (2) Do you accept the plan of Grand Committees as the means of giving to the Government the power to secure essential legislation in the event of their failure to carry their propositions in the Council? If so, have you any modifications of detail to suggest? If not, what other method would you suggest to secure the object in view?—(1) Yes. (2) The plan of Grand Committees is acceptable.

11. Do

11. Do you accept the position adopted in the Bill (Part II.) that the time has not yet come to give the Legislative Assembly a similar measure of control over the Central Government as that given to Provincial Legislative Councils over Provincial Governments?—Most certainly. Nothing should be done to weaken the authority of the Central Government.

12. Do you agree that it is advisable none the less to provide for a substantial elective majority in the Indian Legislature. (Clause 16)?—Yes.

13. Do you accept the plan of a bicameral legislature as arising out of this, as constituting both a satisfactory machine for the ordinary purposes of legislation, and as affording the means to the Governor-General in Council to secure legislation which he regards as essential (Clauses 14, 15 and 16)?—Yes.

14. Do you accept the provisions of the Bill as to the course of legislation in the Indian Legislature? (Clause 20 (3) and (4)). Or do you regard them as unnecessarily restrictive on the popular will, or as an inadequate means of ensuring to the Governor-General in Council the discharge of his responsibilities?—We accept.

15. Do you accept the changes made by the Bill (Clause 21) in the constitution of the Governor-General's Executive Council? If not, what are your reasons, and what modifications would you suggest?—We accept.

16. Do you think that the development of Provincial autonomy on the one hand, and of self-government in the Provinces on the other, involves any modification of the provisions of Sections 2, 33 and 45 of the Government of India Act. (Clause 23)?—No modifications of the provisions are involved.

17. Do you agree that the gradual realisation of responsible government involves periodical examination of progress, by independent authority, and that the provisions of Clause 28 of the Bill are well designed to afford such examination?—Yes. It is the only way of finding out whether any advance has been made that would justify a further stage in the direction of responsible government.

19. Have you any observations to offer in the Reports of Lord Southborough's Committees and of the Committee on the Home Administration of Indian Affairs?—(1) The most important observation is that the question of Communal Representation of non-Brahmins should be satisfactorily settled, and due provision made for it in the Bill. Unless the principle of Communal Representation is extended to the non-Brahmins, thereby preventing the preponderance of the Brahmin element, the latter would surely capture a very large majority of the seats, and would wield all the power in the legislative Council. This would certainly be a very great calamity, inasmuch as the interests of the masses would not be safe in their hands. (2) There must be a residential qualification for candidates. (3) The Franchise should, as far as possible, be extended to women. (4) We accept the Report on Functions, subject to one exception, namely, that Secondary and University Education should not be made a "transferred" subject. (5) Lastly, the number of seats allotted for Indian Christians in Madras is inadequate considering that the community has a population of over a million and a quarter, and "is growing in importance and strength, and has a high standard of literacy." There ought to be at least six, namely, two for Madras city, and four for rural areas.

4104. Would you like to make any statement in supplement?—Yes. I was given very short notice, and my answers to the questions necessarily were very brief. I will therefore ask permission of your Lordship to allow me less than ten minutes to make a statement.

My Lord, speaking on behalf of the Indian Christian community of the Madras Presidency in general, and on behalf of the Indian Christian Association in particular, I desire to express my gratitude to your Lordship's Committee for giving us the opportunity of expressing our opinion on the Government of India Bill. Of all the innumerable and priceless blessings of British rule in India nothing do we prize more than that of freedom of faith and worship. Under the ægis of the British Crown, and in the bracing atmosphere of religious neutrality we have grown into a community, but the history of Christianity in India is much more remote than that of the British connection with that country. Indian Christians have been in existence from an age when British Druids did not even dream of Christianity or of such a country as India. In point of age Christianity in India ranks next only to Brahminism. Mohammedanism appeared on the scene several centuries later. The adoption of a foreign religion brought down on the Indian convert the wrath and hatred of his neighbours and relations, and he became a victim of social ostracism. The hard conditions of life to which he was thus exposed, his privations and his persecutions half a century ago would be deemed incredible at the present time; in them, however, one must seek for an explanation of the community's remarkable appreciation and assimilation of those principles of Western civilization, for the high percentage of literate persons in the community, and for the premium it puts on the education of women.

The Census Report of 1911 shows an Indian Christian population of 3,572,977, making it the third largest community in India. It is also a fast-growing community, as is evident from the same Report. During the ten years preceding the last census operation "the Indian Christian community gained 36.6 per cent. in numerical strength. It had more than doubled since 1881, and had multiplied treble since 1872." The figures of the Report of 1911 work out the following results as regards the percentage of literate persons in the three principal communities:—

Hindoo ...	... 5.51	4
Mohammedan	... 3.78	... .27
Indian Christian	... 16.3	... 3.10

The fusion of the several communities into one Indian nation is a consummation devoutly wished for by all interested in the political progress of India as an integral part of the British Empire. The Indian Christian community is the nucleus of a future Indian nation. It counts among its numbers those who belonged to the untouchable, depressed classes as well as those of the priestly Brahmin caste. The Indian Christian community is an outstanding landmark in the evolution of a homogeneous social unity out of a heterogeneous social complexity.

In constructive work such as education, medical aid, social reform, famine relief and industrial development Indian Christians have contributed very largely, and have played their part well. Indeed it could be safely asserted that consciously or unconsciously, and without any flourish of trumpets, they have worked more effectively for the regeneration of their country, especially of the depressed classes, than many social reformers or political workers. This alone establishes a strong claim in their favour to a definite place in the contemplated re-adjustment.

Indian Christians have not in the past demanded any special favour from Government on the ground of their faith. Nor is it their intention to do so now. On the contrary, they have always been ready to sacrifice their material interests and to efface themselves, if need be, for the well-being of their country. Their claim for recognition rests on the character and attainments of their members, which makes the community a new factor in Indian life.

Indian Christians are as much interested in the moral, material, and political improvement of their country as the most ardent patriot, and as such the introduction of representative institutions preparing the way for the gradual growth of self-government is equally, if not more, a source of inspiration to them as to their Hindoo and Mohammedan brethren. But we would be failing in our duty if we did not point out that, for a long time to come, communal association must be the main channel for the development of civic virtues virtues in our country. We might, indeed, wish it were otherwise; but the many and wide divergences of interests, creeds, and social systems in the country make, for the present at any rate, the ideal of development on purely national lines somewhat Utopian. The publication of the Montagu-Chelmsford Report has given rise to the strongest expression of communal feeling. What is this due to? For long years British rule in India has secured for the people internal peace, security of person and property, freedom from oppression, and even-handed justice as between man and man, and it followed as a matter of course that the depressed classes, the backward classes, and the great bulk of the people who are not politically-minded put their whole faith and trust in the Government. Now came the rude awakening that the protecting hand of the British nation is to be gradually withdrawn from the internal administration of the country. The announcement caused widespread alarm and fear among these classes, for it was felt, and felt rightly, that any transfer of power from the British Government to the people would inevitably mean the passing over of that power into the hands of a small section of the priestly caste, who for long ages subjected these people to the most shameful indignities. The feeling of impending helplessness caused the demand to be made all over the country for communal representation. It seems to me that the underlying meaning of all this agitation for communal representation is that the Brahmin community should not be allowed to monopolise more than its fair share in the political development of the country. Nationhood, democracy, citizenship, are mere catchwords, and behind the outer veneer of all this political phraseology lurks the reactionary spirit of caste.

There are those who tell us that there is no such problem as caste, and that it is fast disappearing. These statements are not only misleading, but are wholly inaccurate. With the advent of the Home-rule movement the Varanashrama Dharma movement has also been started, which stands for the revival of the ancient tyranny of caste. The condition of the depressed classes, who number about seven millions, is simply terrible. They are far too poor, and cannot afford to send a deputation to ventilate their grievances. The account given by Sir Alexander Cardew is a very mild one. Let alone pollution at a distance of 64 feet, the Panchamas have no right of access even to the village proper; their huts must always be half a mile outside the village, and they dare not stand erect before a Brahmin. Their children cannot have access to the village school; they cannot draw water from the village well; and, though they be dying of thirst, they must stand at a respectable distance till some charitably disposed individual should think of pouring a potful of water from a safe distance. In one village there are four wells, and not one can be used by the Panchamas; but they have to resort to a shallow pit, the water of which is used not only by these unfortunate people, but also by the village cattle. The Panchama, under the penalty of a severe punishment, must call out from a long distance on the public way to warn high-caste Hindoos of his presence. The touch of the filthiest vermin does not offend so much as that of the "untouchable" men. Could human perversity go further? Could arrogance brutalise humanity more? And yet, this is a true picture of the present state of things. Sixty-five years ago the British Government laid down the principle that no boy be refused admission to a Government college or school merely on the ground of caste. The principle has been reiterated many times since; but the result of an inquiry by the Government of Madras has revealed the fact that out of 8,157 publicly managed schools there were only 609 into which the children of these classes were admitted. In this connection it may be interesting to note that out of 424 posts in the Provincial Educational Service 310 are held by Brahmins.

This brings me to the question of education. We are very strongly of opinion that secondary and university education should not be made a "transferred" subject. Higher education has been our one asset and sheet-anchor, and we are sure that, under a popular Minister, a deliberate attempt would be made to cripple secondary education. Macaulay's minute remains the great landmark in the history of the Indian Empire; and there is much to justify Sir John Seeley's sentence with respect to that minute, that "Never on this earth was a more momentous question discussed." Right-thinking men are of opinion that the famous minute is even of greater importance than the pronouncement of August 20, 1917. And yet there are movements already on foot to "nationalise" education; which means, of course, getting back under the spell of Sanscrit literature. Only so recently as July 10 the present system of education is criticised in a leaderette in "New India," and Sir Henry Craik is quoted as having said that the present system "produces village schools beneath contempt."

We wholeheartedly support the extension of the franchise to women; but, as this would involve a great deal of complication, we would suggest that, to begin with, a literacy qualification be allowed, and the vote given to all women who are graduates of any department in the university. This would be the means of stimulating higher education among women. Finally, we ask that proper safeguards be made to protect the interests of the masses, who look up to the British Government for security and freedom from oppression; and that due care be taken to ensure a just and equitable distribution of political power among all classes of the people, without which no scheme of reform could tend towards responsible government.

Mr. Montagu.

4105. You told the Committee that you represent the third largest community in India?—Yes.

4106. About three millions?—About four millions.

4107. And the second largest community in India are the Mohammedans?—Yes.

4108. About how many does that number?—About seventy-two millions, I think.

4109. Did you come to this country originally as a representative of the Indian Christian community?—Yes.

4110. And also to help Dr. Nair?—Yes.

4111. So that you have come in a dual capacity—first as a non-Brahmin, and secondly as a representative of the Christian community?—No, I have nothing to do with the non-Brahmins.

4112. Could you explain how you came to help Dr. Nair?—Our Association had no idea that any of its representatives would be called upon to give evidence; but we felt that as Dr. Nair was going to England, and as he was sympathetic towards the interests of our community, I would support whatever he had to say on behalf of the Indian Christians, and confirm anything he had to say in regard to the Christian community.

4113. Did you give evidence before the Southborough Committee?—No.

4114. Did any Indian Christians give evidence before the Southborough Committee?—Yes.

4115. How was that Indian Christian chosen?—By ballot from our Association.

4116. Could you remember who he was?—Yes, Mr. Devadoss.

4117. Do you believe that the elections in India in these newly enlarged constituencies will turn on religious questions. Supposing there is no communal representation; supposing all the electorates were territorial, do you believe that the elections would always go according to the religion of the candidate?—I think so.

4118. Always or only at first?—I should think at all elections at first.

4119. Do you look forward to its disappearing in time?—Certainly I do.

4120. I want to understand your position, if I may ask you a rather long question as the best way of bringing home to you what I mean. In an English constituency there is sometimes a small minority of one profession or of one faith, let us say numbering 1,000 in a 10,000 constituency—we have no communal representation here—and you will appreciate that sometimes the result of an election turns on a very few votes?—Yes.

[representation

4121. Therefore it becomes very important to each candidate to capture the vote of that particular community. Each candidate as a rule makes very extravagant promises that they will regard their interest as a first charge upon their time if successful. You appreciate that sort of thing?—Yes.

4122. The community—this minority community—therefore has enormous influence. It may decide the result of the election, and naturally, if it votes for a man once it votes against him the second time if he does not come up to their expectations?—Yes.

4123. You cannot picture such a thing happening in an Indian constituency at the present time?—No.

4124. Why not? Could you elaborate that answer?—Because the conditions are not the same in India as they are in England.

4125. That is very true, but exactly why should not that happen? What would prevent it?—Because for long ages religion and caste have played a very important part—in fact, they are inseparable—and they would not in any way yield to the interests of another caste or community. It would always be self first.

4126. In your answers to questions, you gave this excellent expression of opinion: "The actions and policy of the Executive Government should be guided to a large extent by the non-official members of Provincial Legislatures, provided always that measures have been taken for the due representation of all classes of people, thereby preventing the preponderance and undue influence of any one particular class. They do not possess such power at present." Now, I put it to you that, when the constitution is altered so that the vote has a value—because the representatives obtain a power that they do not possess at present in your own words—will not they vote from different motives?—I do not think so.

4127. Could you tell the Committee why not?—Because constitutional government is a new one to the people, and especially to those in rural areas, and even to those in smaller towns, and it will be a long time before they appreciate the real value of constitutional government, and in the beginning they would tend to move towards their own particular group, or caste.

4128. You told me earlier that you look forward to the time when they would vote in that way?—Yes; I do.

4129. If they are divided at the present moment into communities, how can they ever learn to vote in that way?—I think that will come naturally when once they learn to value the vote, and they are trained in constitutional government. There will certainly come a time when safeguards such as communal representation will not be required.

4130. If you, at the first moment, segregate Indian Christians into one electorate and Indian non-Christians into another electorate, does not that tell them that they are to be concerned for their religious beliefs and for nothing else?—That is really very unfortunate. So far as the Madras Christians are concerned, they would gladly sacrifice those three seats. This demand for communal representation has arisen only through fear that the Brahmin community would swamp the whole Council, and that there would not be a chance for the other communities, such as the non-Brahmin communities, to have a share.

4131. You are putting that plea forward not on behalf of the Christians, but on behalf of the non-Brahmins?—No. I have nothing to do with the non-Brahmins; I am speaking from the Christian point of view.

4132. Are you asking for communal representation for Christians?—I say we are not very anxious if a safeguard is made which would prevent a preponderance of Brahmin representation.

4133. By giving communal representation to other people?—No, by limiting the influence of the Brahmin community.

4134. How would you do that?—They are only a million and a quarter, the same number as the Indian Christians. Our number is one and a-quarter millions, and the Southborough Committee has only given us three seats. Why should the Brahmin community be allowed to preponderate in the Councils?

4135. You would limit the number of Brahmins in the new Councils?—Yes, I would.

4136. I have been asking questions of you the whole time, in the belief that you were asking for communal representation?—No, we are not particular about communal representation.

4137. I was guided by your answer to Question 5: "We accept the principle of diarchy provided that, so far as the Madras Presidency is concerned the principle of communal representation is extended to the non-Brahmins." But you told us you wrote that in a hurry?—Oh, no, I did not say that at all. I simply said that so far as Christians are concerned we would not press for communal representation if the interests of the non-Brahmins are protected, because we do not fear that they would in any way trench upon our interests.

4138. I think you told us in your evidence that non Brahmins had a very poor chance of getting Government appointments?—Yes, that is so.

4139. Is that because of their education?—No. I do not think so at all.

4140. I think also in your evidence you paid a very gratifying and, if I may say so, a perfectly just tribute to the fairness of British Government?—Yes.

4141. Is not it the British Government that has made these appointment to the Government Departments, and could have made them to non-Brahmins if they had wished?—The policy of the Government is right, and I believe they are truly anxious to serve the interests of all communities, but there are certain difficulties that stand in the way. They cannot look into all these matters. These are departmental matters and are held by Brahmin influence.

4142. Did you ever read the evidence given before Lord Islington's Commission on Public Services?—Yes, I have.

4143. Do you remember the discussion on the employment of non-Brahmins there?—Yes.

4144 Do you remember what Sir Alexander Cardew said?—Yes, I remember what he said.

4145. Would you be kind enough to tell me what sort of number would you suggest at the beginning that the Brahmins should be limited to rather than the Government of India scheme, which suggested 30 out of 61?—I think it would be very unfair to give 30 seats to a community which represents one and a quarter millions.

4146. Supposing there was no limitation of Brahmin seats and there are 61 elected seats under the scheme suggested by Lord Southborough, how many seats do you think the Brahmins would win?—I think they would win a great number of seats, perhaps all with the exception of a few.

4147. How would you suggest they would do that, because they are cleverer, because they are better educated?—Not at all, not because of their intellect. They are no doubt more educated; but because of the wonderful influence they have in the villages.

4148. You would say to a candidate who has a marvellous influence, "We are not going to allow you to exert that influence, although you possess it, but we are going to give a constitution such that you shall have no more seats than you are numerically entitled to." Do you think that would be characteristic British fairness to the Brahmin?—I think it would be.

4149. Have you any knowledge of administration yourself?—Yes.

4150. You approve, in the answer to questions, of diarchy?—Yes.

4151. And you think it would work if you divide the Education Department into two halves, one dealing with primary education alone and the other dealing with the higher branch?—I think it would work very well.

4152. Would you divide the educational service—I suppose you would not?—No, the educational service would be one.

4153. Have you ever fought an election yourself?—No.

4154. Have you ever helped in fighting an election?—Not very much; I have tried to do a little.

4155. Are

Sir J. D. Rees.

4155. Are you a Christian born or converted?—I am a Christian born.

4156. What is your occupation?—I am the head of a publishing house in Madras.

4157. Do I rightly understand this: You have got the communal representation you want for the Indian Christians?—Yes, the Indian Christians have been allotted three seats in the proposed Council.

4158. Do I rightly understand the object of this Memorandum to be to prevent the Brahmins from getting the seats which they would naturally get under a system of open election?—To prevent the Brahmins from getting over-representation.

4159. But what is over-representation? Your immediate object is to limit the number—to place the Brahmins under a disability?—It would not be. I do not think it would be a disability.

4160. But if you limited the number of the seats by an order it would be a disability. I do not say unjust. I am not arguing. But that is your object, is it not?—Yes; but I do not think it is a disability.

4161. Do you represent the Church Missionary Society and the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel?—No, I do not represent any Mission.

4162. Is not Christian South India their child and creation almost?—Certainly not.

4164. Are not they immensely the two greatest?—No, the Baptists are much stronger.

4165. You say they are not the greatest bodies of Christians in South India?—That is so. They belong to the body of Missions which are operating in India, but they are not by any means the strongest.

4166. In South India they are not the strongest numerically?—No.

4167. Who are the strongest?—I should think the Baptists.

4168. The Baptists are stronger still?—Yes, by far.

4169. The Christians in South India have multiplied and flourished exceedingly, have they not? They have increased in numbers, and in all respects have been a prosperous community?—Yes.

4170. Is that due to the toleration of the Government system?—Certainly.

4171. May I ask if, under that system, the chief agents of the Indian Civil Service have not been Brahmins? Well, you have just said so; you have just said so. You complained that almost all of the officials of the Government were Brahmins—that they were so powerful that they got most of the appointments. I agree with you?—I do not complain; I simply state the fact.

4172. That being the fact, that most of the subordinate appointments, indeed the highest appointments under the British Government are held by Brahmins, and the Government having been by your confession a very tolerant Government under which the native Christians have prospered, what is your objection to the Brahmins as officials?—They have no power now; the British Government holds the scales.

4173. But they are the agents of the British Government?—Yes, they simply carry out the policy of the Government.

4174. You mean, if they had power they would behave badly? They would be different?—I believe so.

4175. You have stated in your evidence that your community includes Brahmins as well as the depressed classes. Is not a Brahmin an extremely rare phenomenon amongst the native Christians?—I do not understand your question.

4176. Did I understand you rightly to say that your community included Brahmins?—Yes.

4177. I say, is he not very much an exception, a Brahmin among the native Christians?—I do not think so.

4178. May I ask what sort of proportion of the Christians you think are Brahmins?—A very small proportion.

4179. Could you put it into figures? Is it big enough to admit of expression in figures?—I have no figures with me at present.

4180. Is it not the case that when a Hindoo becomes a Christian he asserts an equality with all the higher castes? He says they are all equal before God. He asserts equality, does he not?—Yes.

4181. Is it for that reason that a kind of antagonism develops between native Christians and the higher castes of the Hindoo system?—Yes.

4182. It is for that reason you said that the native Christians had done most for the depressed classes?—Yes, undoubtedly.

4183. What power have they to do much for the depressed classes?—In social service no power is required. It is open for any community to administer to the needs of the depressed classes.

4184. You do not mean they have been able to confer any conspicuous benefits through legislation or anything else upon them, or to propose it?—Not through legislation. I did not mean through legislation. I meant purely in social work.

4185. What conspicuous benefits have the native Christians been able to confer upon the lower classes?—In teaching them industries and giving them an improved system of weaving, etc.

4186. Has not Mr. Gokhale, who is a Brahmin, devoted himself in politics to giving universal education to the lower classes?—Yes, and we owe a great deal to Mr. Gokhale.

4187. Then there are good Brahmins?—Their number is very few and far between.

4188. You spoke of the Brahmins as the priestly caste?—That is so.

4189. That is, historically speaking you call them that?—Yes.

4190. Have you ever lived in villages in India?—Yes.

4191. Have you lived in a Shana village in Tinnevelly?—I have not lived long in them, but I have been to those villages.

4192. May I ask if in South India there is any priestly tyranny, or if the Brahmin really is more likely to be a priest than anybody else?—A great deal of tyranny.

4193. That is to say, the village priest is very often a Brahmin, you mean?—The Brahmins as a whole. No caste man can stand erect before a Brahmin.

4194. I am talking of priestly functions. Is there any presumption that because a man is a Brahmin he exercises priestly functions now?—Yes.

4195. You commit yourself to that?—Yes, I do.

4196. Is the Brahmin priest in the village a man of great authority and power—the temple Brahmin?—Oh, yes.

4197. You think he is?—Certainly.

4198. You assert that?—Yes.

4199. Have you lived in these villages?—I have not lived there, but I have been to these villages.

4200. You spoke just now of a movement for revival of caste. Had caste disappeared in any way?—No, it has not disappeared; it is being revived.

4201. A revival would imply a fall?—The fear is that caste is dying out, and that it ought to be revived.

4201A. There is a fear now that it is dying out?—Yes.

4202. Is that felt among the Indian Christians?—We have no fear.

4203. Who is it that fears that it will die out?—The caste Hindoos.

4204. Do you speak for the feeling of the caste Hindoos?—Particularly, the Brahmins.

4205. But can you speak for their feelings?—I do not purport to speak on their behalf; but I speak from what I know.

4206. You told me just now that, almost necessarily, some little antagonism was developed between the native Christians and the Brahmins?—No antagonism at all.

4207. You would hardly pretend to be a witness to their feelings?—We have nothing to do with them.

4208. Then you drew a picture of the conditions of the lower castes—whom you call Panchamas—in the villages. You consider their position is a cruel one?—It is very cruel and humilitating.

4209. You said just now the British Government was very tolerant?—Yes; but what could the British Government do when people are not willing that their conditions should be ameliorated?

4210 If the people are not willing, that means that public opinion supports the system which you have characterised as inhuman and cruel?—It does; I will tell you why.

4211. It

4211. It does?—Yes.

4212. Why?—In March, 1916, a Parsee member of the Imperial Legislative Council brought forward a resolution to form a Committee to investigate into these shameful indignities, and to see if measures could not be introduced to ameliorate their conditions.

4213. I do not think it will be necessary to refer to it in detail?—Two Brahmins spoke very vehemently against that proposition, and it was lost. If you will allow me to give the reference I will do so.

Marquess of Crewe (in the Chair).

4214. You have answered the question. You said there was a case in which there was a demand made to bring forward the grievance of these people, and nothing was done, owing to the opposition of two Brahmin gentlemen?—Yes.

Sir J. D. Rees.

4215. You refer to the division of the village into a Brahmin and non-Brahmin quarter?—Yes.

4216. Is it the case that in India, owing to the climate, practically the street is very much the home of the people. The street in which a particular caste lives is very much its home; it is not so much a thoroughfare as its home?—It is a thoroughfare managed by the municipal authorities.

4217. Do you say the Agraharem in a village is a thoroughfare?—No, that is only a small place; but there are other streets.

4218. If the Agraharem, the Brahmin quarter, is practically the home of a particular caste, is this hardship so great as you represent?—Yes, because the Agraharem does not represent the whole village; it is only a small part of the village.

4219. As regards the schools, am I right in supposing that the British Government in India impose no disability upon any low caste to prevent them attending schools?—The Government does not.

4220. What does?—The people who carry out the policy of the Government—the officials.

4221. Did you say officials prevent Pariah boys from going to the schools?—Not directly, but indirectly.

4222. How?—Well, the inspectors are generally Brahmins, and naturally they build, or at least they give permission, to have school-houses put up in the Brahmin quarter in the village proper.

4223. How does the village tolerate that?—They are helpless. I say a Pariah cannot stand erect before Brahmins.

4224. Is it true that public opinion up to now approves of that of which you are disapproving as a native Christian—the Hindoo public opinion?—Yes. As I said before a Parsee gentleman brought a resolution, and no heed was taken.

4225. Would you have the Government go so far ahead of public opinion as to enforce the attendance of Pariah boys at school, which would make others go away?—I think they would change their policy. They would appoint non-Brahmins more largely into the educational service.

4226. You refer to the Women's Franchise, of which you are in favour?—Yes.

4227. Do you not think that the fact that this is now a matter of serious politics is an immense testimony to the fairness and impartiality of the British Government in India that this question should have come within the reach of practical politics?—Oh, yes.

4228. Can you say that people in the villages do not prefer high Hindoo caste officials?—They would not say they did not, because they would be subjected to a great deal of persecution.

4229. Could you say they do not?—They do not. They simply submit to it.

4230. They never approve?—They do not approve.

4231. Are they rather helpless in the expression of their opinion?—Absolutely helpless.

4132. How does it happen that they burn down churches? In the Shanar villages, in south India, Christian churches are sometimes burnt down?—By whom?

4233. By the non-Christians. Have you heard nothing of local Christian differences, where they burn down one another's churches and seem quite capable of expressing an opinion?—During the last riot a number of Christian churches were burnt. It is only in exceptional circumstances.

4234. May I ask you whether giving communal representation to non-Brahmins would not mean disfranchising Brahmins who are 3 per cent. in favour of 97 per cent.—not disfranchising them, but placing a disability upon the 3 in favour of the 97 per cent.?—I do not think there would be any disability.

4235. You do not think it is a disability to be excluded from being elected?—Excluded after a certain number.

4236. But you would if they were Christians?—No, not even then.

4237. Is there anything in the Bill preventing the election of non-Brahmins to the general seats?—There is nothing at all.

4238. Why do you want a residential qualification for candidates?—Because a member, simply with the object of being elected, would come down to a certain place and stand for election to the detriment of the man who has been there much longer and who would probably be more acquainted with the affairs of his locality or his constituency.

4239. Do not you think a residential qualification could be acquired with extreme ease and without spending money?—No; on account of the family system.

4241. Why do you think that secondary and University education should not be made a transferred subject? I am not perfectly clear about your attitude about that?—I have said in my statement that there is a strong tendency towards what is called nationalising education. That is going back from the present system. And besides there would be plenty of scope for a Minister to devote himself to primary compulsory education. I think it would be imposing too much upon a popular Minister in throwing upon him the burden of primary education as well as secondary and University education. To begin with, I think it would be well to entrust to a popular Minister primary education before trusting the whole of education.

4242. You do think this scheme embodied in the Bill is a good and progressive scheme? You only want to make it a condition that Brahmins should be placed under some disabilities so that not too many may be elected?—I do not like that word "disability." I would say that they should not be allowed to preponderate in the new councils.

Major Ormsby-Gore.

4243. Your Association was represented before the Southborough Committee that dealt with Franchise, when it visited Madras?—Yes.

4244. Were they dissatisfied with what they were given by the Southborough Committee?—Yes, I think they are.

4245. On what ground were they dissatisfied with it—their representation?—Because the number of seats is not equitable. The Mohammedans who number 2½ millions have been given 13 seats, whereas Indian Christians, who number 1¼ millions, have been given 3 seats.

4246. Take the number of electors—the number of Christian electors is very small, is it not?—Yes.

4247. Much smaller than the number of Mohammedans per se?—That is because of the property qualification.

4248. You would like to do away with the property qualification, and have representation on a population basis?—A literacy basis would be better.

4249. You speak for the Association of all the Christians other than Roman Catholics?—Yes.

4250. What proportion do the Roman Catholics bear to all the other Christians put together?—I think it would be about 50 per cent—half the number.

4251. Do you anticipate that half the seats that you are allotted, or at any rate one of the seats you are allotted, would be filled by a Roman Catholic?—Yes, I think there would be no difficulty about that.

4252. There has been no arrangement come to in that respect?—No. We came to an arrangement before coming before the Southborough Committee. We said we would join together in the matter of political reform.

4253. From your cross-examination, am I right in gathering that you are not in the least frightened of any disadvantage you might suffer from either the Mahommedans or the non-Brahmin Hindoos?—Certainly not.

4254. And it is only the Brahmin you fear?—Yes.

4255. And therefore you want Brahmins to be regarded as a separate community from the other Hindoos?—That will be a very good thing; that would solve the difficulty.

4256. That is to say, you would treat the Brahmins not as Hindoos, but as members of a separate community altogether?—Yes.

4257. You said something about the transfer of education. You said it was feared that if secondary and higher education were transferred there would be a revival of the study of Sanscrit literature?—Yes.

4258. Do not you think that would be a very good thing?—I do not think so at all.

4259. Are not the Indian classics nearly all written in Sanscrit?—Yes; but they are also translated into other languages in India. They are not a sealed book to other Hindoos.

4260. Do not you think the education of every country should be based upon the great classic literature of that country?—It should not be made the sole basis.

4261. But it should be the important basis?—Yes; but the trouble is that the Sanscrit is regarded as a sacred language, and objection would be brought forward to the lower classes being admitted to the colleges where Sanscrit is taught. That is so, even at the present day.

4262. Do not you think that, with the transfer of education to popular control, that prejudice against allowing any class of Indians to learn and read Sanscrit would rapidly disappear under the pressure of the new democratic system?—No; I think it would be the other way.

4263. You think that the tendency of education, as a transferred subject, would be to restrict education to a particular class?—Secondary and higher education.

4264. In addition to that, Sanscrit, after all, contains the religious writings and communications to the majority of the community of India. It is to the Hindoo what the Hebrew Scriptures are to you?—Not to all the Hindoos; only to the Brahmins. The great bulk of non-Brahmins pay very little attention to Sanscrit; in fact, they are excluded—if I am not mistaken—from the Sanscrit colleges which have been established recently.

4265. You say in your answers that the present Franchise proposals would merely increase the preponderance of the Brahmin element: "This would certainly be a very great calamity, inasmuch as the interests of the masses would not be safe in their hands." By the masses you only refer to the outcast peoples?—Yes; especially the depressed classes.

4266. You are referring to the Panchamas. Is it not true that Brahmins are beginning to take an interest in social service, and in raising the social and political and educational conditions of these depressed classes?—No, I do not think it is general, because so recently as 1916 two Brahmin gentlemen in the Imperial Legislative Council voted against a resolution brought forward by a Parsee to ameliorate the condition of the lower classes.

Marquess of Crewe.

4267. I think that is the same statement you made before. Are you alluding to the same occasion?—Yes.

Major Ormsby-Gore.

4268. That is the only instance you want to bring to our notice in that connection?—May I read what the member for the Government of India said: "The honourable member who moved this resolution has accused the Government of apathy and of merely following a negative policy of drift. Well, sir, my task in defending the Government from this charge has been considerably lightened. Not only have representatives of two Governments got up to protest against the accusation, but I find myself in the pleasant position of having two honourable members, with whom I often have to disagree, as the staunchest supporters of Government of any who have risen to speak—I refer to the Honourable Mr. Surendrenath Banerjea and the Honourable Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya. I welcome their support."

4269. You said in answer to questions just now that in the villages the priests were Brahmins?—Yes.

4270. The bulk of the Brahmins are not priests, are they?—No, all Brahmins are not priests, but all priests are Brahmins.

4271. Only a small proportion of Brahmins are priests?—Yes.

4272. The bulk of them are cooks and manual workers and people of that kind?—They are gradually giving up their priestly profession and taking to secular professions.

4273. Is it not true that most of the Brahmins—say in public life, the educated Brahmins—rather look down in some sense upon those other Brahmins who merely take the role of village priests?—I do not think so.

4274. The Brahmins do not gain their ascendancy on account of their being wealthier than other classes?—No; more on account of their caste.

4275. It is simply the religious traditions of the people?—Yes.

4276. You think those religious traditions would have such an effect on the working of a democratic system that there would be no social reform?—Absolutely none whatever.

4277. I express the hope that your fears may prove groundless in the future of India.

Lord Islington.

4278. Would you like to see the Christian community, in regard to their education, made a reserved subject?—What part—the primary education?

4279. The whole of their education, from primary upwards?—No; I would keep secondary education as a reserved subject.

4280. You would be satisfied to see primary education a transferred subject, and controlled by an Indian Minister?—Yes.

4281. But you are very anxious to see higher and university education retained as a reserved subject?—Yes.

4282. Could you give me quite briefly your main reasons for desiring to see higher and university education retained?—I think I have already answered that question. There is a genuine fear that higher education will be crippled. There is a movement to nationalise education, and already there is what is called the National Education Scheme. This is to educate the people on ancient lines, and not in accordance with the scheme sketched out by Macaulay.

Marquess of Crewe.

4283. You are afraid that the British tendencies of education will be set aside by a return to a more exclusively Sanscrit education?—Yes.

Lord Islington.

4283A. A witness the other day, in discussing the education question, mentioned the insertion of a Conscience Clause. Do you know anything about that?—Yes.

4284. How would that Conscience Clause affect your mission schools?—The mission schools and colleges would have to be closed up.

4285. Will you explain that?—They would not consent to go on with merely secular education. They include religious education as a part of their curriculum, and if it is to be excluded, naturally all mission schools and colleges will have to be closed down.

4286. So that your mission would be very opposed to this Conscience Clause? Am I right in drawing that inference from what you have just said?—Yes.

4287. I want to know whether I derived a right impression from the answers you have given to the various question which have been put to you. You say say that on the whole you are not so dissatisfied with the Christian representation that is given to you, though you would like to have more?—We are not very particular so long as we have representatives to put our point of view before the Council.

4288. You would like to see more than three, but you do not urge or press very strongly for a larger representation?—No. We think we ought to have more than three seats. We think the more equitable principle would be six.

4289. Am I right in deriving an impression from your answers that what you press for is that the non-Brahmin representation in its most comprehensive sense should be made definite and distinct from the Brahmin representation?—Yes.

4290. And you believe that unless that is done the non-Brahmin community, which is the large majority of the population, will not be adequately represented in the Legislative Council?—Yes; and what is more, the smaller communities will suffer a great deal.

4291. The smaller communities will suffer?—Yes.

4292. What do you mean by that? Do you mean the smaller communities are to have sub-community representation?—No; I do not say so at all.

4293. The question I asked you was as to the whole community, the non-Brahmins. You would be satisfied, on the whole, I understand, if that is safeguarded as against the Brahmin community?—Yes; that is our point of view.

4294. You said just now you did not think 30 out of the 61 was adequate, as proposed by the Government of India?—In my personal opinion, that is a very unfair number.

4295. What do you suggest as an alternative number?—The number that has been given to the Christian community—the number is three. Double it, treble it, or multiply it four, or even five times, if you like.

4296. Multiply what five times?—The three.

4297. I am talking of the proposal made by the Government of India that there should be 30 seats allotted to the non-Brahmins out of 61. You say that is inadequate?—I say the Brahmin proportion would be too much.

4298. What I want to get at is, what proportion would you like to see in point of numbers as an alternative to the 30 out of the 61 of non-Brahmins?——

Marquess of Crewe.

4299. What the witness intended was this: He says that the number of Brahmins and of Christians is about the same. Three seats are to be allowed by the scheme to the Christians. He would be willing to give five times as many to Brahmins, although they are only the same number. Therefore he would be prepared to give something like 15 seats. (To the Witness.) Is that what you mean?—Yes.

Lord Islington.

4300. You would increase the non-Brahmins only by another 15—from 30 to 45?—Yes.

4301. You think that would be a fair proportion?—A very fair proportion.

4302. Would you say so, when you take into calculation the position that the Brahmin community have occupied in the past in the public life of Madras?—I do not think that is a reason why they should be allowed to dominate the Council, which is to be representative of all classes of people.

4303. But your proposal would be of a very restrictive character, would it not, in its relation to Brahmins?—It may appear restrictive, but it is just and equitable.

Lord Sinha.

4304. I think you said that Christianity has existed in the south of India for many many centuries?—Yes.

4305. And as a separate community there has been a Christian community in the south of India, particularly in Madras, for many centuries before the advent either of the British or even of the Mohammedans?—That is so.

4306. The Hindoo religion does not make proselytes, does it?—No.

4307. You can only be born a Hindoo?—But there is a movement called the Arya Sumaj, which takes Christians back into its fold——

4308. That is more or less confined to the north, is it not?—No, there are branches even in the south.

4309. Yes. That is a new movement?—Yes.

4310. Apart from that, the cardinal tenet of Hindooism is that you are a born Hindoo and you cannot be made a Hindoo?—Yes, those are the cardinal tenets.

4311. For that reason Hindoos are very tolerant of all other forms of religion, are they not?—Yes, they are.

4312. And both Christianity and other religions have always found asylum in India—for example, the Parsees also. There has been no persecution of any people on account of their religion in India?—No.

4313. Hindooism has been extraordinarily tolerant of all other forms of religion. That is a fact, you agree?—Yes.

4314. And another name for Hindooism is Brahminism, is it not?—Yes.

4315. Therefore I take it the Brahmins are very tolerant of other forms of religion?—I do not understand your question. So long as they are Brahmins they are all right.

4316. I am not suggesting they treat everybody else, whatever his religion, with equal respect, or anything of that kind; but, so far as a man's religion is concerned, they look upon it as no concern of theirs. They are extraordinarily tolerant of other forms of religion?—Towards others. But when a Hindoo becomes a Mahommedan or a Christian, for example, then the intolerance begins, then the persecution begins. They are not tolerant if a member chooses to follow a different faith.

4318. Although members of that faith themselves, as such, are not persecuted?—No, not particularly.

4319. If there were no Brahmins in Madras you would not want communal electorates for anybody, I understand?—No.

4320. And the non-Brahmin castes, the Panchamas and Christians, and everybody else, would be one happy household?—Not in such an ideal way as you put it; but there would not be so much trouble as exists at the present time.

4321. I was putting it too high, perhaps; but it would not be different from any other country. There would be differences, of course, between different sections of the people, but there would be no need for any separate electorates for any part of the people if there were no Brahmins?—I do not think so.

4322. Is it a fact that the non-Brahmins of Madras are the owners of the bulk of the soil?—Yes.

4323. Could you tell us what would be the number of castes composing those non-Brahmins, apart from the Panchamas, who have no caste, as I understand? How many non-Brahmin Hindoo castes do you think there are?—A very large number.

4324. Over 150, we heard from a witness the other day?—Yes; probably so.

4325. Are they a homogeneous body, these 150 and more castes?—To a great extent they are.

4326. They do not inter-marry, do they, and they do not dine together?—Not as a rule.

4327. We have seen it stated, in Sir Alexander Cardew's Minute, that non-Brahmin caste people are all equally exclusive and largely antagonistic to one another: Is that correct?—I do not think there is such a marked difference in their views.

4328. You do not agree with that?—No.

4329. You do not think there is any antagonism between these different castes, excluding Brahmins?—No; not so much as Sir Alexander puts it.

4330. But there are some amongst them—for example, the Khatryas—who will not have anything to do with the others, and there are a very large number of them, are there not?—But they are not quite so tolerant as the Brahmins are.

4331. But they consider themselves higher than any other castes, and are very exclusive?—They are exclusive, but they do not entertain such exalted views of themselves as the Brahmins do.

4332. The Vallalas is another caste, is it not?—Yes.

4333. There is a very large number of them?—Yes.

4334. They look upon themselves as higher than all the others?—They, too, are exclusive.

4335. But again they have not such an exalted notion of themselves as the Brahmins have?—No.

4336. Is it the fact that the Panchamas—that is, the non-caste people—are kept in a servile position by all the other castes, non-Brahmins no less than Brahmins?—That is not true. The non-Brahmins are not so hard upon these depressed classes as the Brahmins are.

4337. I am reading to you from Sir Alexander Cardew's Minute, where he says with regard to these Panchamas, "Though no longer nominally a slave he"—that is, the Panchama—"is effectively kept in a servile position by the higher castes, non-Brahmins not less than Brahmins, who own the whole, or the great bulk, of the soil." Would you agree to that?—Not entirely.

4338. In so far as the owners of the soil treat the Panchamas as servile or depressed, it would be mostly the non-Brahmin caste people, because you have told me they are owners of the bulk of the soil?—Yes.

4339. And it is the non-Brahmins who set up claims to the ownership of the labourers' house-sites, and often to the huts in which they live?—But they do a great deal to ameliorate their condition in the villages.

4340. Notwithstanding that, we have heard the condition is that they cannot get water and there is no sanitation where they live. Is that a fact?—You mean among the non-Brahmins?

4341. The Panchamas?—They suffer a great deal.

4342. Their condition is very bad. They have hardly any potable water, and every kind of sanitation is wanting in the places where they live, and so on, and that notwithstanding the fact that the soil upon which they live belongs to the non-Brahmin caste people?—Yes.

4343. Is it not the fact that the character of caste, so far as it went by occupation, has confined education, particularly education of a literary character, to Brahmins for thousands of years? Is that a fact or not in India?—That is so, because they have excluded education from the other classes. They have kept it as a close preserve for themselves.

4344. And the system of caste was more or less based upon that of occupation?—Originally it was so.

4345. And the effect of it has been that the Brahmins have got the largest number of educated people amongst them in all parts of India?—That is so.

4346. The reason why they monopolise, where they do, offices and positions and emoluments is due to the education which has been their monopoly for centuries?—It is not entirely due to their education, but also to their influence. Take the superintendent or manager of a certain office: He would like to see as many Brahmins as possible.

4347. He gets in his own caste people?—Yes, he prefers them to those belonging to another caste.

4348. And so does the non-Brahmin, when he gets into that position, I suppose?—No; I do not think he is so exclusive.

4349. Does not he favour his own caste people?—No; I think he is more generous.

4350. Do you object to national education suited to the genius of the people?—I do not object to national education; but I object to putting back education.

4351. National education, as such, in the sense of education suited to the genius of the people, you would welcome, I suppose?—Yes; I think all Indians would welcome it.

4352. So far as the educated classes in India are concerned for many years their one cry has been that secondary education and university education has not been sufficiently encouraged by the Government. They want the kind of education there is now to be increased and improved, do they not?—That is what they say.

4353. For example, with regard to Lord Curzon's reforms of the university—which were alleged to restrict university education—that was the cry: "You must not cut down English education"?—Yes.

4354. Every so-called attempt to improve university education is looked upon with suspicion as an attempt to restrict English educaton?—Yes.

4355. So that it is a fact, is it not, that whereas the cry is for national education, the real demand is for more and more English education?—Not for more and more English education—not on the present lines—but on an entirely different line altogether.

4356. Do you suggest that there is any demand amongst educated Indians for cutting down the English curriculum for the improvement of the Sanscrit or vernacular curriculum?—No; that demand is not at all a large one. It only comes from a very small section of the people.

4357. In fact the demand is all the other way, to go on increasing the English curriculum, and the vernaculars do not matter very much?—Not entirely neglecting vernaculars.

4358. I mean that is the kind of thing you are constantly hearing in India—give us more and more English education; it does not matter about the vernacular education?—Yes.

4359. And it is the Government itself which insists upon the utility of vernaculars and ancient classics?—Yes.

4360. And it is only latterly that people are beginning to see that there is something in that point of view?—Oh, yes.

4361. You and I being agreed with regard to that, that the educated classes are asking for more—in fact it is put against them that they ought to ask for more primary education and not for more secondary or university education, but that being their tendency, that they are asking for an enlarged university education and an enlarged secondary education—why do you think that the transfer to a Minister would restrict either of them?—The people as a whole are asking for more secondary or university education, but there is a small section of the people who are trying their level best to put back education towards the old Sanscrit and Arabic. It is a very small section. The great bulk of the non-Brahmins have nothing to do with this so-called national education.

Marquess of Crewe.

4362. Do you mean that although it is a small section it is powerful, and it can get its own way against the majority?—At present it is trying to assert itself.

Lord Sinha.

4363. By that small section do you mean the Brahmins?—Yes.

4364. The Brahmins throughout India, or in Madras only?—I should like to confine myself to Madras.

4365. You do not suggest that Mr. Sastri is against the extension of University education?—I do not know.

4366. You knew the late Mr. Gokhale, did you not?—Yes.

4367. He was not one of this minority which wants to put the hands of the clock back?—Oh no, certainly not.

4369. Have you been a member of the Congress at any time?—No.

4370. Have you read any of the Congress literature?—Yes, I have.

4371. Have you read the resolutions passed since its inception, from somewhere in the eighties—in 1885, I think?—Regarding education?

4372. Yes, and everything else?—Yes, I have.

4373. With regard to education, have not the resolutions throughout, from 1885 onwards, constantly asked for the enlargement and extension of educational facilities for all classes?—Yes.

4374. Have you any reason to think that that is not a sincere desire?—I would not suggest such a thing at all.

4375. You think, therefore, there is a sincere desire on the part of the members of the Indian National Congress, those who have taken part in it from the beginning, to improve and enlarge facilities for education for all classes?—Yes.

4376. It is the fashion now to call them politically-to restrict English education?—Yes.

4377. That

4377. That being so, I take it it is your view that the politically-minded classes desire to enlarge and improve the facilities for education of all classes?—Yes, that is my view. For instance, Mr. Basu, in delivering an addres only a few weeks ago, said that there are people who thought that the famous Minute of Macaulay was even of greater importance than the pronouncement of the 20th August, but I find that in Madras there is a deliberate attempt to criticise and belittle this great scheme of education, and to go back to national education.

4378. Since when has this movement, which you and I, at any rate, would call a retrograde movement, set in in Madras?—I think on the advent of the Home Rule movement.

4379. That is since 1916?—1915 or 1916.

4380. It almost synchronised with the Montagu-Chelmsford Report, I suppose?—Yes, perhaps a little earlier.

4381. Is your reason for saying that the propaganda with regard to Varnashrama Dharma movement?—Yes.

4382. You do not suggest that the Varnashrama Dharma movement has anything to do with the Home Rule League or with any political movement?—No, I do not think it has.

4383. The President of the Varnashrama Dharma is the Maharajah of Durbhanga; he has nothing to do with the Home Rule League?—No. The organising secretary of the Home Rule League in Madaas is an active worker on the movement.

4384. I daresay there are members common to both, but the two movements, I suggest, are quite independent of each other?—I think they are very closely allied.

4385. In any other Presidency is there any single member of the Varnashrama Dharma, any single office bearer or important member who is also a member of the Home Rule League?—I am not aware of it outside the Madras Presidency.

4386. Is there a close connection between the two bodies in Provinces other that Madras?—Mr. Madhav Rao has presided over the Varnashrama Darma Conference.

4387. He is a Madras man?—Yes.

4388. I am asking you if you are aware that there is that connection which you say exists in Madras in other places?—No. Madras is the stronghold of caste.

4389. Therefore it is your distrust of this new movement, the Varnashrama Dharma movement, thatmakes you think that the policy of education with regard to the Minister who may be appointed under this Report will be a reactionary policy?—Yes; we are very suspicious.

4390. It is principally because of the Varnashrama Dharma movement?—Yes. When they began to discuss the Vedas at a Varnashrama Dharma Conference non-Brahmins were asked to leave the place; it was confined only to Brahmins.

4391. With regard to these schools, caste Hindoos, whether Brahmin or non-Brahmin, are on the same footing?—No, they are not exactly on the same footing.

4392. There is nothing to bar a non-Brahmin from admission to schools or colleges?—No.

4393. Any more than there is a Christian?—There is a great deal of difference. Take the Pachapas College in Madras—no Panchama or Christian boy would be admitted.

4394. I am speaking of Brahmin and non-Brahmin caste Hindoos. There is no distinction between them with regard to schools and colleges?—No, no distinction with regard to their admission.

4395. And the educational facilities of the Provinces are equal to all castes, whether Brahmin or non-Brahmin? I am leaving the Panchamas out?—Yes.

4396. It is only the Panchama who is deprived of admission?—And the Indian Christian.

4398. Even when they are Government schools?—Yes. I said in my statement that out of 8,157 schools publicly managed by the Government only in 609 schools are Panchamas allowed admision.

4399. Publicly managed schools?—Yes, Government schools.

4400. Under the rules of the Government colleges and schools Panchama boys cannot get in?—Yes. There is a G.O. published, and I should like your Lordship to see it.

4401. There is an order of the Government excluding them?—No. A Government inquiry revealed the fact that in only 609 schools Panchama boys are allowed admission out of a total of 8,157 schools.

4402. The Government does not encourage that—the Government rules do not exclude them?—No.

4403. It is the management and the masters and teachers?—Yes.

4404. Contrary to the spirit of the Orders of the Government?—Yes.

Marquess of Crewe.

4405. Macaulay has been held responsible for a good deal of misdirected education in India?—A very small section of people think so, but the great bulk really think that he did splendid service to India in introducing that famous Minute.

4406. It is quite possible that education in India might be carried on in all its grades on the lines and in the spirit which Lord Macaulay really intended, and at the same time full attention could be paid to the great ancient literature of India?—Yes. The present system is capable of a great deal of improvement.

4407. You think it is?—Yes.

4408. But you think in its higher grades that ought to be done under Government administration?—I think it could be done much better under Government management.

4409. You, of course, represent Madras, and Madras as we know, is the very seat of Indian Christianity; there are more Indian Christians in Madras than in the whole of the rest of India, are there not?—Yes.

4410. Are you able to speak with any authority on behalf of the Christian community in India, generally, in the other Presidencies and Provinces?—No. We only come together in an All-India Christian Conference. We meet in conference annually and come to know.

4411. Do yo uthink that the evidence which you have been giving would have the concurrence of the Indian Christian community, generally?—I think so.

4412. In all the other Provinces and Presidencies an Indian Christian seat is secured by nomination, is it not?—Not in all cases.

4413. All except the Central Provinces, I think?—Madras has sometimes not had an Indian Christian member, even by nomination.

4414. I am talking of the scheme under Lord Southborough's Report?—Yes.

4415. I am not speaking of what exists at the moment, but of the scheme as suggested in Lord Southborough's Report: There is the sole exception of the Central Provinces, in which no specifl provision is made; but in all the others one seat is reserved by nomination for Indian Christians?—Yes.

4416. You, I take it, at any rate, prefer a special electorate to a system of nomination?—Not in places where the number of Christians is very small.

4418. It has; and I wanted to know whether you preferred that to a system of nomination?—I prefer election to nomination.

4419. You want to see a similar system of special electorates largely extended to other bodies?—The ideal condition would be not to have any communal electorate In the highest interests of the country, we would prefer to take our share along with other people; but when the conditions are taken into account, as they are at present, we think it would be better to have a communal electorate.

people would not get in, and a good many others would not get in whom you would like to see in?—There would be no chance of Christians getting in.

4421. You would have no chance of getting a single seat anywhere?—That is so.

4423. You find that when a low-caste man or an outcast from Hindooism becomes a Christian he is better treated by high-caste Hindoos than if he had remained an outcast?—Certainly.

4424. And therfore, so far as your community is concerned, you would be quite content to be left, so to speak, to the tender mercies of even the high-caste Hindoos so long as they were not Brahmins?—Not because of their caste, but because of their influence in the Councils. So far as the Councils are concerned, if there is a safeguard in the matter of the number of seats for Brahmins, we would have no fear at all; we would be willing to take our share along with the non-Brahmins.

4425. I think you have told us pretty clearly what you consider would be a fair Brahmin representation. Thank you.

(After a short Adjournment.)

SIR ARCHDALE EARLE, K.C.S.I., K.C.I.E., is called in; and Examined, as follows:—

Chairman.

4426. We are much obliged to you, Sir Archdale, for coming here to-day; I know you come at a little inconvenience?—Not at all, my Lord.

4427. You were a member of the Government of India?—I was in the Government of India.

4428. In what years?—From 1910 to 1912.

4429. You were Home Secretary, I think?—Yes.

4430. And then you became Chief Commissioner of Assam?—Yes.

4431. And you retired?—Last year.

4432. You have been good enough to send us in answers to the questions which we put to you?—Yes.

1. Do you accept the proposition that it is desirable to bring about the progressive realisation of responsible government in India? and, if so, how do you define the expression "responsible government"? And do you generally accept the proposition contained in the Preamble?—I agree that it is desirable to bring about the progressive realisation of responsible government in India. By "responsible government," I mean government as it is understood in the United Kingdom, that is to say, government controlled by the people through their elected representatives. I generally accept the proposition contained in the Preamble of the Bill.

2. Do you think that the realisation of responsible government in the Provinces involves the establishment in Provincial Legislatures of a substantial elected majority (Clause 6)?—I certainly think that the realisation of responsible government in the provinces involves the establishment in Provincial Legislatures of a substantial elected majority. (In the copy of the Bill sent to me there is a printer's error in the fourth column of the First Schedule as against Assam, where the figure 2 should be replaced by the figure 12.)

3. Do you think that the non-official members of the Provincial Legislatures should possess power to control the actions and policy of the Executive? Do you think they possess such power at present?—I think that the non-official members of the Provincial Legislatures should be given power to control the actions and policy of the Executive in the manner contemplated in the Bill. They do not at present possess any such power, though they have power to criticise, and so to influence, the Executive.

4. Do you think that there are certain matters or functions of Government in the Provinces in which at present the Provincial Executive must remain responsible to the Secretary of State and Parliament, and must therefore be in a position to enforce its wishes?—In my view, the measure of responsibility to be devolved is practically that of the burden which the popular part of the Government may be considered capable of bearing. It would, in my opinion, undoubtedly wreck the scheme if an attempt were made to devolve straightway the whole burden of government on the representatives of the people, as they have not had an adequate training for the purpose. Generally speaking, the proposed devolutions will constitute a sufficient burden, and at the same time a new scope for training with a view to further devolution. In choosing the subjects for reservation, naturally those would be selected the devolution of which would involve the greatest risk.

5. If you accept the propositions stated under questions 1 to 4, do you think that the dual form of government embodied in the Bill is the best means of securing them? If not, what are your objections to that feature of the Bill, and by what other means would you attempt to secure the objects in view? 6. If you have any other method to suggest, does it (i) provide possibilities of advance by stages, and facilitate the "progressive realisation of responsible government," and, if it does, in what way (Clause 2, 3, etc.)? and (ii), does it afford means of judgment (a) to the electors and (b) to the Statutory Commission which is to examine and report on progress of the success or failure in results of the control exercised by the Legislature and those who represent it in the executive?—I never, from the beginning of the discussions on the point in 1917 had any doubt but that the dual form of government, as embodied in the Bill, was the best, if not the only, means of securing the ends in view. I have seen no other proposal which satisfies the propositions set forth in questions 1 to 4.

7. If you consider a dual form of government acceptable in principle, are there any points of detail the modification of which you regard as necessary? If so, what are those points, and what modification would you suggest? 8. In particular, do you think (i) that Ministers should hold office "during pleasure"—i.e., should be liable to removal if they are unable to support the action decided upon in their Department by the Governor or if they fail to retain the confidence of the Legislature (Clause 3 (1)). (ii) That the Governor should have power to disregard the opinion of his Ministers if he considers that action in accordance with that opinion is inconsistent with the due discharge of his responsibilities (Clause 3 (3)) (iii) That the Executive Council should in all Provinces normally consist of one official European and one non-official Indian (Clause 4)? (iv) That the Governor should have power to dissolve his Legislative Council (Clause 7 (4))?—I agree that Ministers should hold office "during pleasure" in the manner proposed; that the Governor should have power to disregard the opinion of the Ministers, if he considers that action in accordance with that opinion is inconsistent with the due discharge of his responsibilities; and that the Executive Council should in all provinces normally consist of one official European and one non-official Indian. I agree to inclusion in the Bill of power to dissolve the Legislature, though, in my opinion, the value of this safeguard will at first be practically of no account, as the electorate for some time to come will not able to apprehend its significance, nor will its significance be apparent till responsibility in respect of administration has increased.

9. Referring back to questions 2, 3, and 4, if your answers to the first and third of these are in the affirmative, and if you think that the Legislatures should should be given greater powers of control and influence than they possess at present, do you regard the limitations imposed generally by Clause 9 of the Bill upon their financial and legislative powers as (i) suitable, or as (ii) unnecessarily severe, or as (iii) inadequate to safeguard the responsibilities which the Government owes in the last resort to Parliament (Clause 9). 10. In particular (i) do you think that the Legislature should have power with whatever limitations to vote supplies (Clause 9 (2))? (ii) Do you accept the plan of Grand Committees as the means of giving to the Government the power to secure essential legislation in the event of their failure to carry their propositions in the Council? If so, have you any modifications of detail to suggest? If not, what other method would you suggest to secure the object in view?—I consider the limitations imposed by Clauses 8 and 9 of the Bill upon the financial and legislative powers of the Legislations are generally suitable. I regard the power to be conferred upon the legislators to vote supplies as one of the cardinal features of the reforms scheme. I accept the plan of Grand Committees as the means of giving to Government the power to secure essential legislation in the event of their failure to secure their propositions in the Council. Perhaps the rules will provide for reference back to the Legislature of Bills debated and modified, as may be, in the Grand Committee, as proposed in paragraph 253 of the Joint Report. I think that this is desirable. I assume that the Grand Committee procedure will apply to Assam, as well as to other provinces, notwithstanding the doubt thrown on the point in paragraph 16 of the Government of India's Despatch No. 7, Home Department, dated the 5th June, 1919. I see no reason to differentiate Assam in this respect. The policy initiated by Lord Hardinge in 1911-12 at the time of the territorial redistributions was that Assam, which had had the advantage of a Legislative Council, when united with Eastern Bengal, should not suffer as a result of the changes then made. It was accordingly given a Legislative Council, when it became a separate province in 1912. The same policy should, in my opinion, be continued, and differential treatment be avoided.

11. Do you accept the position adopted in the Bill (Part II.) that the time has not yet come to give the Legislative Assembly a similar measure of control over the Central Government as that given to Provincial Legislative Councils over Provincial Governments. 12. Do you agree that it is advisable none the less to provide for a substantial elective majority in the Indian Legislature (Clause 16)?—I accept the position adopted in the Bill that the time has not yet come to give to the Legislative Assembly a similar measure of control over the Central Government as that given to Provincial Legislative Councils over Provincial Governments, but that, nevertheless, it is advisable to provide for a substantial election majority in the Indian Legislature.

13. Do you accept the plan of a bicameral Legislature as arising out of this, as constituting both a satisfactory machine for the ordinary purposes of legislation and as affording the means to the Governor-General in Council to secure legislation which he regards as essential (Clauses 14, 15, and 16? 14. Do you accept the provisions of the Bill as to the course of legislation in the Indian Legislature (Clause 20 (3) and (4))? Or do you regard them as unnecessarily restrictive on the popular will, or as an inadequate means of ensuring to the Governor-General in Council the discharge of his responsibilities?—I accept the plan of bicameral Legislature as constituting both a satisfactory machine for the ordinary purposes of legislation and as affording the means to the Governor-General in Council to secure legislation which he regards as essential, and I accept the provisions of the Bill as to the course of legislation in the Indian Legislature as satisfactorily meeting present purposes.

15. Do you accept the changes made by the Bill (Clause 21) in the constitution of the Governor-General's Executive Council? If not, what are your reasons, and what modifications would you suggest?

—I accept the changes made by the Bill in the constitution of the Governor-General's Executive Council.

16. Do you think that the development of Provincial autonomy on the one hand and of self-government in the Provinces on the other involves any modification of the provisions of sections 2, 33, and 45 of the Government of India Act (Clause 23)?—I agree that the development of Provincial autonomy on the one hand, and of self-government in the Provinces on the other involves modification of sections 2, 33, and 45 of the Government of India Act, as proposed by Clause 23 of the Bill.

17. Do you agree that the gradual realisation of responsible government involves periodical examination of progress by independent authority, and that the provisions of Clause 28 of the Bill are well designed to afford such examination?—I agree that the gradual realisation of responsible government involves periodical examination of progress by independent authority, and that the provisions of Clause 28 of the Bill are well designed to afford such examination. At the same time, notwithstanding the criticism to which the proposal has been subjected, I think that opportunity should be afforded for rectifying omissions or anomalies, as proposed in paragraph 260 of the Joint Report. This could apparently be done by an amendment of the rules in the manner contemplated by the Bill.

18. Are there any matters which it is proposed in the Bill to deal with by rule which you would suggest should be provided for in the Bill?—There are no matters which it is proposed to deal with by rule which I would suggest should be provided for in the Bill, except perhaps that referred to in my reply to question 10 (ii) namely, the question of the reference back of Bills from the Grand Committees to the Legislative Councils.

19. Have you any observations to offer on the reports of Lord Southborough's Committees and of the Committee on the Home Administration of Indian Affairs?—(a) Reports of Lord Southborough's Committees. I think that the present occasion should be utilised for the purpose of helping on the cause of women in India, and that the vote should be allowed to them, at any rate to the extent noted below. That the number of women who will vote will be small does not affect my opinion. The mere fact of the recognition of women may, and I think will, have far-reaching consequences. I do not think that there would be grave difficulties in recording women's votes, because the number who will avail themselves of the privilege will not for a long time to come be large. To take a particular case, it seems absurd to refuse the vote to the very intelligent Indian women who are landed proprietors, and who, but for the fact that they are women, would be able to take part in the landholders' electorates. I have a very high respect—acquired from long business experience—for the capability and shrewdness of the Indian lady landed proprietor. There is no monopoly of women-sense outside the pardah. It goes without saying that British women, resident in India, who would otherwise be qualified, should be entitled to vote. I fully realise that the staff to deal with the new electorates is by no means unlimited, and that it is very important that they should not be overburdened. If necessary, therefore, comparatively high qualifications for electors might be laid down in the case of the general constituencies. A step forward such as I have proposed at least would constitute an act of recognition and an earnest of more liberal treatment in the future. No special or separate arrangements for the recording of women's votes need, I think, be made. (b) Committee on the Home Administration of Indian affairs. In regard to this subject, I need only say that I agree with the Majority Report, for the reasons given in paragraphs 20 and 21 of the report.

I hope that the representation proposed for landholders in Assam by the Committee will not be cut out, as suggested by the Government of India at the close of paragraph 15 of their Despatch No. 4 of 23rd April, 1919. Here, again, the policy, previously referred referred to, of not differentiating Assam should, I am strongly of opinion, be maintained.

The Functions Committee proposed that "Public Works" and "Excise" should not be transferred in Assam, largely on the ground that most of the hill districts would be entirely excluded. If, as I, moreover, gather, they are not to be so excluded, but be treated as "backward tracts" anly, the recommendations lose much of their force. Further, I cannot at all accept the other reasons, given by the Committee for reserving Excise in Assam, as at all convincing.

I entirely agree with the conclusion of the Functions Committee that education as a whole should be transferred, notwithstanding what the Government of India say on the subject in their Despatch No. 3 (Home Department), dated the 16th April, 1919.

4433. May I ask if you have anything you would like to say in supplement?—Yes. There are one or two addenda that I sent in which are being printed, I understand. One referred to the Franchise Report of Lord Southborough's Committee, a small matter as regards the landholders in Assam. The Government of India suggested that perhaps they should not be represented at all, and what I wanted to say in that respect is what I said in respect of another question. The policy in Assam should be continued as it was initiated by Lord Hardinge, namely, that Assam, having been separated from Eastern Bengal, should not be a loser, but should continue to have the privileges assigned to the province from which it is separated. These landholders in Assam certainly would have a grievance if they were unrepresented, merely on the ground that they were few in number. They have been cut off from their fellow landholders in Bengal, and I think they should have this right to representation. The Government of India have not said that they will refuse it, but they have thrown a doubt on the necessity. I am strongly of opinion that they should have it if they wish it. I do not think there should be any differentiation of Assam because it has been cut off from Bengal. Then there were two points in connection with the Functions Committee's Report, as to which I wish to say that I entirely agree as regards education that it would be better to transfer it as a whole. I did not go into reasons, but I sent in the recommendation that education should be treated as a whole and transferred, and should not be split up into parts.

4434. Would you like to say something about that now?—Yes. I had a good deal to do with education, because I was appointed soon after Lord Curzon's time as Director of Public Instruction in Bengal to carry out his educational reforms in that Province. I do not think that the Government will do as well as the popular Government with regard to education. We have always found very great difficulty in providing funds. I worked out endless schemes as the result of Lord Curzon's activities, but I never could get funds to carry them out—something always came in the way—and at the end of the time I was acting as Director we had not made very great progress for want of funds. The popular side of the Government may be more successful in finding funds. I know that coming to later times, when Sir Harcourt Butler was Minister of Education in India, funds were more generously given for education, but even that was not enough. There is no end to the funds which will be required for education now. I doubt very much whether the official Government will find those funds; there will always be other matters that they consider still more important coming in the way. That is one ground. Another ground is that I think education is a matter in which the people should express themselves as they wish, and as they can, and I do not think that we, as a bureaucratic Government, can lay down an educational policy which will be satisfactory; we have tried in the past, and I do not think we have been altogether successful. We have been successful in many things, but I do not think we have made a great success of education. I think it is quite feasible that the other Government—the popular side—may make a greater success of it. They should be allowed to work out their own salvation in respect of education. I think it is a particularly difficult subject for a bureaucratic Government to find a satisfactory solution for. There are also two points with regard to functions. I see that as regards Assam they put down the Public Works Department and Excise for the reserved side, and that is chiefly on the ground that most of the hill districts will be excluded areas. I gather from later reports that they will not be excluded areas, but will be treated as backward tracts, which makes a lot of difference. They will not be removed entirely from the scope of the Council or the influence of the Council, so that one of the chief reasons for which they decided that the Public Works Department and Excise should be reserved subjects in Assam falls to the ground. Moreover, I do not think some of the reasons they give in respect of Excise are very sound. They talk about the weakening of control in respect of Excise if made a transferred subject, but my view would rather be that the popular side would tighten up control. All the time I was in Assam they were pressing me to stop the issue of opium altogether. Opium does a good deal of harm in Assam, and I appointed a Committee of Inquiry to see what could be done, and as the result of that Committee's deliberations we raised the price of opium and made other restrictions which made it very difficult for the people to buy it, but we did not go beyond restricting the amount produced. I am inclined to think that the popular element would rather go the other way, and that instead of weakening they would rather tighten control. They would try to do away with opium altogether in Assam. That is a position which it is very difficult for an ordinary Government to take up, but I think perhaps the popular Government would assume that attitude with regard to opium. I do not think that the Committee's reasons are sound as regards the taking away of Excise. As regards Public Works, in the same way the chief reason they gave us was that the hill districts were to be excluded. I understand that they are not to be excluded. These are the additional points that I wish to make.

4435-36. Is there anything on the general subject you would like to add?—No. I think I have said all I wish to in writing.

4437. You have seen the despatch of the Government of India on the constitutional changes to be made in Assam?—Yes.

4438. Is there any point with regard to that that you would like to say anything upon? The treatment, for example, of the hill tracts?—I understand they are to be under the influence of the Council, and are not to be excluded, but to be treated as backward tracts. I think that would be quite satisfactory as regards the hill districts. I think that the present Chief Commissioner is quite right in saying that they should not be altogether excluded. There are some districts which should be entirely excluded, but they are very few indeed. Those particular districts are the wild districts which have been recently brought under administration after the Abor Expedition. There are only three of them, and I can specify them if necessary.

Chairman.

4439. We had better get the names?—They are generally known as the Frontier Districts, Eastern, Central and Western districts, and they were formally brought under administration after the Abor Expedition of 1911-12. Nobody would suggest that they should be brought within the scope of the scheme. They are entirely financed by the Government of India, and not by the Provincial Council, which differentiates them from the other hill districts. They are three comparatively small areas. The rest of the hill districts, which have been under administration for years, will, I understand, be treated as backward tracts, and put under the Council, but subject to reservations. I think that is a satisfactory way to deal with them, and I think that is what the present Chief Commissioner proposed himself.

Lord Sinha.

4440. Do you think there are any special difficulties with regard to Assam, in connection with the introduction of Standing Committees and Council Under-Secretaries?—Well, there would be rather more difficulty than in some Provinces, because very few people live at Shillong. That is the main difficulty. Personally, I never thought much of these Standing Committees they might be useful, but I have not a very high opinion of what they would be able to do.

4441. The Government of India propose to leave both of those matters in the hands of the Local Administration. Do you think that would be a wise thing to do? They may or may not appoint Standing Committees and Council Under-Secretaries, as they think proper?—I do not think, really, that the people will value Standing Committees, which will have no responsibilities, very much, so I do not think it matters very much. I do not think that these matters are at all essential.

4442. I just want to ask, with regard to the Head of the Administration: Have you considered yourself that there is any particular reason why the Head of the Assam Administration—the Governor, as he is called in the new Bill—should invariably be a member of the Indian Civil Service?—I have not thought of the matter at all, as a matter of fact.

4443. Is there any reason—that is what I want to find out from you, if I can—why Assam should be in a different position from other Provinces in that respect? Is there anything in the position of Assam which requires differentiation?—No; if you base the matter on general grounds, I say that Assam should not be differentiated in any respect as regards administration.

Chairman.

4444. I would rather like to pursue that. There has been a great deal of evidence given here expressive of that wish that it should be a very exceptional thing for a Governor to be a member of the Indian Civil Service—that he should ordinarily be a man who has had experience of public affairs in England, and I think that Lord Sinha's question is rather addressed to that point. Is there anything so particular—so special—in the circumstances of Assam that you would consider that usually a Governor from England would not be a suitable person to administer it?—No; I do not think that a Governor from England would not be suitable; but I have not thought of the question. I always assumed that he would be a civilian, for some time to come; but I see no reason to differentiate in that respect. I always thought it would be difficult to get a public man from England to go to a comparatively minor post like that. It did not strike me as a matter of practical politics; but I should not like the provinces to be differentiated at all. If the policy is to recruit Governors from England, I should not like Assam to be differentiated. That is my attitude.

Lord Sinha.

4445. You have considered, have you not, what is known as the scheme of the five Local Governments—or, rather, the Heads of the five Local Governments?—Yes.

4446. As between that and the scheme of the Joint Report, which do you prefer?—I think there is no comparison at all; one conforms with the announcement of the 20th August, 1917, and the other does not. It seems to me there is no question at all about it.

Lord Islington.

4447. You occupied a position in the Central Government, did you not, for some years?—Yes, I was Home Secretary for two years in Lord Hardinge's time and the end of Lord Minto's time.

4448. You have also been connected with the Government of Bengal?—Yes.

4449. In what capacity?—I began as the Board of Revenue Secretary. I then was Secretary to the Government, and, later, I was Director of Public Instruction.

Lord Sinha.

4450. Chief Secretary?—No, I was not Chief Secretary—I went then to the Government of India.

Lord Islington.

4451. As regards the franchise, I assume that you would agree with the proposals made with regard to the basis of franchise for Assam?—I originally proposed myself 25 rupees of revenue. I see that they have brought it down to 15, which makes a larger electorate, but 25, I believe, used to be the Assam standard. I have no objection to 15, and if they can manage that electorate so much the better.

4452. How many more would that mean?—I could not say exactly, but I should say that it would bring the figure down the best part of a hundred thousand; there is a lot of difference between 15 and 25 rupees of revenue.

4453. Would it strike you as being something of an anomaly that Assam should have a more favourable electorate than any other Province in India—a larger proportion of the population?—It does seem rather curious; I do not say that the proposal with regard to Assam is wrong, but it rather suggests that other Provinces have not got large enough electorates. That is the way I look at it.

4454. You say that you would have no objection if it could be worked. From your special knowledge of Assam do you think machinery is available which will efficiently be able to work an electorate of 300,000?—I think so.

4455. You would say that the machinery could be made available for that purpose?—I could not say that for certain, but I take the word of my successor for that. He has already said that he could deal with 300,000, and I assume that it is correct that he could.

4456. How many of those 300,0000 would you say would be illiterate? Could you give an approximate estimate?—I should say that the considerable majority of the people who draw revenue of that amount would be literate. It is impossible to say without going into it, but I think it would be about 75 per cent., if not more.

4457. Would you say that the coolie community in the planting districts would get representation under that?—Oh, no; some of them would, the ex-settlers—people who have been on tea gardens and become settlers, a great many of them would, but the bulk of the labour population would get no part in it at all.

4458. Do you think it important that the labour population should be represented in the new Councils as directly as possible?—I think they should; when I was thinking over the question in Assam I hardly thought that it was practicable. If it were, so much the better. I see that they have put down one labour member to represent the labour force. It is a very large force—the best part of a million people—anyhow, it runs into hundreds of thousands, five hundred thousand, six hundred thousand, or seven hundred thousand. The sooner they are represented the better.

4459. By direct election or by nomination?—They certainly should be represented directly as soon as practicable.

Lord Islington.

4460. You would not say there would be any very appreciable representation under the present scheme?—I do not think that you can say that any indirect representation is very satisfactory but I do not know whom you would get to represent them. You might get somebody who would be useful.

4461. Did you find in your time, when you were Chief Commissioner of Assam, that your work was to any serious extent delayed by the control you were under by the Central Government?—I cannot say particularly in Assam—yes, there were certain cases, educational matters particularly, which were hung up seriously—that is a very bad Department for being hung up, and the Public Works Department also. Those are the two chief Departments in which there were very bad delays.

4462. Was it delay which ultimately resulted in assent or often refusal to accept your proposals?—It was neither the one thing nor the other, but simply delays at headquarters.

4463. Do you think there is room for improvement in that connection?—Enormous.

4464. I am not talking now of those subjects which became transferred, and therefore would be removed from the superior control?—No.

4465. I am talking rather of those subjects which will remain reserved, and will therefore have to come under what I shall call the control of Parliament, which means at present the control of the Government of India?—Yes.

4466. Would you be very brief in telling us the kind of things which might be done to obviate those delays you referred to—the kind of procedure which might be devised? You want a procedure, of course, which will secure what is known as the control of Parliament. There must be some superior control, and what is wanted is procedure which will not perpetually harass and delay urgent local matters. Have you got anything you can tell us on that point?—I have not got a set scheme at all, but the tendency always is in the direction of centralisation. Centralisation always tends to come back. Whatever orders are issued, it does not seem to make any difference, centralisation always seems to come back again.

4467. You do not feel yourself in a position to give us any definite suggestions in that connection?—No.

4468. But you do feel that there is room for very material improvement?—Enormous, and it could be done. It is only a question of working out details. I do not think I could do that sitting here.

4469. Would you say, from your experience in Assam and also in Bengal, that those delays have been the cause of direct and indirect dissatisfaction which has found its reflection through the Province?—Certainly. Things get hung up, and people cannot understand what is happening at all. We do not hear for months and months; we cannot get orders.

4470. Would you regard this as a very important matter, which should be dealt with?—Absolutely very important indeed.

4471. I came in while you were giving your evidence on education; but I understand from your Note that you are in favour of the whole of education being handed over?—I am.

4472. Would you suggest any reservations with regard to that in the shape, for instance, of a Central Board for matters in the direction of Higher Education?—I do not think I would have any reservations, except a reservation in connection with legislation as regards universities. The Provincial Governments would have to get sanction for legislation of that kind, otherwise I would have any control at all.

4473. You would reserve the sanction by the Government of India for legislation?—Yes, and that only.

4474. For new universities, or existing ones?—Generally.

Mr. Montagu.

4475. Do you mean sanction or veto?—Sanction.

4476. Previous sanction?—Yes.

4477. You said just now that you regarded the proposal put forward by the Provinces the alternative to the proposal put forward by the Bill of the Government of India, the Joint Report, as not complying with the announcement of the 20th August?—Yes, as I understand it.

4478. Why do you say that?—Because you cannot fix any responsibility upon anybody, as far as I can see, under that scheme. I read it very carefully, and it did not seem to me to fix responsibility. I do not see how you can get hold of anybody and say, "You are responsible for that particular subject." It would be one unified Government. I do not see how you can lay your finger on any particular person or any particular part of the Government.

4479. You would like to see, in other words, the Minister who controls certain portfolios definitely and individually responsible for those portfolios?—Yes

4480. Would you go so far as, as has been suggested by the witnesses before us, to clothe that Minister with power of taxation for his service?—I understood the Joint Report to say that the Minister alone would be able to tax; that that side of the Government only would have power to tax. I may have misunderstood the Report, but I understood so, and I think it would be a great mistake to go back upon that.

4481. When you say the Minister alone would have the power to tax, do you mean the Minister would have the power to tax for his own particular subjects which he was in control of, or that the Finance Minister should be the transferred Minister, and should undertake that work for the Government?—I mean, supposing there is only one Minister, he would bring in the taxation Bills; if there were two it would be either one or the other, according to the subjects of which they were in charge.

4482. That is what you mean. The Indian Minister who was Minister for Education or for Public Works would on those occasions assume the position of a Finance Minister?—Yes.

4484. Do you think that would be a good arrangement? Do you know any Government in the world which carries out such a practice?—No, I do not; but this is rather a peculiar case— it is a very complicated case. I do not see any other way of doing it.

4485. Do you not see very serious objections to that?—I am afraid I cannot see any alternative; it may be unsatisfactory, but I do not see any alternative.

4486. Would you say or not that it would be to the advantage of good government if you had a Finance Minister in control of his Department dealing with the whole of the finance of the Province, as is the case in all other Governments?—Yes, but it knocks a hole in the scheme at once. I do not see how you can have it. Under the scheme as proposed I do not see how that is possible.

4487. That is what I cannot quite gather—why it knocks a hole in the scheme. I wish you would explain why a practice of that character which is universal in the world should knock a hole in the scheme of the gradual development of constitutional government?—There is to be only one Minister on the reserved side and one on the popular side, and one of those two must bring in Finance Bills. The idea of the Report was that the Minister on the popular side should, and I do not think there is any room for a Finance Minister as well.

4488. You must have a Finance Minister in your Government, must you not? You could not have a Government conducted without a Finance Department and a Minister over it, could you? However, I will not press you further on that point.

Major Ormsby-Gore.

4489. You have read the enclosure with the Despatch of the Government of India by the Chief Commissioner of Assam?—Yes.

4490. In paragraph 24 it says: "To speak freely, I consider that the main defect of the Report is its inadequate recognition of the position of the non-official British community." Do you think that the non-official British community, which, I gather, in Assam is particularly important, is inadequately represented?—Not in the proposal which the Franchise Committee has submitted. They are practically the same as I made myself. I think, then, there are five for the planting community and one for Europeans and Anglo-Indians. I do not think that more would be expected.

4491. This was a modification of the original Montagu-Chelmsford Report?—I do not think it is a modification of the Report.

4492. I see that he rejects the idea of communal representation for many of the smaller communities in Assam like the Ahoms?—Yes, and I think he is quite right there as regards the smaller communities. But I think the landholders (I said that separately) should be represented. There are very strong grounds why they should be, which I can explain if necessary. I have great sympathy with the Ahoms, as they are the conquering race in Assam, but I do not think it is possible now to differentiate them from the Hindoo population.

4493. And the same with the Assamese: Cannot you differentiate them?—The Assamese do not require differentiation, and they are in a majority in the Assam Valley.

4494. In the Legislative Council of Assam what do you think will be the language of discussion? Generally, English, but I would be very glad if it could also be Assamese and Bengali.

4495. Are any proportion of the population bi-lingual—that is to say, bi-lingual in the vernacular—speaking both Bengali and Assamese?—A few, not many.

4496. What, roughly, is the proportion of Bengali speaking and Assamese speaking in the Provinces?—As regards the portions we are speaking of, that is to say in the Plains district, I think about half and half, very roughly.

4497. In this rather formidable-looking map which we had submitted to us I gather that the whole of the red areas are to be treated as backward areas?—That is what I understand.

4498. Does that mean that they would still be more or less under the Executive Council?—No, under the Legislative Council; they come under the Legislative Council, as I understand the scheme; and the Chief Commissioner, the head of the Government, will have power to differentiate and say that certain Acts shall not apply in certain districts. They are backward, of course.

4499. Otherwise, whatever applies to the valleys will apply to them?—Yes. I think that a very sensible proposal. My own idea was that those hill districts would not be able to come under the scheme at all, any of them, and I was very glad to see that the Commissioner has been able to bring them under the scheme. There are only three areas, as I mentioned before, which should be excluded.

4500. And the three you mentioned——?—Those should be excluded, because they were only taken under administration quite recently.

4501. Taking the population in the valley, the proportion of educated persons is high compared with India as a whole?—It is.

4502. Assam in one sense is a very progressive part?—That is what I have always held, but other people have said the contrary.

4503. It has been regarded as a backward Province because of the inclusion of these——?—Partly because of that, and partly because it is cut off. I met officers who came from there long before I went to Assam, who told me that it was ahead of Bengal in many respects, only the people in Bengal did not know it. They had been up there and seen the progress that had been made in Assam.

4504. That is to say there is a considerable proportion of the population of Assam which takes a keen and intelligent interest in public life?—Certainly.

Mr. Bennett.

4505. Has that development in Assam taken place subsequently to, or in consequence of, the application of British capital for the development of the Province?—I do not think so; there has always been a rather progressive movement in Assam as regards education. They have also been rather advanced.

Sir J. D. Rees.

4506. I should like to ask you, Sir Archdale, one question with regard to that quite exploded idea that Assam is a backward Province. May I ask you if its prosperity and its advance has or has not been to a great extent due to the tea industry and the British capital expended in it?—No doubt it has. That refers to the Assam Valley particularly.

4507. That is the most particularly forward portion?—Yes, in some respects.

4508. The immigrants into Assam for the tea industry work in the tea gardens, and settle there?—Yes, a great many of them become settlers.

4509. Are they an intelligent and valuable element of the community?—Very.

4510. In that case the tea industry deserves well of the Province?—Yes.

4511. Arising out of that, I should like to ask you this: You know the proposal is to include amongst the Central subjects dealt with by the Government of India railways and tramways, and to include amongst the Provincial subjects light and feeder railways. I should like to know whether this proposal, which not only arises out of the Bill, but also has to be laid before Parliament, I understand, when it passes the Bill for adoption as a practical part of it, is satisfactory to you, that is, the proposal that the Provincial Government should have the light and feeder railways and tramways other than tramways within municipal areas, in so far as provision is made for their construction and management by Provincial Legislation?—Yes, I should like to see the light railways and feeder railways made Provincial subjects.

4512. They will be so, I gather?—I could not make that out.

4513. I asked you, rather, for light or guidance?—I was rather afraid that they were to be made All-India. I would prefer them to be Provincial.

4514. Would you class the Bengal-Dooars Railway as a light railway?—Yes.

4515. In this allocation of subjects, as you understand it, would it be as feasible as before for a firm of British merchants in Calcutta to arrange for the construction of a railway like the Bengal-Dooars Railway?—Under the scheme?

4516. Yes?—I do not see why it should not be.

4517. Nor I; but I asked you for your authoritative opinion?—I think it would be.

4518. It would be highly important, when private enterprise is equal to that, that it should not be checked in any way?—Quite so.

4519. This railway has been most useful, has it not?—The Bengal-Dooars?

4520. Yes?—But it is not in my old Province.

4521. It affects the tea?—Not Assam tea; Bengal tea.

4522. None of it affects Assam tea?—No.

4523. Similar projects might be made in Assam?—We have got the Assam-Bengal Railway.

4524. Are extensions required for that?—Certainly; and there are several I proposed myself.

4525. They might be made in the same way?—Yes, if they were Provincial; unless they are made Provincial I do not see much hope of development; it takes such ages to get such a scheme through.

4526. There are many tea estates which serve the Bengal-Dooars Railway—or which that railway serves—in the Province of Assam?—The estates which are served by the Dooars Railway are not in Assam; they are in Bengal.

4527. Are none of them in Assam?—No, they are in Bengal.

4528. I do not understand this, and I am sure it is my fault, but in your Paper, in answer to Questions 6 and 7, you say: "I agree with the inclusion in the Bill of power to dissolve the Legislatures, although, in my opinion, the value of this safeguard will at first be practically of no account, as the electorate for some time to come will not be able to apprehend its significance." That refers to the inclusion of the power to the Governor to dissolve the Legislature?—Yes.

4529. Then we should add the words "to the Governor." The value of the safeguard to whom?—To the Governor, if he disapproves of a policy.

4530. It says: "The value of this safeguard will at first be practically of no account, as the electorate for some time to come will not be able to apprehend its significance, nor will its significance be apparent until the responsibility in respect of administration is increased." I should be grateful for a little explanation of that passage?—There must be a cause for dissolving the Legislature, and what I mean is that the people will not understand at first the reason for which it is being dissolved. It will be difficult for them to understand in the early years of the scheme; but as they acquire political experience, they will understand the reasons why Legislatures are dissolved. I think at first that the proposal will not have any very great effect. A new body of elected representatives might come up again with exactly the same proposals which were disapproved of before. The electors would not know exactly why the Legislature had been dissolved.

4531. You would not make any alteration in this?—No.

4532. Do you prefer the Grand Committee Scheme of the Montagu-Chelmsford Report, or of the Government of India as last submitted. Are you satisfied with the proposals of the Report, or do you think that the Grand Commnittee scheme requires the alterations suggested by the Government of India?—It is very difficult to controvert what the Government of India say as regards their proposals in paragraph 9 of their letter. They seem to have looked at every side of the question, and it is rather difficult to go against them and to say that it is possible to do anything else. I should have preferred the Grand Committee proposals of the Report.

4533. You yourself would?—Yes. Of course it is rather difficult sitting here to say whether it is possible to carry that out or not, when they say that it is not possible.

4534. For yourself you prefer them as they are?—I should prefer them as they are in the Report, if it is possible to carry them out.

4535. I wanted to know that. You were Home Secretary to the Government of India?—Yes.

4536. Have you had under your notice the procedure by which the Provincial Governments have the right of direct communication with the Secretary of State?—No, it has not come under my notice.

4537. You state in your Memorandum, "This occasion should be utilised for helping on the cause of women in India." Are the women in Assam—say in the Assam Valley— advanced?—I think they are more advanced than in other Provinces. I think you will find from statistics that there is a larger proportion of literate women in Assam than in any Province of India.

4538. Would those be women from various Provinces —mixed company, so to speak?—Amongst the Assamese themselves pure and simple there are, I believe, many more literate women than in Bengal.

4539. Amongst the Assamese proper?—Yes. And also probably in Sylhet, amongst the Bengali population. I think that is a point which has been commented upon in various Educational Reports.

4540. You referred to the capacity and shrewdness of Indian women in the management of land and so on. Have you observed that generally in your service in India or only in Assam?—Generally.

4541. You go on to say, "In fact it is quite common to find among the Zemindarins one who manages an estate with great success right through her minority as a ward of court." They must be very capable women?—That has been my experience, that they are very capable indeed. The last case I had experience of in Assam was a big estate there belonging to the Maharanee of Bijni. She was not under the Court of Wards at all, and when I got to Assam there was some talk about bringing her under the Court of Wards, but I would have nothing to do with that, and said, "Let her manage her estate, and see how she gets on," and she did very well. She died last year, but she was there the whole of the six years I was there, and I do not think any man could have managed the estate better. She was an exceedingly shrewd woman.

4542. You go on to say, "It goes without saying that British women resident in India who would otherwise be qualified should be entitled to vote"?—Yes.

4543. Do you mean by that that you think the wives of Governors, Chief Commissioners, judges, collectors, colonels and captains should vote? Do you think that they could conveniently exercise that vote.—I was thinking of people who own property. I do not see why the women mentioned should not vote if they like, if they have the qualification; but I was thinking of people in Assam who own tea estates. Why should not they vote?

4544. I see no reason. But, as I read this, it would apply to the wives of the officials?—Yes, and there is no reason why they also should not vote if they wanted to, provided that they are qualified.

Chairman.

4545. If they were qualified?—If they were qualified, certainly. I was particularly thinking of people who owned property in India—the permanent population.

Sir J. D. Rees.

4546. As to the backward tracts in Assam, what are they chiefly occupied by—what class of people? Wild people?—In the Khassia and Jaintia Hills, the people are particularly intelligent, and they are, I believe, the most advanced in the whole of the Province as regards education.

4547. Is that under missionary influence?—Yes, the Welsh mission. That is rather an exceptional district, and there are other districts, like the Naga Hills, which are backward. The Nagas are fine physically built people, but they are backward.

4548. You have expressed a general approval in this paper of the proposals which are embodied in the Bill. Do you think that if they were accepted in very much the form in which the Bill is proposed, with the rules and so on proposed in it, the tea industry as a European industry would be properly looked after, or that it has any cause to fear the adoption of this scheme?—I do not think it has cause to fear it.

4549. I should like to ask about one more matter. You were the head of the Civil Service in Assam, as well as the Chief Commissioner. All the Civil Service were under you there?—Yes.

4550. It has been stated here in evidence that the Civil Service have determined to wreck the scheme, or not to work it. Did you see any proof of that, or any corporate or individual action to that effect amongst the Civil Service under you while you were Chief Commissioner in Assam?—No.

4551. They did not know of this exact and developed scheme, of course, then?—They knew of the scheme.

4553. What was their view?—I think, taking them as a whole, they thought we were going rather fast, perhaps. They were rather conservative, but they were not hostile. I think they thought we were perhaps going rather too fast.

4554. Did you see any signs of any intention to combine to make it impossible?—None whatever.

4555. Would you say, after your long and distinguished service in India, that if the adoption of this scheme led in any degree to impairing the efficiency of the Government as compared with its present efficiency, that would be sufficient reason for not adopting it?—No, I think even if it were less efficient I should go in for the scheme.

4556. Is it the case (again I ask you on account of your long experience) that the people of India as a rule make such a fetish of efficiency as the Indian civil servant does?

Chairman.] I would put it, "as an Englishman does."

Sir J. D. Rees.

4557. "As an Englishman does." Do they take the same attitude in that connection?—The Indian population at large?

4558. The Indian population generally; I do not attempt to distinguish?—I do not think they do attach the same importance to it.

4559. Would they be prepared, do you think, if it should happen, willingly to suffer a slight impairment of efficiency for the sake of having a greater share in the actual management of the government of the country?—It depends on what is meant by efficiency. Take education, I am very keen on that being made over. We think we have been very efficient in respect of education, I presume; but my own opinion is that we have not made a great success of education, and I do not think we have been very efficient. It is rather difficult to judge of what is efficiency. I am very much inclined to believe that a popular Government will make a better job of education than we have done.

4560. You are in favour of complete transfer?—Yes. The general results will be to the benefit of India. I should call it really greater efficiency instead of less; it depends upon how you define efficiency.

Mr. Montagu.

4561. Were you present at Delhi in January, 1918?—Yes.

4562. You heard the deliberations of the heads of Governments amongst themselves?—Yes.

Mr. Montagu—continued.

4563. I think I am right in saying that they all, with the exception of Lord Pentland, at that time were willing to consider a scheme of duality with the Provinces?—Lord Pentland, and possibly Lord Willingdon.

4564. You had left India by the time their definite plan was submitted?—Yes.

4565. Did those powers, in the light of the Conference at Delhi, surprise you?—They did. I could not understand Sir Harcourt Butler's point of view at all. I thought he had accepted the scheme.

4566. Can you tell the Committee anything about what you think would have been your view of your position under this scheme if you had been at this time a young civilian of, say, fifteen years' standing? Do you think it would be difficult for the Civil Service to accommodate themselves to the position in the Provinces?—Personally, I do not. I think it would be more interesting. I always thought an Indian career was one of the most interesting in the world, and I still think so, and I think under this scheme it will be more interesting and attractive.

4567. Have you ever known a time in your service, Sir Archdale, when there were not some members of it who thought the conditions of the service were getting worse and worse?—I think that is always the case.

4568. In all services?—Yes.

4569. I want to take you on one or two questions which Lord Islington was asking you about. Has this ever occurred to you, by way of getting freedom for the Provinces from the control of the Central Government. Supposing you had the option of applying for the sanction of the Central Government for something you wanted to do or getting the sanction of your Legislative Council, do you think something of that kind might obviate delays?—It would in a large number of cases, undoubtedly. I can think of some straight off which I could have settled immediately. I knew exactly what the people wanted, only we were hung up at Simla.

4570. On such an occasion I presume you would go down to your Council and get a resolution passed endorsing your policy, and then say to the Government of India, "It does not concern you, because we have agreed it——"?—Yes, that would have saved five years in respect of a college scheme I had in view, but we could not get sanction, although it would have been given at once by the Legislative Council.

4571. What is the Land Revenue System of Assam?—There is a certain amount of permanently settled are, and the rest of the Province is temporarily settled for 30 or 20 years

4572. Have you been following by any chance the evidence given to this Committee?—I have read what has been given in the Times, but I have not had an opportunity of reading the evidence in full.

4573. Do you realise that very many witnesses have come forward to ask for the transference of Land Revenue?—I have not noticed that particular point.

4574. What would be your view upon that?—It is a subject so closely in contact with the people, that I think it should be transferred as soon as practicable. The same with forests. Forests bring you in touch with the people; there are always points of dispute between us and the people with regard to the use of forests, and so on. Both forests and land revenue should be transferred as soon as practicable. The Assam list has been cut down, and I have objected to that.

4575. Where land settlement is not permanent, and where the land revenue is not on a permanent settlement, enhancements are not the subject of legislation?—No.

4576. Do you think, in its present form, it would be easier to work under the control of the Legislative Councils?—The Land Revenue Administration?

Mr. Montagu—continued.

4577. Yes?—I do not think it would be easier. I think that the Councils would want a great many changes.

4578. Do you think they would immediately make all the land revenue permanent in Assam?—I doubt if they would take that line. I do not think that they would.

4579. Do you anticipate any changes in the Provincial boundaries of Assam at any time? Do you think, if the population had its way, the Assam Province would remain as it is to-day?—If there was a sort of plebiscite, you mean?

4580. Yes. if there was a plebiscite?—I think that the people would be so much divided that the Province would probably stand as it is.

4581. Now I come to the question of finance. Am I right in putting your view in this way: That before there was any taxation at all there would be joint deliberation between all the members of the Government?—Certainly.

4582. And then the Minister would come forward on behalf of the Government and make the taxation proposals?—Yes, that is the idea.

4583. If he refused to do so because it was for a reserved subject the money would come out of the transferred funds?—It might have to come out; it would be a matter for discussion again, of course.

4584. You would have no objection to collective reponsibility for the Minister if there were more than one Minister, would you?—No, I would not object to that.

4585. What it really means, then, is this, that the Ministry of Finance and the Ministry of the Treasury would be separate; it would not be that there would be one Finance Minister and another man taxing. There would simply be the Treasury control on the one hand and the Revenue production on the other?—Yes.

4586. Much as exists to-day in Italy. I have only two more questions to ask you, and the first is this: Sir John Rees asked you to explain what you meant by the electorate not understanding the significance of the dissolution. Supposing there was a dissolution on a particular subject, the election would probably turn upon that?—It ought to, but I do not know that it would at first.

4587. Would not that lie with the candidates? The man who wanted to get in would make it turn upon that, would he not?—Yes, but in the present state of the electorate. I doubt if they would understand. I certainly would not interfere with the provision.

4588. The last question is this: In your answers to the questions circulated to you by the Committee did you not say that you thought there should be no change in the control by the Legislative Assembly over the Central Executive? Does not that occur? I thought I remembered seeing it, although I cannot find it at the moment?—Possibly.

4589. I have found it now; it is in answer to questions 11 and 12: "I accept the principle adopted in the Bill that the time has not yet come to give to the Legislative Assembly a similar measure of control over the Central Government"?—Yes.

4590. The evidence before us from Indian witnesses ever since this Committee first sat has been unanimous, I think, perhaps with the exception of the witness this morning, that something should be done more than the Bill proposes in the Government of India. Do you think there is anything which could be done in the Government of India which you would recommend?—I do not see anything beyond what is proposed by the Bill; I think that is as much as we can do at present.

Sir J. D. REES.
Mr. SPOOR.

THE RIGHT HON. THE EARL OF SELBORNE IN THE CHAIR.

MR. THOMAS EARLE WELBY, is called in; and Examined as follows:—

Chairman.

4591. You come here as representing the European Association of India?—Yes, my Lord.

4592. And you have been good enough to give your answers to the questions we have sent you?—Yes.

Prefatory Note by Witness.—The European Association is the only British political organisation in India, and the largest British organisation of any kind in that country. Its membership includes practically every leading British merchant, trader, planter, and professional man in India, besides British railway employees, factory foremen, and the like. Women are eligible as members. The headquarters of the Association are in Calcutta, and there are organised branches, each with its own elected Committee, in Assam, Bombay, Behar, Burma, Calcutta, Delhi, Darjeeling, Madras, Dooars, Rajputana, Sind, Surma Valley, and the United Provinces, besides a sub-branch at Monghyr, and a partly organised branch in the Punjab.

The evidence now submitted by me is in the main based on the Statement issued by the Council of the Association in November, 1918, after consultation of all branches. Some of the questions now put me, however, were not then before the Association in the definite form now given them. In regard to these latter I am obliged to give only my impression of what the majority of the members of the Association feel and believe, and I have endeavoured to indicate where I am replying in accordance with specific instructions and where I am replying merely in accordance with the general attitude of members as known to me.

1. Do you accept the proposition that it is desirable to bring about the progressive realisation of responsible government in India? and, if so, how do you define the expression "responsible government"? And do you generally accept the proposition contained in the Preamble?—The European Association believes it to be both inevitable and morally right that India should achieve self-government within the Empire; but it is emphatically of opinion that the method and pace of advance towards self-government should be such that order would not be endangered and that the legitimate interests of all classes of British subjects in the country, and especially of the politically helpless masses, would not suffer. By responsible government the Association understands a system of government under which electors competent to judge between rival policies and free to give effect to judgment choose legislators who can call the Executive to order and can themselves be called to order by the electorate; and the Association regards the Executive's dependence, for tenure of office, on the vote of the legislative body as an essential of responsible government. As things now are, and must long remain, in India, the great bulk of the people are utterly incapable of forming a sound opinion on other than purely local questions, and to ignorance is added, in a degree varying in different parts of the country, the hampering influence of caste.

2. Do you think that the realisation of responsible government in the provinces involves the establishment in provincial Legislatures of a substantial elected majority. (Clause 6.)?—The creation of an elected majority in the provincial Legislatures is doubtless a preliminary of provincial responsible government, but a still more essential preliminary is the creation of an electorate both capable and desirous of holding the men it chooses to their responsibilities.

3. Do you think that the non-official members of the provincial Legislatures should possess power to control the actions and policy of the Executive? Do you think they possess such power at present?—The provincial Legislatures must be given more power of influencing the Executive, but whether that influence should be made decisive must depend on the development of the electorates' capacity to control elected legislators.

4. Do you think that there are certain matters or functions of government in the provinces in which at present the provincial Executive must remain responsible to the Secretary of State and Parliament, and must therefore be in a position to enforce its wishes?—Undoubtedly, in all vital matters the provincial Governments must remain for the present responsible to Parliament through the Secretary of State, and must accordingly be enabled to enforce their wishes.

5. If you accept the propositions stated under questions 1 to 4 do you think that the dual form of government embodied in the Bill is the best means of securing them? If not, what are your objections to that feature of the Bill, and by what other means would you attempt to secure the objects in view?—The European Association is not wholly and on principle opposed to the dual form of government. It is, however, deeply impressed by the practical difficulty of working such a system, and especially of working it for any length of time. Its objections have been set out at length in the Statement it issued in November, 1918, but may be briefly summarised here under certain heads: (a) The proposed system is not genuinely educative in responsible government, since the new Indian Ministers are to hold office independently of the vote of the Legislature. It follows that while these Ministers will miss all experience in that art of persuading and managing elected legislators which is indispensable under any truly representative system, the elected legislators will also miss all training in the self-control and power of discriminating between minor and major issues without which Parliamentary Governments would have far too precarious an existence to achieve any large scheme. The proposed system is one under which a Minister's acts when independent of the will of the Legislature for continuance of office are most illogically to be taken as indications and omens of what he would do when made dependent on the Legislature. The system is also one under which every elected member may carry on a vendetta against a Minister without fear of bringing about the downfall either of the individual or of the Government, and it is apparently expected that a fairly long course of this will qualify elected members members to work a system demanding scrupulous abstention from narrow and personal feuds. (b) The proposed system does not admit of the very carefully graduated progress necessary under Indian conditions. It does not, in reality, leave Parliament free to regulate that pace by regard to its estimate of the growth of political capacity in the peoples of India. For, as the European Association contends, when a large number of Departments have been transferred to quasi-popular control, the effective exercise of power in the still reserved Departments will become very difficult and in time impossible. This will result from two simultaneously operating causes: (1) As more Departments are transferred, the authority of the distinctively British-bureaucratic half of the administration will become less and less familiar to the people; (2) the transferred Departments being mainly of a benevolent and popular character, whilst those reserved are fiscal and punitive, the British-bureaucratic half of the administration will become increasingly odious in the eyes of the people. The European Association is convinced that for these reasons, and on account of friction between the two halves of the dual system, instead of a gradual evolution towards self-government, every step of which is taken only as Parliament becomes convinced of India's fitness, there will have to be an abrupt surrender of the reserved powers quite regardless of whether the peoples of India have become competent to undertake heavier responsibilities.

6. If you have any other method to suggest, does it (i) provide possibilities of advance by stages and facilitate the "progressive realisation of responsible government," and, if it does, in what way? (Clause, 2, 3, etc.); and (ii) does it afford means of judgment (a) to the electors, and (b) to the Statutory Commission which is to examine and report on progress, of the success or failure in results of the control exercised by the Legislature and those who represent it in the Executive?—The European Association has not authorised me to place before the Joint Selected Committee any complete alternative scheme. The Association does not consider that the time has come for any comprehensive and radical transformation of the existing system. It is aware that in the present state of India it would be impossible to make Indian Ministers dependent for tenure of office on the will of the Legislature, and for that and other reasons would wish all experiments in dual administration to be postponed. But it is prepared to acquiesce in what seems to it a largely unreal experiment if that unreality is clearly admitted, and the various safeguards it proposed in its Statement of November, 1918, are introduced. Alternatively, it is prepared to acquiesce in any prudent extension of the system whereby Indians are associated with the existing bureaucracy as members of Executive Councils, though it realises that this cannot of itself tend towards government of the Parliamentary type. A great part of the European Association's objection to the scheme is due to its dislike of the idea of a Statutory Commission inquiring into the results of a system whereby the Minister is independent of the Legislature, and inferring from any success achieved under such a system that Indian Ministers would be as successful under a system which made them dependent on the Legislature.

7. If you consider a dual form of government acceptable in principle, are there any points of detail the modification of which you regard as necessary? If so, what are those points, and what modifications would you suggest?—If there is to be any dual government at all, care should be taken to give the Governor the widest possible field for choice of Ministers, and the fullest power to dismiss a Minister who is incompetent, unable to work with the Government, or incapable of securing a very considerable amount of support from the elected legislators. The departments in respect of which Ministers are appointed should not be those misdirection of which would most gravely injure the public; nor should they be those in regard to which British and Indian ideas differ most widely. They should not be so numerous as to leave the British bureaucratic half of the administration in the position of having, ere long, practically none but fiscal and punitive functions.

8. In particular, do you think (1) that Ministers should hold office "during pleasure"—i.e., should be liable to removal if they are unable to support the action decided upon in their department by the Governor, or if they fail to retain the confidence of the legislature (Clause 3 (1)); (2) that the Governor should have power to disregard the opinion of his Ministers if he considers that action in accordance with that opinion is inconsistent with the due discharge of his responsibilities (Clause (3) ; (3) that the Executive Council should in all provinces normally consist of one official European and one non-official Indian (Clause 4); (4) that the Governor should have power to dissolve his Legislative Council (Clause 7 (4))?—(1) Ministers should hold office "during pleasure" if the scheme is persisted in, though the logical course would be to defer the experiment until it can be given reality by making Ministers dependent on the will of elected legislators responsible to an intelligent electorate of considerable size, and including members of all ranks and classes of Indian society. (2) Emphatically, yes. (3) It is, in the European Association's opinion, absolutely necessary that when the Governor is without previous official experience of India, he should have a second colleague with such experience. As regards the racial composition of Executive Councils, the European Association has no objection to Indian Executive Councillors. On the contrary, it would welcome the appointment of Indians as well qualified as the best of those appointed in recent years. But, though I have no definite instructions on this point, I think I shall be expressing an opinion fairly generally held by members of the Association if I say that the appointment of Indians as such will have little or no justification if the present scheme of reform is adopted. It was, I believe, felt by many when Lords Morley and Minto made the innovation that the attempt to introduce racial representation into an executive body was objectionable in principle; but no reasonable European in India could bring himself to oppose the attempt when there was no other way of giving Indians proof of their eligibility for high office. It was also felt, I believe, that to waive, in the case of an Indian, the qualification of previous official experience in India was unwise; though, again, no reasonable critic could press an objection when the number of Indians in the higher grades of the public services was so small. There are now, if the scheme is adopted, to be Indian Ministers, and there are also to be many more Indians admitted to the Civil Service. It seems, therefore, worth considering, though the matter is perhaps not of great immediate concern, whether it will be necessary to reserve an Executive Councillorship expressly for an Indian. I have, however, no instructions regarding this, and merely suggest the question for consideration. (4) The Governor should have power to dissolve the Legislative Council.

9. Referring back to Questions 2, 3 and 4, if your answers to the first and third of these are in the affirmative, and if you think that the legislatures should be given greater powers of control and influence than they possess at present, do you regard the limitations imposed generally by Clause 9 of the Bill upon their financial and legislative powers as (1) suitable, or as (2) unnecessarily severe, or as (3) inadequate to safeguard the responsibilities which the Government owes in the last resort to Parliament (Clause 9)?—I have had no opportunity of consulting the Council and the Branch Committees of the Association regarding Clause 9 of the Bill, but my belief is that the Association would generally approve of the proposed restrictions on the financial and legislative powers of the legislatures. This, however, is not to be construed as implying that the Association would consider the resulting position satisfactory. It apprehends that there will be friction whenever any restrictive authority is applied.

10. In particular (1) do you think that the legislature should have power with whatever limitations

to vote supplies (Clause 9 (2))? (2) Do you accept the plan of Grand Committees as the means of giving to the Government the power to secure essential legislation in the event of their failure to carry their propositions in the Council? If so, have you any modifications of detail to suggest? If not, what other method would you suggest to secure the object in view?—(1) Some power of voting supplies is necessitated by the nature of the experiment, but the proposed restrictions are needed. (2) Procedure by Grand Committee may be cumbersome, and it is not easy to see what benefit results from it. It would appear that, in general, it is better not to disguise the exercise of executive power under the forms of action by a legislative body or section thereof.

11. Do you accept the position adopted in the Bill (Part II.) that the time has not yet come to give the Legislative Assembly a similar measure of control over the Central Government as that given to provincial Legislative Councils over provincial governments?—The European Association is very strongly of opinion that there should be no change whatever in the constitution of the Government of India until the provincial experiment has yielded clear results, and is wholly opposed to any idea of giving the Legislative Assembly power of control over the Central Executive. All parts of the administrative machine cannot be simultaneously cast into the melting-pot without danger.

12. Do you agree that it is advisable none the less to provide for a substantial elective majority in the Indian Legislature (Clause 16)?—The European Association does not approve of a substantial, or of any, elected majority in the Assembly. Where the substance of power cannot yet be conceded, it is merely laying up trouble and ensuring bitterness to concede the shadows.

13. Do you accept the plan of a bicameral legislature as arising out of this, as constituting both a satisfactory machine for the ordinary purposes of legislation and as affording the means to the Governor-General in Council to secure legislation which he regards as essential (Clauses 14, 15 and 16)?—The plan of a bicameral legislature is an elaborate and inconvenient plan for masking the retention of authority which in existing circumstances no one would contemplate transferring or sharing.

14. Do you accept the provisions of the Bill as to the course of legislation in the Indian Legislature (Clause 20 (3) and (4)), or do you regard them as unnecessarily restrictive on the popular will, or as an inadequate means of ensuring to the Governor-General in Council the discharge of his responsibilities?—It will be inferred from my replies to Questions 12 and 13 that the European Association cannot approve of the needlessly complicated and irritating procedure suggested.

15. Do you accept the changes made by the Bill (Clause 21) in the constitution of the Governor-General's Executive Council? If not, what are your reasons, and what modifications would you suggest?—The European Association objects to the alteration whereby only two members of the Governor-General's Executive Council are required to have had 10 years' service under the Crown in India. The fact that an exceedingly difficult, delicate and novel experiment is in progress is a decisive argument against reducing the number of experts in supreme charge.

16. Do you think that the development of provincial autonomy on the one hand, and of self-government in the provinces on the other, involves any modification of the provisions of Sections 2, 33 and 45 of the Government of India Act (Clause 23)?—It has not been possible to refer Clause 23 of the Bill to the Council and the Branch Committees of the European Association for instructions. My belief, however, is that the Association would question the wisdom of giving the Secretary of State in Council such wide and undefined powers, subject only to the somewhat unreal control exercised by Parliament.

17. Do you agree that the gradual realisation of responsible government involves periodical examination of progress by independent authority, and that the provisions of Clause 28 of the Bill are well designed to afford such examination?—Periodical examination of progress is undoubtedly necessary, subject to the reply to Question 6, and there appears to be nothing practically objectionable in the provision made for it by the Bill.

18. Are there any matters which it is proposed in the Bill to deal with by rule which you would suggest should be provided for in the Bill?—I have no definite instructions regarding the matters to be dealt with by rule which the European Association would prefer to see dealt with in the Bill itself; but the general feeling among the Association's members, so far as I am aware, is that matters to be dealt with by rule should be reduced to a minimum.

19. Have you any observations to offer on the Reports of Lord Southborough's Committees and of the Committee on the Home Administration of Indian Affairs?—As regards the franchise proposals of Lord Southborough's Committees, I am instructed to press most strongly for the largest possible amount of communal representation for the peoples of India, and for European communal representation in the Imperial Assembly. I do not think I shall be going beyond my instructions if I say that the European Association would like to see every considerable community which asks for communal representation given it. It is commonly objected to such demands that their satisfaction would perpetuate class or caste distinctions in India. But the right which communities are most aggressive in urging are those which are menaced by other communities, and the provision of safeguards against such menace would do more than anything else to mitigate class and caste feeling. It is difficult to believe that race feeling and class and caste feeling will decline if to the social disabilities of the less fortunate are added political disabilities, and to the social supremacy of the more fortunate is added a political monopoly. With reference to European communal representation in the Imperial Assembly, I am to point out that it is precisely in the Government of India and the Imperial Assembly that questions affecting the communal interests of Europeans will be most dealt with, and that it is absolutely essential for the community to have in the Imperial Assembly spokesmen responsible to a wider electorate and in possession of a more distinctly political mandate than the representatives of European commerce or trade can possess. The community requires men with more leisure and more definitely political aptitude than the nominees of commercial or other specialised bodies will have. It needs freedom to choose men from any and every walk of life, instead of being restricted to members of Chambers of Commerce or other special institutions. The European Association does not aim at numerically large communal representation for Europeans in the Imperial Assembly. It seeks only to have a voice there which shall be the voice of the community and not that of even the most important specialised body.

4593 That is in relation to Provincial Government?—Yes.

4594. Then you say later: "The proposed system is not genuinely educative in responsible government, since the new Indian Ministers are to hold office independently of the vote of the Legislature," and later on you say, "In the present state of India it would be impossible to make Indian Ministers dependent for tenure of office on the will of the Legislature." Why do you say it is impossible? Of course, I am talking of the Provinces?—The feeling of the Association is that the time has not yet come in India where electorates sufficiently large and sufficiently representative of all classes, and sufficiently zealous and desirous of controlling their nominated representatives, can be created. There are individual Indians in considerable numbers capable of taking the fullest part in political life; there are small sections of people equally competent; but when you come to deal with the people in bulk we do not think there is either the interest in responsible government or the capacity for it in the electorates.

4596. Therefore

4596. Therefore we must consider the electorate from the point of view of that Report for the present purpose?—Yes.

4597. You admit that if it were possible to make Indian Ministers for the transferred subjects in the Provinces responsible to the Legislative Council, that would be a very distinct step in the educational process which you favour?—Yes, our feeling is that it would give a great deal more reality. We feel it would involve very considerable dangers at the present time, but at the same time we feel that it would be a real experiment in responsible government.

4599. Is there anything you would like to say supplementary to those answers or to emphasise any particular point?—The only thing which occurs to me as desirable is this. The answers to these questions are necessarily somewhat coldblooded, and I am afraid that the community that I represent in India is often accused of taking a very materialistic view of Indian affairs and of being concerned far more with its material interests than with anything that relates to the welfare and advancement of India. In case that idea should have been put forward before this Committee by any previous witness, or should be put forward by any subsequent witness, I should like, with your Lordship's permission, to say that the community that I represent is in its own way very greatly concerned for the welfare of India and for the advancement of India. Our ideas may or may not be right, but there is truly a great deal of sentiment which, as British people, we are perhaps not very much given to demonstrating, but which does exist in a very real form. Many of the communnity come of families who have served for two or three generations in India; though possibly they may now be engaged in commerce or something, their forefathers have been in the public services in India, and there is sentiment arising out of that. There is also the natural sentiment that grows up among people who have been for years in a country and have been brought into intimate contact with many classes of Indians whom they learn to like and respect and trust in business and in various professions. I should just like to emphasise that one point that it is not the fact that our views, whether right or wrong, are determined simply by regard to our material interests in India.

4600. In your answers you say on page 1, "The Association regards the Executive's dependence for tenure of office on the vote of the Legislative body as an essential of responsible government?—Yes.

4601. As opposed to nominated representation?—Yes.

4602. And you also state the claim for the whole community as distinct from the commercial section of it?—Yes.

4603. I should like you to elaborate that a little?—The feeling of the European Association is that those Europeans who represent commercial or specialised bodies of any kind in the first place have not a definitely political mandate; they come there to safeguard certain economic interests in the main—at any rate, that is the way that they and the bodies they represent have understood matters in the past. It may be within your Lordship's recollection that there have been one or two awkward incidents arising out of that. There was an incident in the Imperial Legislative Council not long ago where the European representative of a certain chamber of commerce took a view which his constitutents disapproved of altogether. We wish to get men with a more definite political mandate, and we wish to have the opportunity of choosing these men from any class, and not merely from the somewhat restricted membership of the specialised bodies. We also wish to be able to get younger men. The kind of man who comes to represent the Bombay Chamber of Commerce, or the Bengal Chamber of Commerce, is usually a man who is the head of a great firm and has become President of the Chamber of Commerce, and is probably within two, three, or four years of retirement. There have been exceptions. At the present moment the Bombay Chamber is represented by a gentleman who, I think, is not more than about 36; but that is a very exceptional case. India being a country where a European does not settle down, we lose the services of these men; they come for two, three, or four years into public life, and then they retire. Hitherto, perhaps, it has not mattered very much, but now I imagine men who will come on the new conditions will accumulate political experience, and we wish to be able to get those men from any other class of the community, wherever we find political aptitude, and we wish them to go there with a definite political mandate.

4604. What is your proposal for giving effect to that desire?—That the European community—and I would include officials as well as non-officials—should be given the right of electing a very limited number of representatives to the Legislative Assembly.

4605. I have not had an opporunity of reading very carefully through the Memorandum, but there are one or two points I would like to ask you about. On the first page you say you believe, of course, in progress to responsible self-government; but you speak of the risk that the legitimate interest of all classes of British subjects might be endangered, and particularly the politically helpless masses might suffer?—Yes.

4606. Are you of opinion that a wider franchise would go to meet that difficulty?—At the present stage we rather doubt whether it would do much. We feel that numbers do not count for very much unless they are accompanied by capacity and desire for exercising the vote.

4607. But do you not agree also that the exercise of politcal power by the people will really be the best educative instrument?—Certainly.

4608. I mean, they have to get the vote?—I think the Association I represent would consider that rather an extreme doctrine.

4609. You state further on here that the great bulk of the people are utterly incapable of forming a sound opinion on other than purely local questions. I do not know whether you have been here during the course of the Committee's proceedings and have heard the evidence which has been given by Indian witnesses?—I have heard some of it, and I have read a good deal of the evidence.

4611. Of course, Sir James's evidence was supplemented by subsequent witnesses, who all expressed the same opinion, and spoke of the extraordinary change which had come over the whole of the Indian people in this matter—that there had been an extraordinary awakening. That has not been your experience?—I think the opinion of the European Association and my own, so far as I have been able to observe personally, is that there has been a considerable increase in the number of educated Indians who are active in politics, and more especially an increase in the number who are active in what may be called a somewhat hostile spirit; but I cannot say that either personally or as Secretary of the Association I have noticed any appreciable increase of interest as far as the masses of the people go.

4612. Has there not been a very extraordinary development of the spirit of nationalism in India during recent years?—That is a difficult question to answer. A good deal depends upon what is understood by nationalism. I think amongst Indians—educated Indians—there has been a considerable increase of feeling that there is something in common between all dwellers in India, but at the same time there is still great force in the old differences and feuds. As regards the masses of the people, I should say the situation has changed very little in the last ten years.

4613. Am I to understand that you suggest that so far as the bulk of the Indian people are concerned there is no real demand for reform?—As far as the bulk of them is concerned there is no demand for self-government or anything approaching it. There is no doubt some vague feeling that progress in certain directions would be desirable; here and there there is that feeling even among the masses.

4614. Practically the whole of the evidence we have had here, both official and non-official, has seemed to indicate that there was a very real desire for responsible self-government throughout the whole of India. You have not found that?—We have not found that, and that is not what our branches and our various officials anywhere report.

4616. I mean the fact that you criticise the proposal for diarchy seems to suggest that you had some possible alternative. Further on, on page 3, you say that your Association "is prepared to acquiesce in what seems to it a largely unreal experiment, if that unreality is clearly admitted." You think the proposal embodied in this Bill is an unreal experiment?—Our feeling in the Association is that the work of Indian Ministers is to be judged as if they had been working this system while dependent on the vote of the Legislature, whereas they will, in fact, have been working independently of that vote for tenure of office. If it is to be inferred from the results of such a periodical inquiry that success in one system is an omen of success in the other, then we object.

4617. Even as a temporary arrangement, which we hope will soon be superseded, you think the experiment is an unreal one?—In that respect.

Sir J. D. Rees.

4618. My honourable friend asked you whether there was a general wish all over the country for some advance in the direction of responsible Government. I take it that it is not the business at all of your Association to know that or to represent it, is it?—I fear I do not quite understand the question.

4619. He asked you whether there was a general feeling all over the country in favour of a democratic advance, but I take it your position is, in your own words, "This Association does not consider the time has come for any comprehensive and radical transformation of the existing system." Is not that the keynote?—That is it.

4620. You have made no investigations into the opinions of the multitudinous inhabitants of India?—In my capacity as secretary, of course, that is not my work, but in other capacities I have had occasion to inquire into this matter.

4621. As editor of the "Madras Mail"?—Yes, in that capacity, amongst others.

4622. May I ask how long you were editor of that paper?—Just over two years.

4623. Am I right in supposing that the "Madras Mail" is the great organ of Europeans in Southern India?—I suppose it may be regarded as such.

4624. Did you hear the evidence of Mr. Wadia or did you read it?—No.

4625. Did you hear one of the witnesses here say, or do you know a witness here said, that if the Brahmins had a free hand the other classes in Madras would be oppressed? Do you wish to say anything about that? I do not wish to ask you if you do not desire to do so?—There is a very strong feeling in Madras among the non-Brahmins that that would be so, and it is the general opinion of Europeans, I may say. It is strongly the opinion of the Madras Branch of the European Association that that would be so.

4626. As a European who has lived in Madras for two years?—I was there eleven years.

4627. And editor of the "Madras Mail" for two years. Do you think it is possible to lump the other classes together as non-Brahmins, with one view and one interest, as distinguished from the Brahmin interest?—There are considrable differences between various sections of the population; but as regards the differences between themselves and the differences between all of them put together and the Brahmins, the former differences are very small compared with the latter.

4628. Do you think the objection to the transfer of subjects and the creation of Ministers is directed to the fact that they will be Indians who will manage them?—I think not.

4629. As a newspaper editor, do you feel that there is an increasing difficulty in India in administering them in the teeth of the public opinion of the most articulate and English educated portion?—I should say there is a considerable increase in difficulty.

4631. You say: "As things are now, and must long remain in India, the great bulk of the people are utterly incapable of forming a sound opinion on other than purely local questions, and to ignorance is added in a degree varying in different parts of the country the hampering influence of caste." You feel that you can commit yourself to that statement on behalf of the great bulk of the people in India? Do you think they would be required, under this scheme, to do more than form a sound opinion on local questions?—Our feeling is that more is being required of them.

4632. In speaking of the hampering influence of caste, do you think that it would be wise of the British Government to pursue the line of most resistance and to take up an anti-caste attitude?—No; the feeling in the Association is that it is not for the Government to crusade against caste, but at the same time it is for the Government to recognise that caste exists as, perhaps, the most important fact in India, and not to ignore it when providing for the representation of the people.

4633. With regard to the reference to the hampering influence of caste, you do not quite take that trivial view of it as would be indicated by those words. "Hampering influence" is not the description you would give of the greatest factor in Hindooism?—No. It is an extremely important factor.

4635. Evidently you do not think it would be very quick?—I do not think it would be quick.

4636. "The Provincial Legislatures must be given more power of influencing the Executive." Is not that being done under this scheme?—Yes.

4637. "In all vital matters the Provincial Governments must remain for the present responsible to Parliament through the Secretary of State." Is not that done under this scheme?—I think so, in the main.

4638. I did not know whether this was meant to indicate something you thought was to be done. They are things which appear to me to be done. "The European Association is not wholly and on principle opposed to the dual form of government; it is, however, deeply impressed by the practical difficulty of working such a system." Is not the whole administration of India permeated with duality in a differing degree? Do not the Government of India and the Provincial Government together manage the whole affairs of the Madras Presidency?—That duality is between bodies drawing their political inspiration from the same source, practically; the racial element does not come into it.

4639. It is duality of a kind?—Yes.

4640. You say, "The proposed system is one under which a Minister's acts when independent of the will of the Legislature for continuance of office are most illogically to be taken as indication and omens of what he would do when made dependent on the Legislature."

I do

I do not quite understand it. Do you care to explain it? Perhaps my colleagues understand it?—Our view is that the Minister is to be independent of the Legislature for tenure of office. Under that system we will assume that he achieves a certain amount of success. At the end of a certain number of years there is an inquiry into his work, and that success is made an argument for putting him into a position where he will be dependent on the vote of the Legislature for continuance in office. It is then expected that he will do equally well under a system in which he has not been tested at all.

4641. Upon the same page, lower down, you say, "The transferred departments, being mainly of a benevolent and popular character, while those reserved are fiscal and punitive, the British bureaucratic half of the administration will become increasingly odious in the eyes of the people." You realise that ex hypothesi the British bureaucratic half will be a disappearing quantity?—Yes.

4642. Which very much qualifies that. Where is the statement of November, 1918. Has that been laid before the Committee?—No, I have not submitted it to the Committee.

4644. You say: "If there is to be any dual government at all, care should be taken to give the Governor the widest possible field for choice of Ministers, and the fullest power to dismiss a Minister." But are not those provided for in the scheme?—There is a feeling in the Association, though no formal instruction has been given to me on the point, that it ought not to be necessary for the Governor to choose an elected member. He might choose a man who could then stand for election. But I have no instructions on the point. It is simply a sort of feeling that the widest possible choice could be given.

4645. You say: "Ministers should hold office during pleasure if the scheme is persisted in." Is not that so arranged? Is it not part of the scheme before the Committee?—Yes, it is.

4646. You say it is objected to demands for communal representation that their satisfaction will perpetuate caste or class distinctions in India; is it any part of the programme of your Association to break down caste and class distinctions in India?—No, it is no part of our programme; it is a matter of more concern to Indians; but to revert to a point I made before, we feel that there must be due recognition of caste in any scheme which is put forward for representative government.

4647. Do you think that insufficient representation is made of Madras commerce—two members for European, two for Indian commerce, one for trade, one for planting. Is that an unfair representation?—I think it might be advantageous to increase it. Of course, I have no instructions from the Association on the point.

4648. The Association has been a strong supporter of planting and other interests right through its existence?—Yes, and that is my information; I have no instructions.

4649. It was stated here by Mr. Yakub Hasan, a gentleman from Madras, that: "There has been a great deal of racial controversy which has created much bad blood amongst official and non-officials, Europeans on one side and Indians on the other. Unfortunately, it was in Madras where the controversy began. The Anglo-Indian Press started it, and the editor of the 'Madras Mail,' who can be said to be the originator of the movement, has carried the poison to a wider circle by becoming the Secretary of the European Association." That has been stated here?—I am not aware of having created anything. I have expressed opinions which existed. I am not aware of creating opinions which did not exist.

4650. Have you carried the Madras atmosphere to Calcutta?—I am afraid I cannot answer that question. I would not be the judge of whether it was a Madras atmosphere.

4651. The atmosphere you found in Madras would be the Madras atmosphere for my purpose, whether or not you created it?—I am only the Secretary of the Association. The Association has branches all over

India, and the Council in Calcutta is much influenced by what it hears from Bombay and the United Provinces and other parts of the country.

4652. True, but is it not equally true that the total membership was about 800 till you took it up, and became 8,000 directly afterwards?—That is a very large exaggeration; but it did increase.

4653. There is an element of truth in it?—It is not all since I became Secretary; it began to increase before I became Secretary.

4654. It is the case that the feeling between Indian and English merchants was friendly?—Yes.

4655. And apparently it is not now?——

Chairman.

4656. Do you assent to that proposition that it is not so now?—It is not as friendly as it was.

Sir J. D. Rees.

4657. It has been given in evidence here with regard to the Central Government, that by merely transferring new subjects in the Provinces to the control of a Minister or Ministers, it cannot be claimed that substantial steps in the direction of the progressive realisation of responsible government in India have been taken; do you agree with this Madras witness?—We think the changes are very considerable and very important.

4659. From this point of view, for instance. At the present moment the Central and Provincial Governments are equally concerned in administering all subjects. Certain subjects will be transferred in which the Central Government previously had their say, and a very large say. Now they will not have it. Therefore, is not the subject which the Central Government previously partly administered now transferred to a Minister, and to responsible government?—Yes.

Lord Sydenham.

4660. May I take it that the European Association agrees that it is our duty to lead India towards self-government?—Yes.

4661. But it considers that the process should be one of evolution?—Yes.

4662. Now, do you consider the Bill as it stands to be evolutionary or revolutionary?—Our opinion is that in many respects it is revolutionary.

4663. I think you say in your note that the dependence of the Executive for tenure of office on the vote of the Legislative body is an essential of responsible government?—Yes.

4664. I suppose you are aware that the founders of the Constitution of the United States determined that should not be so?—Yes.

4665. Therefore the United States does not possess the form of responsible government for which it is claimed in our evidence that India is already perfectly fit?—That is so.

4666. If in an Indian municipality the president was liable at any time to be turned out by a vote in the municipality, would not very great difficulties of administration arise?—Undoubtedly.

4667. With regard to a question which Sir John Rees asked you, there is not the slightest analogy, is there, between the diarchy as proposed in the Bill and any federal system existing in the world, or the present system or the future system in India?—As far as I know, it is totally without parallel.

4668. I think you said that the European Association lays special stress on safeguarding the interest of what you call the "politically helpless masses." Do you consider those interests are adequately safeguarded in the Bill?—No.

4669. It has been said that caste has no political significance in Bengal. Is that your view?—The view of the Association, which has its headquarters in Calcutta, and which also has a Calcutta branch, and may therefore be supposed to know Bengal well. is that caste is of considerable importance in Bengal, although not so important as it is in Southern India.

4670. Under the proposals of the Franchise Committee, will not a large part of the electorate be illiterate, and therefore easily susceptible to false statements?—Certainly.

4671. And you therefore advocate communal representation for all communities which earnestly desire it, in order that those communities may be represented by their own people, who know and who share their interests?—Yes.

4672. Do you see any difference in principle between communal representation for Mohammedans, Europeans and Indian Christians, which is given, and communal representation for non-Brahmin Hindoos?—None at all. We consider the two claims should be treated alike.

4673. Do you feel strongly that, in the present conditions of India, communal representation alone can secure an influence in affairs for the lower castes?—It is very difficult for the lower castes, even with communal representation, to secure any considerable influence in affairs.

4674. You have given in your notes very strong reasons against the establishment of diarchy in the Provinces. Do you know if there is any such system in any country in the world?—No.

4675. Therefore we may take it that it is an experiment with nothing to support it, and all the arguments for it are pure conjectures?—That is the view of the Association.

4676. Your view is, further, that it does not even give a popular Minister any real training in what is called responsible government?—That is a very strong point in the Association's case—or perhaps I should say it is a point to which it attaches great importance. It is felt that the experiment does not even do what is claimed for it, quite apart from whether it would be desirable to do it or not. It is felt that the Minister who is independent of the vote of the Legislature for tenure of office will be free to display on certain occasions a moral courage which he would not display if he were dependent. On the other hand, it is also felt that members of the Legislature will have no training in that discipline and in that power of discriminating between major and minor issues which is required in every proper Parliamentary body. It will be free for any member of the Legislature to indulge in wanton attacks on a Minister without fear of bringing about his downfall or of bringing about the downfall of what is called the Ministry.

4677. I suppose that you are aware that some of the most capable men in India with the greatest knowledge of affairs will never submit themselves to an electorate?—That is so.

4678. And it follows from that that one result of diarchy may be that it may be impossible to find a popular Minister who is qualified to deal with the very difficult subjects which it is proposed to transfer to him?—The view of the Association is that it is quite probable.

4679. Is it not the case in this country that with some exceptions during the war, due to expert qualifications, Ministers always have some preliminary training before they are placed in charge of a great Department?—Undoubtedly.

4680. They generally begin as private secretaries or Parliamentary under secretaries, so that they may be able to prove their capacity before they become members of the Cabinet?—I understand that is the process.

4681. Now how could that educative process be secured in India?—There is no provision made for it.

4682. You are strongly of opinion that the Government should have a wide power of selection in the choice of its popular Ministers?—Yes.

4683. Do you agree that the success which is attained in some native states in administration is due to the careful selection of trained men?—Yes.

4684. You have seen the proposals that the two halves of Provincial Governments are to have separate purses, and that the contribution to the Government of India is to be made only from the reserved purse? What do you think of that proposal?—I have no definite instructions—no definite and formal instructions—from the Association on that point, but there is a very general feeling in the Association that the financial proposals would prove extremely difficult to work whether there was a joint purse or whether there was a common purse.

4685. Do you think it is likely that a popular Minister will ever propose increased taxation?—I should think it unlikely.

4686. He would cease to be popular if he did, would he not?—That is our view.

4687. You have said in your note that the Executive Council would have charge only of the least popular services. Do you mean because its function will in time, if not at once, become mainly revenue collecting and policing?—That is the view of the Association.

4688. Do you think that for some years, at least, any action which the masses may not like will be attributed to the British Government?—We fear that that is one of the dangers, but it is extremely difficult to predict what view the masses will take of this dual system.

4689. Having been accustomed in the past to look upon everything as coming from the British Raj, do you think at first it will be able to make a nice discrimination between a popular Minister and the Executive?—It is one of the things which we fear that they will not rightly distribute responsibility between the two halves of the Administration.

4690. In the past non-official Europeans have practically found very little time to consider political questions?—That is so.

4691. I gather that they now realise that their interests are at stake, and they must secure adequate and capable representation for those interests in the Legislative Council?—Yes; there is a strong feeling on that point.

4692. Of course, you are aware of the attacks which have been made upon the European commercial community?—Yes.

4693. It has been threatened with extinction, has it not?—It has.

Chairman.] By whom?

Lord Sydenham.] Newspapers and speakers.

Chairman.

4694. (To the Witness.) By whom?—It is difficult to give specific instances, but I will try and find some for the Committee.

4695. I think you must?—I will endeavour to do so.

Lord Sydenham.

4696. In Bengal, is there not a very large amount of Indian capital invested in British undertakings?—I believe so. I am not very familiar with Calcutta.

4697. So that, to some extent, the European commercial community represents Indian interests?—It does.

4698. The National Congress in Bombay last year said this: "Our conviction has been that our industrial backwardness has been positively encouraged in the interests of British manufacturers." Do you know of any basis for that statement?—I am not aware of any basis at all.

4699. Is there anything to prevent Indian enterprise being started in India?—I have never heard of anything hampering them.

4700. Did not the Government encourage the Tata Iron and Steel Works?—I have always understood that they received great assistance from the Government.

4701. Do you know that the Tata Hydro-Electric Works are Indian to-day, solely because of my personal action?—I am aware that your Lordship took a great interest in the matter.

4702. Were you in India when the failure of some twenty or thirty Swadeshi institutions occurred, in some cases showing gross fraud by which people were ruined?—Yes.

4703. Would not the effect of that be to discourage Indians from putting their money into Indian undertakings?—It would.

4704. This Committee has been informed that very large concessions made to English firms ought to fall into Indian hands as having been built up by the Government on Indian money by taxation. Do you know what concessions are referred to?——

Chairman.] What evidence was that?

Lord Sydenham.]

Lord Sydenham.] I have not the reference for the moment, but I can give it.

Witness.] I am not aware of any.

Lord Sydenham.

4705. Were you in Madras when the original Home Rule League was formed in 1915, at a critical period of the war?—Yes.

4706. We have evidence that the object of the League was to strengthen the hands of the Empire. Did you notice a strengthening process during the war?—I could see no signs of it.

4707. Was not the agitation which then began somewhat embarrassing to the Government?—It caused the Local Government very much embarrassment and anxiety.

4708. We have been told that the members of the League took a great part in the war. Are you aware what the League did in that direction?—I never saw any results from it.

4709. There are now three Home Rule Leagues which have sent deputations to give evidence to us. Do you think they all have separate organisations covering India?—I should imagine the membership overlaps, but I am not familiar with their internal arrangements

Chairman.] If you do not know, say so.

Lord Sydenham.

4710. Did you read the Report of the Rowlatt Committee, on which two distinguished Indians sat?—Yes.

4711. Is it there stated that Madras was quite tranquil till Mr. Bepin Chandra Pal supervened. Can you coroborate that?—Yes, I was in Madras at the time.

4712. We have been informed that the Home Rule League prohibited students from taking part in its activities. Do you know whether students have been used for political purposes in Madras?—I have heard of their being used, but I have also heard of many speeches made by Indian leaders deprecating the use of students in such movements.

4713. Have you heard the evidence which has been given to us as to the formation of unions of factory workers in Madras?—I have read some of the evidence on that.

4714. Did labour disturbances occur in Madras last year, and were the Buckingham and Carnatic Mills singled out for trouble?—Yes.

4715. Are they the only British-managed mills in Madras?—They are the only important concerns of that nature.

4716. Are the conditions of labour there which their managers provide for their workmen greatly superior to those in Indian mills?—I have always understood that they were the best-managed mills in the whole of India as far as care for the comfort of workmen and health of the workers went.

4717. Apart from the details of the Bill, what is the feeling of the European community in India, official and non-official, towards schemes for transferring the control of Indian affairs from the agencies, European or Indian, which have hitherto been responsible, into the hands of a small number of Indian intelligentia and their supporters and advisers in India?——

Mr. Montagu.] Is that a fair question, Lord Selborne? I really put it to you. I quite appreciate Lord Sydenham asking Mr. Welby his opinion on the Bill, or the principle of the Bill, but he first states what his opinion of the Bill is and then asks a question on it.

Chairman.] It is too much the practice of members of the Committee to state their own opinions, and ask if that is the fact, and I hope that that will not be continued. But I think Mr. Welby understands the general nature of the question and can give a short answer to it.

Witness.] If I may answer very briefly, I think that the European community, apart from the merits or demerits of any particular clause of the Bill, feels that the work of administering India is being taken away from the classes who have been responsible for it, and have proved themselves capable, and is being gradually handed over to classes that in the past have shown very little administrative aptitude, though some of them may have shown considerable aptitude for certain forms of political activity. There is a very strong feeling amongst Europeans in India, which I would state with great deference and respect, but I feel bound to express it, that Parliamentary control of administration in India, if I may use the term, is rather a fiction. There is a feeling that the average Member of Parliament, owing to pressure of other work and absence of direct knowledge of India, is not disposed to interest himself systematically in Indian affairs. I have heard considerable comment lately on the fact that when the Right Honourable the Secretary of State was speaking in the House of Commons on this Bill there was so poor an attendance in the House. The feeling is very strong out there that the average Member of Parliament does not sufficiently interest himself in India, and that the class of Englishman who has interested himself in India, the class in the Services, is to be eliminated.

Lord Sydenham.

4718. May I take it from you that the British community in India has no prejudices whatever against reforms in India, and acknowledges that they are necessary?—It is prepared to see very considerable changes in regard to decentralisation, increased employment of Indians in the public services, and certain other matters.

4719. It acknowledges the necessity of considerable changes?—Yes.

4720. But it is alarmed at some of the proposals which are now made in the Bill?—Yes.

Lord Brodrick (Viscount Midleton).

4721. Sir John Rees asked you one or two questions suggesting that your Association in some of their proposals were in some way attempting to undermine caste. Was that the intention in any way of your proposal?—No. The European Association feels that it is not for it to attempt to meddle with a matter like caste; all it desires is that when Parliament or the Secretary of State frame proposals for great constitutional changes, full account shall be taken of caste as a factor.

4722. You press strongly for communal representation?—Yes.

4723. I presume the more you perpetuate communal representation the more you perpetuate distinctions of creed and caste?—That has often been put to us, but the feeling of the Association is that when you safeguard people in their communal rights they are less zealous in asserting them, and that there is less likely to be bitterness and more likely to be understanding between the various castes and sections of the community if all have adequate representation.

4724. In other words, the more you perpetuate communal representation the less you are attacking castes. Is that so? What Sir John Rees suggested to you is no part of your programme at all?—It is no part of our programme to assail caste or to defend it.

4725. You regard the transfer of these powers as dangerous, because it is impossible for Ministers at present to be dependent on the vote of the Legislature?—Yes.

4726. Therefore, would you think it equally dangerous to delegate more fully less powers?—I think that would meet with the approval of the Association, but the question in that form has not been before my Council, and I have no very specific instructions on the point. But my feeling is that the Association would prefer a fuller transfer of smaller powers.

4727. Could you give any indication what sort of powers you would include in the fuller transfer of smaller powers?—Beyond local self-government I am afraid I could not venture. I have no instructions on the point, and I cannot give my personal opinion.

4729. We have had evidence from leaders of opinion in India that this Bill will not be satisfactory unless the the Governor exercises control of less powers rather than the more powers which are given. Your Association holds the opposite view?—Yes.

4730. You have said certain of the best men in India will not submit themselves to the electorate. Did you mean Indians?—Yes.

4731. And that is, I suppose, one reason why you ask for communal representation for the British?—Yes.

4732. You think that some of the best British men as well as Indians would not submit themselves to a popular electorate?—To a general or mixed electorate?

4733. Yes?—I do not think I would say that about the British community.

4734. I want to make sure whether you meant both. For instance, leading British merchants standing in Bombay?—There would be some objection to their standing; they would feel some objection, because they would know it was pretty well hopeless; but there would not be any racial feeling in the matter.

4735. Do you expect, short of full self-government, that any powers which are included in this Bill will cause agitation to cease for a period before they are reconsidered?—I am sure that agitation will not cease.

4736. Therefore in any case agitation must be counted with?—The volume of it may increase or decrease, but some agitation there is bound to be in India.

4737. For that reason you think it desirable to part only with the powers which can wisely be handed over?—Yes; that is the feeling of the Association.

Mr. Montagu.

4738. Do you know anything of political life in this country?—A very superficial knowledge.

4739. Have you ever heard of agitation ceasing in this country?—No.

4740. There was one observation which you made to Lord Midleton that you thought, although you had no authority to say so, your Association would welcome a transfer of fewer powers but more fully than in the Bill. Would you be kind enough to say exactly what you mean by a fuller transfer?—May I refer you to that criticism of ours as regards what we call the unreality and lack of educational value in the experiment? If there are ten subjects which are available for transfer I think the European Association would prefer to take those two which can be transferred with an absolute minimum of outside interference and control, and let the experiment be more real, although more limited—over a smaller area, but more real.

4741. You would keep the same powers of interference with the Minister, but you would choose subjects which would make it unlikely that they would have to be used?—That is so.

4742. Were you Secretary of the Association when this final opinion was written, in November last?—Yes.

4743. That is published in the Blue Book?—Yes.

4744. A very large portion of that Memorandum is taken up with a demand for communal representation for Europeans?—Yes.

4745. Since then Lord Southborough's Committee has reported?—Yes.

4746. And has recommended communal representation?—In the Provinces.

4747. Therefore that modifies to some extent that Memorandum?—It does.

4748. A very large part of your Memorandum, and this one too, I think, if my recollection serves me right, is objecting to the Ministers being independent of the vote of the Legislature?—From the point of view that it is not sufficiently educative.

4749. How do you mean independent of the vote of the Legislature? Do you mean the fixed term of office that was suggested in the Report?—That is what was originally taken objection to in November.

4750. That disappeared in the Bill?—It has disappeared in the Bill.

4751. And therefore to that extent your Memorandum is modified?—To that extent it is modified.

4752. You also said that a Governor should have the widest choice in selecting Ministers?—Yes.

4753. And you suggested, as your own personal view, I think, that he might take people from outside if they could find election afterwards?—Yes.

4754. Will you take it from me that that suggestion and modification is in the Bill?—Yes.

4755. That to some extent modifies your Memorandum?—Yes.

4756. May I have a little information about the European Association? Is it fair to say that its members are mainly engaged in commerce?—Yes, commerce and trade, taken together.

4757. How far are they the owners of Indian businesses, or how far do you think they are representative of trades or businesses in this country?—It would be very difficult to answer that accurately. A very large proportion of them are either partners in or assistants in commercial houses, with probably several branches in India, and with a head-office in London. That is as regards the commercial element. As regards the trade community, they vary, from the larger concerns which may be incorporated in England to small local concerns, and many of our members, of course, are railway employees, or employed as directors of labour in factories in industrial concerns. I am afraid I could not give you any more accurate answer.

4758. It may be said with truth that they never, or hardly ever, settle in the country?—A very small proportion of them settle in the country.

4759. May it be said with truth that they never remain there except for the purposes of business? They never stop in retirement?—A very small proportion. Amongst our poorer members, of course, there are those who settle down in India.

4760. Supposing efforts were made to get from among numbers of the European Association Executive Councillors or Ministers, do you think it would be easy to find them?—I do not think it would be easy, but I think they could be found. I am afraid it would not be easy.

4761. Generally speaking, is it fair to deduce from your answer that the commercial work of India has been in the main built up by men only in India for the conduct of their business concerns, and leaving it afterwards?—Yes, but leaving their works behind them.

4762. I quite appreciate that. They have built up the trade?—Yes.

4763. They have founded that enormous part of the wealth of India?—Yes.

4764. That is a condition which obtains in no other country?—I cannot think of any real parallel.

4765. It is a problem peculiar to India?—I should think so.

4766. Therefore it is not much use arguing from other countries about India, because it is so different?—That is so.

4767. That relieves me of the necessity of taking you through the analogy that was suggested to you between the United States and India, unless you feel that there is still some analogy between them?—I do not think there is anything I wish to say.

4768. Now, has the European Association, or any members of it that you are aware of, ever been associated with Indians in trying to find expression for their political aspirations?—A certain number of members were at one time, I think, either under the advice of or with some assistance from Mr. Curtis, associated with certain Indian gentlemen.

4769. That was quite recent?—Yes.

4770. Is that the first attempt that has ever been made?—Of course, there have been Europeans—I do not think any of them were members of the European Association—who were associated with the Congress movement from the very beginning, but I am not aware of any other.

4771. They might be counted on the fingers of one hand?—I should think so.

4772. Is it fair to say that until recent years they have had no political life at all?—The Europeans?

4773. Yes?—None till of recent years, except for the great agitation at the time of the Ilbert Bill.

4774. I should think it is fair to say that they did not want any political life?—Of course, most of them have not been accustomed to it in the past, and it is circumstances which have stirred them into political life now.

4775. Supposing

4775. Supposing India ever became self-governing, it would be on the government of a self-governing India that their prosperity would depend?—I presume so.

4776. And, therefore, they would have to take a part in political life?—Yes.

4777. Is it the fact that the Brahmin and non-Brahmin feeling in Madras has been getting more strained of recent years?—I think so.

4778. What happened when it became so inflamed; were there any efforts made by Europeans, who were neither Brahmins nor non-Brahmins to try and bring the parties together?—I am not aware of any Europeans who took up that difficult work of trying to make peace between them. I am aware of Europeans, who for a long time carefully avoided seeming to take any sort of side in the matter. If it is not unseemly I may mention that I myself, as editor of the "Madras Mail," for a long time refused to publish letters touching this controversy.

4779. Do not answer this if you do not want to, because you can only know it from hearsay—do you know that the Government of Madras made any public effort?—I am not aware of public efforts. I am aware that various members of the Government of Madras very much regretted the situation.

4780. You said that so far as your European Association was concerned—I think the words you used were the branches of your Association—they do not report that there has been any change in the masses in the last ten years?—Nothing appreciable.

4781. That interested me for this reason. Does your Association make it its business to report on the political changes in India?—The various branches are in constant communication, and have been more particularly in the last two years—I do not think there was very much reporting done before—with the Council, through the Secretary, on all local developments which seem to them of interest, and are also constantly being questioned by us, from headquarters, in regard to their opinions on various matters which are coming up.

4782. How do you get their information? are they in touch with the masses? I always understood that they were very busy business men?—Of course, the headquarters of a branch would usually be at some industrial centre, but its membership is scattered all over the Province or Presidency, and it is open to any member to volunteer information to his Committee, and it is also open to the Committee to try and get information from its various members.

4783. Is it true to say that the political agitation in India was for a long time confined entirely to the towns?—I should say that it was almost entirely. There may have been a certain amount of rural activity, but I cannot think of any at the present moment.

4784. Is it not true to say that now it is spreading to the villages?—In some parts of the country it appears to be spreading a little.

4785. That would betoken a change in the masses, would it not?—I do not think it is a change in the masses; it is the emissaries of the new movement going out into the villages.

4786. That is how political thought is always spread, by leaders who go about?—As far as our information goes this was started in order to provide an answer to the criticism that the masses were not with them.

4787. Is not that the same course which you would take if such a criticism were made against you? Would you not go and convert the masses?—It is a question whether it is a conversion.

4788. Well, it is an attempt to convert?—My point is that the holding of a meeting at a place where the people do not in the least desire a meeting does not betoken much change on the part of the real local feeling.

4789. One word about communal representation. Do you believe that those who are opposed to communal representation are anxious to prevent the representation, let us say, of non-Brahmins?—No, I do not think so.

4790. Do you think it is their desire that the Legislative Chamber should be full of the representatives of Brahmins only?—Excuse me—I should like to know whom you refer to as being opposed to this? Is the reference to officials and responsible authorities, or is it to Indian politicians

4791. Well, I was referring partly to the authors of the Report?—I have no doubt the authors of the Report are concerned to get the best representation they can for the people.

4792. I come now to the politically helpless: what is the best way to help them—to make them politically helped?—Our view is that without communal representation they will not feel that there is any inducement to try to get into politics—it will seem to them so hopeless a project.

4793. But it is by some form of vote that they must cease to be politically helpless?—That and education are the only two methods.

4794. And the vote is more important than education, is it not?—Our view, I think, would be that a certain amount of education must precede any use of the vote.

4796. Such things as sanitation and local self-government?—I do not remember hearing any very shrewd views about sanitation or Indian politics.

4797. I may be too theoretical, but a man would know whether his house was well drained or not, even if he could not read or write?—That is quite possible.

4798. I think Lord Sydenham suggested to you, and you agreed, that at first the public, who had been so long accustomed to attribute everything that came to them to the British Raj, would find it very difficult to believe that it was not due to the British Raj that something new happened under the new system?—Yes.

4799. That would happen whenever you make the change?—Yes.

4800. It is a fence we have to leap to-day or one day?—So long as the people are more or less illiterate they will go on for it may be weeks or years after a change ascribing acts to the old authority.

4801. Do you not think you will find candidates coming along who will explain what magnificent things they have done, which will go a long way towards educating them?—Hitherto, as far as I know, candidates in India have not gone in much for recounting their services or for declaring any particular policy.

4802. Might not that be largely caused by the fact that their powers were so limited that they could not write on their banners anything which they had achieved?—There may be something in that.

4803. You made a suggestion, I think, that the officials should have a vote in the general electorate?—In the European communal electorate.

4804. For the Legislative Assembly. Have the officials themselves suggested it?—I have heard it discussed informally.

4805. You were editor of the "Madras Mail" when the Pronouncement of the 20th August was made?—Yes.

4806. What was the view that your paper took then of that Pronouncement?—On the whole, we welcomed it.

4807. You have made some very interesting remarks, if I may say so, upon the apathy of Parliament towards Indian affairs. Have you considered the question of the Select Committee on Indian Affairs that was suggested in the Report?—There has been a good deal of discussion in the European Association. Unfortunately, I have not been able to obtain any definite instructions on the point, so I am not in a position to say definitely that the Association is for or against it at present.

4808. My last point is this: In your Memorandum you are very emphatic that you want to make no alteration whatever in the Government of India?—That is our feeling.

4809. Were you in Madras when the Government of India moved to Delhi?—Yes.

4810. Did you approve of that change?—We did—the paper did.

4811. Do you think that there is anything in the criticism that the Government of India is divorced from public opinion and is isolated?—I think there is something in it, but I am not in a position to say what the views of the European Association on that point are.

4812. Do you think that might possibly to some extent be cured by enlarging the Legislative Council at at Delhi?—I should say it is not so much a question of enlarging it as of seeing that it is fully representative of all important classes.

4813. Can you conceive any circumstances in which twenty-seven elected members would be tolerable any longer as representative of large Legislative Councils in the Provinces?—I should think some increase is necessary; but our objection to change related to the constitution of the Executive.

4814. You do not want any change in the constitution of the Executive?—No.

4815. You do not want any alteration in the number of the Executive Council?—That is so.

4816. You disapprove of that section which gives elasticity of number?—There is no desire for it. The Association wishes as little as possible to be done to the Government of India. Of course, it would not make trouble over any proposal to add a few members to the Imperial Legislative Council. That is another matter.

4817. Have you read the Report of the Industrial Commission?—Yes.

4818. You remember it suggests an extra member for development of industries?—Yes.

4819. Do you approve of that?—I do not think there would be any objection to it.

4820. You realise that if anything of that kind wants to be done now, under the present state of things it cannot be done?—We would not object to a change of that sort in the constitution; what we are thinking of is the powers and the authority

4821. You think it would endanger the British authority over Indian Imperial concerns if there were any change in the powers?—We think that, and we also think that while the experiment is going forward, if it is to go forward, in the Provinces, the guiding body, or the superior body, should not itself be changed.

4822. You do not want permanently to stop short at the Provinces?—Oh, no.

4823. But you think even the control of copyright or archæology, or any little tampering——?—No; those are minor matters.

Lord Sinha.

4824. Your paper was favourably disposed to the scheme of the Joint Report when it was first published in July, 1918?—I ceased to be editor of the paper at the end of June, 1918, and I went to Calcutta.

4825. The paper itself was in favour of the scheme laid down in the Report, is that so?—To some extent it was.

4826. And it was inclined to find fault with that section of Indian opinion which considered the scheme unsatisfactory, was it not?—I think that is so.

4827. And it agreed with the other section of Indian opinion which was prepared to accept that scheme, and considered their action and policy wise?—I am afraid I have not a very clear recollection what the paper said after I left it.

4828. Are you aware that that policy has changed subsequently, and that having begun with approval of the scheme it ended with condemnation.. Is that the fact?—My memory is very vague, because I had ceased to be concerned with the paper itself, but my impression is the paper rebuked those who said the scheme was nothing at all, nothing to be thankful for, and at the same time reserved liberty to assail particular portions of the scheme.

4829. You are not aware of any change in policy in the paper so far as the scheme is concerned?—No; I do not think so.

4830. In your answers, you say that your Asociation believes it to be both inevitable and morally right that India should achieve self-government within the Empire. That is the answer to the first question?—Yes.

4831. By self-government does the Association understand responsible government?—Yes, of some sort.

4832. Responsible government of the kind that you are familiar with in this country?—I think that the general feeling in the Association is that it is impossible, at any rate for the European Association, to predict what kind of full self-government will eventually suit a country like India, but some form of self-government.

4833. Do they accept the policy announced on the 20th August, 1917, that a responsible government is the goal of British policy in India?—Oh, yes.

4834. Responsible government for India?—Yes.

4835. Did they understand by that responsible government as understood in this country or responsible government of some different kind?—It is difficult to answer for 8,000 members, but I think the thing was not scrutinised with a view to any particular form of self-government. It was the idea of eventual self-government for India which was accepted.

4836. Do I understand it was their view that by responsible government nothing in particular was meant—no form of government in particular was meant?—The principle of responsibility.

4837. Yes, but I am putting it to you as to what your Association considered to be the meaning of that announcement. Did it understand that the policy of the Cabinet and the policy of Parliament was to endow India with a form of responsible government such as is known in this country?—A form of responsible government presenting some likeness to this.

4838. But in some respects unlike?—Very probably.

4839. I want to know what they understood, if you can tell me?—I am not aware of any member of the Association who created a Constitution out of that announcement.

4840. May I take it that they did not consider that any particular form of Constitution was in contemplation when that announcement was made?—That is so.

4841. Did you consider that was the Indian view also—that they also did not contemplate any particular form of government as being in contemplation when that announcement was made?—I should think that many educated Indians regarded it as implying that eventually something more or less closely resembling the British Parliamentary system would come into existence.

4842. More rather than less?—Undoubtedly more rather than less.

4843. They thought the policy announced was that at some time or other the form of government in India would be a popular form, in which the people would have the control over the Executive?—Yes, so far as I could gather from the Indian Press, that was so.

4844. That is what I meant—I am asking for the Indian opinion. Did the European Association take a different view from that of the Indians or did they take the same view?—The European Association did not at that time go into the question of exactly what Constitution would emerge from this announcement.

4846. I am not asking you that. I know they have not, otherwise it would have been before us. But do they contemplate that there is any particular form of government or Constitution that is to be framed if the policy announced is to be carried out?—We are concerned at present only with certain early steps in the matter which we have criticised and in regard to which we have made suggestions.

4847. Do you refuse to contemplate the goal announced? A goal implies something more than early steps, as I understand it?—We have not been able as an association to decide what in our opinion the final steps should be.

4848. I am not asking you that. Do they now, after the lapse of more than two years, contemplate what is to be the goal of the policy for which you say some of the earlier steps have to be taken now, or would they rather not contemplate so far into the future?—I think they would rather not look so far into the future.

4849. And they have not done so?—As an Association, no.

4850. As individuals have any of them done so?—Individuals, I believe, have.

4851. And those who have done take the same view as the Indians do, is not that so?—Some do.

4852. A considerable number?—No.

4853. For

4853. For example, those gentlemen who, you say, began to associate themselves in politics or in a study of politics with a number of Indians in Calcutta; they do, do they not?—Yes, I think there were 23 of them.

4854. Twenty-three of some of the leading merchants in Calcutta?—I think there were two or three leading merchants.

4855. Some of the leading Europeans in Calcutta, anyhow?—It is a little difficult to estimate that.

4856. I am using adjectives, which are always a source of trouble. Would the European Association believe that self-government within the Empire was inevitable as well as morally right? Did they at all contemplate within what period of time that inevitable and morally right effect was to be produced, or did they think that it would be in some remote period which it was not necessary to contemplate?—Their view was that you could not judge how long it would take until you had seen the results of some of the earlier steps. Progress might be faster than would be anticipated.

4857. Did they consider at all as to whether it was to be in the remote future or the near future?—I think the view was that it would be in the remote future, but it would not be possible to decide till the result of the first steps had been seen.

4858. I do not think anybody has decided that so far as I know. Lord Sydenham asked you whether or not both official and non-official British opinion in India considered the scheme of the Report and the Bill revolutionary. Did I understand you to say that official people do think that? Does official British opinion in India think that?—I speak of official opinion only so far as known to me, and I speak rather of the rank and file of officials, for obviously the higher officials are not disposed to express any opinion at all on such matters, being responsible for policy.

4859. Then do I understand that in your view and in the view of your Association the opinions of officials like Sir James Meston, Sir Claud Hill, Sir Frank Sly and other people in that position do not represent any proportion of official opinion or any considerable proportion of official opinion?—I do not think my Association would say that.

4861. I asked as to whether the opinions of these gentlemen that we have heard, and which you are probably aware of, or have read, are or are not, in your view, the opinions of the bulk of the officials, or only those of a small minority of officials. I did not ask whether the European Association agreed with those views or not?—I should say they were the opinions of a minority, but it is difficult to be certain in such matters.

4862. Do you consider that caste is an insuperable obstacle—I am again using an adjective, but advisedly—to responsible government?—I should not say it is an insuperable obstacle.

4863. Notwithstanding caste, you can have responsible government?—You can work towards it.

4864. I do not know that we are at one. Is the existence of the two things inconsistent—that you cannot have responsible government if you have caste?—It depends very greatly on how far caste is an active force.

4865. Do I understand by that that as long as caste is active or an active force responsible government is impossible?—I will not say it is impossible; it militates against it to some extent.

4866. Do you yourself contemplate the disappearance of caste, either in the near or in the remote future of India?—Certainly not in the near future.

4867. Do you think it possible that it will disappear in the remote future?—It is very difficult to say what the remote future will be.

4868. What is your view with regard to that? Will caste disappear, so far as you can foresee from your knowledge of things that you see in India now and have seen for the last eleven years?—The European Association is simply concerned to point out that caste is an extremely important factor and must be reckoned with. It does not say that it makes self-government utterly impossible, nor does it attempt to forecast in what way or at what date caste will vanish from India.

4869. Then you have not considered as an Association as to whether the existence of caste will or will not prevent ultimately the existence of self-government or responsible government in India?—Our feeling is that if caste continues to be an active force, and especially if its activity is not recognised in the schemes that are framed for producing self-government, then self-government will eventually be a mockery as far as the lower castes are concerned.

4871. It is inevitable provided caste disappears, I suppose?—I do not think we put it in that way. It is a question of how far caste is active. Caste might come to mean, perhaps, little more than certain class distinctions in this country, which count for little except in matters of etiquette.

4872. But as long as people of different castes refuse to inter-marry will that be an obstacle?—That will no doubt be a considerable obstacle.

4873. As long as they refuse to dine with each other, or eat with each other, it will be a still greater obstacle?—I do not know whether dining together is a necessary thing politically.

4874. You do not attach so much importance to that. You place more importance on the inter-marriage part?—As an Association we have not attempted to weigh up the relative value of these things.

4875. You bring in the factor of caste, and therefore I want to ascertain your opinion with regard to that, as to how far self-government, which you say is inevitable, will be attained at some period which we can contemplate, or in some remote geological period which none of us can contemplate?—Our view is simply that caste is a very important factor, and due regard must be paid to it in making schemes for India.

4876. Schemes of self-government?—Yes.

4877. What provision would you make for caste?—Communal representation, we think, is necessary.

4878. Representation for each caste?—Not to the extent of each caste, but in order to give the lower castes in certain parts of the country an opportunity.

4879. But when there are innumerable lower castes which are mutually exclusive, how would you provide for that?—Our feeling is, in regard to that, that their differences between themselves are less important politically, whatever they may be socially, than the difference between the Brahmins and the lower castes, considered in bulk.

4880. I am reading you from the Imperial Gazetteer of Madras, and I ask you if you agree with this. This is speaking of non-Brahmin castes. "But these large communities are by no means homogeneous throughout. They are divided and sub-divided into endless sub-castes which keep severely apart from one another and usually decline to inter-marry or even to eat together. Nor is it the case that they all adhere to their traditional occupations." Is that correct in your view?—I think so.

4881. Then it goes on: "Census statistics show that one-fourth of the Paraiyans and twelve per cent. of the Malas have so far risen in the world as to become occupiers, and even owners of land, instead of continuing to be predial serfs, while of the Brahmins, sixty per cent. have left their traditional callings for agriculture, and others have even taken to trade." Is that correct?—No doubt.

4882. That being the position of these different castes and sub-castes as between themselves, do you think it possible to group them together as a community for the purposes of an electorate?—We believe it is possible. If it is impossible it simply means they will be oppressed.

4883. Possibly. I mean having regard to the numbers which one sees contemplated in the Joint Report as well as the Southborough Committee's Report. To give representation to these exclusive castes you would have to have a very large number in the Legislative Council or Legislative Assembly, would you not?—Our idea is that they would not be represented caste by caste, but that something ought to be done to safeguard the lower castes, considered in bulk.

4884. But how? Have you formed any idea how you would safeguard them?—We think that if it were put to the lower castes: Though you differ amongst yourselves, it is impossible for each of you to get a member, and you have to choose between sinking your little differences. or, perhaps, not little, but your differences, whether little or great, or otherwise you will miss all representation at all; you will simply have to go into the general electorate——

4885. To your knowledge has anybody done that, either official or non-official?—I am not aware of it.

4886. I take it that you advocate communal representation as necessary to safeguard the interests of different communities?—Yes.

4887. The separate interests of different communities?—I would not say only that. It is to safeguard their separate interests, and also to see that each considerable community has its due share in influencing the common affairs of India.

4888. That they could have, of course, without communal representation if they had the vote?—They would have their share of the vote, but they would have much greater difficulty in getting representatives into the Councils.

4889. Even if they had a vote?—Yes, even if they had a vote.

4890. Do you suggest that with regard to the European part of the population also?—Communal representation?

4891. Yes?—Our view is not quite that with regard to Europeans. Our feeling with regard to the European community is that it must be able to choose also from a wider field than it has when its representatives are from specialised bodies.

4892. Not from chambers of commerce?—Not only from chambers of commerce; in addition to whatever representation may be given to specialised bodies it should have opportunities for choosing men from the whole of its community.

4893. The European interests in India are mostly with reference to trade, commerce, and industry?—Yes.

4894. And for the representation of those interests are the chambers of commerce inadequate or insufficient?—No. For the representation of those interests the chambers of commerce are highly important, and in every way well qualified to represent those interests.

4895. It is interests other than those three—trade, industry, and commerce, that you require separate representation for?—Our feeling is that the interests of the community, as a community, should be represented.

4896. But the community are mostly concerned with those things, are they not?—Yes, very largely.

4897. And, apart from those interests, the British part of the population in India is very small, almost microscopic, is it not?—Not if you include officials and soldiers; excluding them, it is small.

4898. Apart from officials and soldiers?—It is small.

4899. So far as special interests are concerned, you would not advocate communal representation for officials and soldiers?—No; communal representation would be for Europeans simply as such.

4900. And that would be for the protection of those very large interests in trade, commerce, and industry?—No, it would be partly for the representation of the community as such, and in order that Europeans who were not members of chambers of commerce and such bodies should be able to get some representation somewhere. The present state of affairs is that the late President of the European Association and the present Secretary between them have not a vote of any sort, simply because one was a lawyer and the other was a journalist.

4901. No more have I, and never had. Is it correct or not to say that the educated classes have been found fault with for the last few years for trying to spread political education amongst the masses? Am I correct in saying that?—Yes.

4902. They are being found fault with for that?—I understand that it was the quality of the education, rather than the energy of effort, to which objection was taken.

4903. I take it that the European Association does not object to the educated classes—Congress people, and so on—trying to spread political education amongst the masses?—I think the attitude of the Association would be determined entirely by the nature of the teaching.

4904. If it is in accordance with their views they would welcome it; if it is contrary to their views they would object to it. That is very human, of course?—Yes.

4905. Is it because it is contrary to their views that they have been objecting?—I think the feeling is that special care is necessary in putting forward ideas to audiences that may be mainly illiterate or in any respect immature.

4906. Have they been trying to do that to the masses themselves—to spread the right kind of education?—The European Association?

4907. Yes?—It has not the means of attempting a task of that magnitude.

4908. Has the community as such done anything towards spreading the right kind of education among the masses?—Except in so far as a certain number of missionaries and teachers and so on may have indirectly done a certain amount, there has been no organised European effort to teach people to vote.

4909. The missionaries have been giving them education?—Yes.

4910. But I am talking of political education. Is there any European agency of which you are aware which has been trying up to now to spread any kind of political education, whether right or wrong, amongst the masses?—No, it is almost impossible for the European community to undertake such a task.

4911. Then the only agency available is that of the educated classes—the classes which have been trying?—Yes.

4912. In fact, the complaint against them is that they are trying to do too much?—From our point of view too much in a direction that is not always a correct direction.

4913. Have you mixed much with the masses yourself?—I would not claim to have done much in that direction.

4914. And, therefore, whether there is any movement amongst the masses or not would not come within your personal knowledge?—I have information from various sources in a journalistic capacity, and I have information as Secretary of this organisation.

4915. No personal knowledge, I meant?—Some slight personal knowledge.

4916. Is it the view of your Association that in the last five years no interest whatever has been created amongst the masses?—There has been some stir in certain parts of the country, but, broadly speaking, I should not think the masses care any more for these matters than they did five or ten years ago.

4917. You have no scheme yourself to suggest as to what particular subject should be transferred when there is a transfer to a responsible Minister?—We put in a statement before that half of Lord Southborough's Committee which dealt with the transfer of functions.

4918. Your criticism and this memorandum is based on the assumption that the Bill does not make the Ministers dependent on the vote of the Legislature?—Yes, for tenure of office, that is.

4919. If as a matter of fact it does, to that extent your criticism would not apply?—Certainly.

4920. And the unreality which you complain of would not exist?—That is so, to that extent.

Lord Islington.

4921. I would like to get a little further on the point that Lord Sinha was asking you questions on with regard to representation in the Legislative Councils of the commercial community. I see in one of the last paragraphs of your note you say, "the community requires men with more leisure and more definitely political aptitude than the nominees of commercial or other specialised bodies will have. It needs freedom to choose men from any and every walk of life." May I take

I take it that implies that you would not find the men that you would like to see representing the commercial community if it is restricted merely to chambers of commerce?—Our trouble is at present we cannot get in anybody who is not a member of one of these specialised bodies—in the case of the Imperial Legislative Council chambers of commerce, and in Provincial bodies, chambers of commerce and trading associations, and in certain Provinces planting associations, and in one, I think, a mining association—which means that a European lawyer in India, who develops political aptitude, would have no constituency.

4923. Can you suggest any alternative to the chambers of commerce?—We have been given communal representation in the Provinces, and we are not dealing with the matter further. We are satisfied with the Bill on that. But in regard to the Imperial Legislative Council or Imperial Assembly, we wish to have some communal representation through other Europeans. We do not seek to have a large number there. We simply want some there in order that the community as a community may have a voice there.

4924. But you have not any specific suggestion to make to us?—As to the constituency?

4925. We want a suggestion as to how you are to give effect to that?—Our view was that although the community is widely scattered its members are to a very great extent in touch, and we do not think there would be any difficulty.

4926. You have no specific suggestion to make to us?—Our view before Lord Southborough's Committee was that there might be a certain number of constituencies created in which Europeans would vote simply as Europeans.

4927. You would take all Europeans?—Yes, whether official or non-official.

4928. In the Association that you are speaking for to-day, have you any Indian commercial houses represented at all?—No; the qualification for membership is being a European, as the name would suggest.

4929. Are there any commercial associations in India composite in character?—Oh, yes.

4930. Representatives of Indians and Europeans?—Yes.

4931. Have you a strong body of that character in Madras?—In Madras, no. I was for some time Secretary of the Chamber of Commerce there, and that body had contained in the past Indian members, and contained, I think, two during my time. The Delhi Chamber, I believe, contains a considerable number of Indians, and there are some other Chambers of Commerce with Indians in them, but they are always in a minority, I think.

4933. Could you say that after the political proposals the economic proposals in regard to the development of commerce and industry is probably the most important matter in India?—Undoubtedly.

4934. And would you say that if it is to succeed it can only succeed by the cordial co-operation of both races working together?—Undoubtedly.

4935. Do you know in Madras or in other parts of India many business undertakings possessed and managed by Europeans and Indians?—I know of several.

4936. Would you say that the development of that has an accentuated importance now?—I think so, certainly.

4937. A member of the Committee asked you whether you considered that the Government of India, situated where it was, had in any respect lost touch with the country due to its situation in Delhi. Do you think that the Government of India is fully in touch with Provincial commercial undertakings?—No, I should not say so.

4938. And in sympathy with them?—I should not say it was fully in touch.

4940. What do you mean by that?—I mean that if a great many powers have been transferred in the Provincial Government to Ministers, European opinion might be rather chary of seeing industrial policy directed from the Provinces rather than from the Government of India which has been less Indianised. It might be so. I am discussing the future. I am not in a position to say definitely.

4941. Would you think that European commercial feeling would be assured if their enterprises in a Province were placed in the hands of a United Provincial Government, composed of both Europeans and Indians on the lines suggested in the Report, only working together as a United Government?—I think it might in some degree be reassured, but I have not had instructions on that.

4942. You have not thought that point out?—I have not had instructions on it.

4943. You have already admitted that the advance of Indian representation in commerce is much to be wished for?—Yes.

4944. And you would also say, I suppose, that for development in India it is essential that both races should have a voice in the control and government of commerce and industry?—Yes.

4945. And that it cannot in the future be left exclusively to the European executive?—Yes.

4946. Would you go so far as to say that the corporate mind of a Government composed of Europeans and Indians would probably come to a wiser conclusion than if it were left in the hands of individual Indians or Europeans?—Yes, I should think so.

4947. If that were brought about, would you say that it might mitigate what is manifestly a disability which you were mentioning just now, that the individual commercial man was only in India temporarily?—Yes.

4948. But the business remains?—That is so.

4949. If you had a combination of Europeans and Indians in commercial enterprises, that evil of the transitory European would, to that extent, be mitigated? Would you agree to that?—Yes, it would to that extent.

Duke of Northumberland.

4950. You said that the great bulk of the people of India took very little interest in this scheme of reform. Under this scheme the electorate is going to be a very limited one, of course?—Yes.

4951. Would you say that a considerable portion of the electorate would take very little interest in this scheme?—I think that the electorate would take a fair amount of interest, though the question of capacity as regards certain sections of it would still remain.

Mr. Bennett.

4952. Your Association represents, not merely the special interests of the commercial community of Calcutta, and looks after them, but I understand it endeavours to survey the whole problem of Indian self-government?—Yes.

4953. Looking at it from an Imperial point of view as well as from the communal point of view?—Yes.

4954. Is not your authority somewhat mitigated by the admission you made to Lord Sydenham, that until recently the European community in India had not taken any special interest in general politics?—I was speaking of the Association, which, until a few years ago, had declined much in membership, and was not doing any particularly active work. I think I may have made some confusion between the Association and the community.

4955. Your Association contemplates a time when self-government will be given to India?—Yes.

4956. But it is strongly opposed to the idea that it is fit for it at present?—Yes.

4957. You promised it. Is not your promise very much like a political expression of a line: "Man never is but always to be blessed." It reads to me very much like that. I think you took a very gloomy view of the operation of Indian legislators under the scheme, did you not; for instance, you say: "The system is one under which every elected member may carry on a vendetta against a Minister without fear of bringing about the downfall either of the individual Minister or the Government." What reason have you to believe that the elected members of the Provincial Legislatures will carry on a vendetta against individual Ministers or against the Government?—Unless the European Association have totally misunderstood Indian politicians, they are just as liable as the politicians of other countries to develop personal animosities, or to develop feelings with regard to special measures which a Minister may be associated with, and while appreciating his general attitude they may intensely detest some particular policy of his, or, while approving of the Government as a whole, they may detest an individual Minister; and our contention is that there is nothing to make them exercise that self-control which we regard as very valuable training for Parliamentary Government of the British type, or of any true Parliamentary type. There is nothing in the scheme, in our view, which will compel them to exercise that.

4958. But surely the new Legislatures will want to make a reputation for themselves; they will want to prove before the world, and before the Commission, which will be upon them ten years hence, their fitness for self-government; and could there be a more effective way of showing their unfitness than by carrying on a vendetta against a Minister, or against the Ministry as a whole? Do you think that is likely?—I think that quite often a legislator's desire for his personal advancement, to prove his personal fitness for office by destructive criticism, is stronger than his desire to prove the fitness of his nation for self-government.

4959. That is rather a gloomy view. You referred to the absence of responsibility to the Legislature in the Minister, but surely he is responsible to his constituents?—Yes.

4960. He is not free from responsibility?—Our view with regard to that has been that the constituents will often be actuated by personal like or dislike, which has nothing to do with the general record of the Minister; or again, constituents may regard a man as eminently representative of their local interests, and yet as an indifferent Minister.

4961. Is not that a condemnation of the representative system as a whole?—We do not think that responsibility to the constituency is sufficiently important.

4962. Now you say the Association is prepared to acquiesce in what seems to it a largely unreal experiment, if that unreality is clearly admitted. Do I understand that in embarking upon this very important policy the Government and Parliament are to proclaim the insincerity of the undertaking on which they have set out?—No. That relates only to this one question of whether a Minister who has carried on when his tenure of office is not dependent on the vote of the Legislature should be judged by the results of that for his fitness to exercise power when he will be dependent. We object to carrying on this experiment with this shelter, this sort of fire screen, between the Minister and his critics, and then saying that success in that justifies the belief that you can make him dependent and establish a regular Parliamentary form of government.

4963. Then the unreality attaches to a single operation?—To this one point.

4964. You expect that Parliament in legislating on this matter is to admit that in one respect it is enacting an unreality?—I am afraid we expect more—we expect that to be dropped.

4965. You refer to the transferred departments, and you say that the transferred departments, being mainly of a benevolent and popular character, while those reserved are fiscal and punitive, the British bureaucratic half of the administration will become increasingly odious in the eyes of the people. You recognise that the so-called British bureaucratic half will not be entirely British?—That is so.

4966. That an Indian Member of Council will be appointed?—The policy will be British.

4967. Do you think that it is impossible for even the bureaucratic half of an administration to carry on its work without making itself increasingly odious to the people? Because I take it it is the normal administration you have in mind. Do you think that they cannot administer the Police Department, for instance, without being increasingly odious to the people?—Our view is that, probably, the Government of no country, and certainly no Government in a country like India, can afford to administer the unpleasant Departments—the Departments which extort taxes and punish the people—unless it is in a position to draw on the good will that accrues to it from the administration of the benevolent Departments. We fear that under this scheme the British—it is not entirely British, but it is mainly British—and the bureaucratic half of the Administration will become unpopular, and therefore will find it difficult to administer the reserved Departments owing to the odious nature of its duties.

4968. Do you take it for granted that the imposition of taxation is a function which necessarily incurs odium? Has there never been a popular Chancellor of the Exchequer?—I am afraid that is our view, that the extortion of taxes is not the most popular function.

4969. The same view has been expressed by others, but it seems strange to me. You still think that it is impossible honestly and impartially to levy taxation upon a people without incurring odium?—No, I would not go as far as that. Our view is that when you have two halves of the Administration and one half makes demands on the people for taxes, and compels them to observe law and order at times when they may feel otherwise disposed, and the other half is entrusted with all sort of benevolent functions, one half will become at least relatively odious, if not positively so.

Major Ormsby-Gore.

4970. What are your views on the question of fiscal autonomy for the Indian Empire?—I think the Association would take a somewhat sympathetic view of proposals to that end, but unfortunately I am not in receipt of instructions definite enough to justify me in going into the matter at present.

4971. Can you tell me your own personal views on that point? Do you think that the present system whereby the fiscal policy of India is really decided by Parliament here, after it has been presented by the Secretary of State in Council can continue any longer?—I am afraid I must not go beyond saying that I do not think it can continue for any very great length of time without exciting criticism.

4972. Has your Association commented in any way on the Report of the Crewe Committee on the change of the Council of India and the position of the Secretary of State in relation to the Government of India?—I have not yet had time to hear from my Association on that—the difficulties are very great with our members scattered all over the country, but my impression from what I know of the general attitude of the Association is that it would regard the scheme as making the Secretary of State perhaps somewhat too much of an autocrat.

4973. You think it would make the Secretary of State more of an autocrat than he is at present?—I think that would be the view, but I speak without definite knowledge of what my Association will eventually decide on the matter.

4974. What are the views of your Association on the general question of Women Suffrage in India?—We came to no formal decision in the matter, but in giving evidence before the Southborough Committee, in response to a question by the Honourable Mr. Hogg, I said that I thought large numbers of the members of the Association were prepared to see women given the vote. Mr. Hogg then asked me whether I knew of any very strong opposition to this in the Association, and I told him I was not aware of it—that we ourselves had recently admitted women to full membership of our Association, and were anxious to get more in, and as far as I knew there was a very general feeling in the Association that the claims of women to the vote should be recognised. But I think all members of the Association appreciate the fact that there are a great many practical difficulties in India, and I do not think anybody anticipates that any very large number of women would vote. But it seems to me, if I may give what is little more than a personal opinion, that it would be desirable to stake out a claim for women, even though only a very small number availed themselves, or could avail themselves, of the privilege.

4975. I suppose a large number of the members of your Association are interested in factories and production in India?—Yes.

4976. What view do they take of a proposal, if it were put forward, to transfer to the control of Indian Ministers question of welfare of labour, factory conditions and hours, and things of that kind?—There is a feeling that it would be extremely unsound.

4977. Why?—The inquiries which have been held in the past into the administration of factories, I believe, have shown that on the whole there is somewhat less consideration for the welfare of the workers and for their proper housing and education, and so forth, in factories conducted by Indians than in those conducted by Europeans, again allowing for exceptions, and I think there is a feeling that it would be better that such matters should not be wholly in Indian hands.

4979. That is to say, you think the average Indian politician is not much interested in questions affecting the social advancement of the factory workers?—There are some very honourable exceptions, but I think on the whole that is true.

4980. In answer to Lord Sydenham, and again in answer to Lord Sinha, you said you thought you could speak for a certain section of the officials as well as non-official Europeans; are any officials members of your Association?—No; officials as such are not eligible for membership of the Association.

4981. In fact, when you referred to official opinion, it was merely that of your personal friends among the officials?—Personal friends, and what members of the Association have heard from their personal friends.

4982. We have heard the views of the higher ranks of the officials, both of the Provincial Governments and of the Government of India; lower down you think there is a wide division of opinion among the junior ranks of officials?—I should say there is a considerable division of opinion. I speak, of course, only of opinions expressed informally by men who were not actually responsible for the scheme or associated with it, and who felt free to speak.

4983. Is there a feeling amongst those people that they wish to make their opinions heard more freely than they are able to do under the Regulations?—There is. I have heard the opinion expressed several times by officials, and sometimes also by non-officials, that it is a pity that a certain proportion of men in each of the great services are not specially consulted about the scheme as touching their Departments. Reference was made to men who are in no way at the head of affairs, but the rank and file.

4984. Is the general criticism of the so-called bureaucratic nature of the Indian Government at the present time due very largely to the maze of Regulations which tie down officials?—I should say that is so. The official has less and less freedom.

4985. Do you hope that under any scheme of reform that tieing down of the Executive by Regulations will be mitigated?—It is to be feared that under a system which increases the influence of educated Indians the tendency will be the other way. So far, I think it may be said that the educated Indians have shown a preference for having somewhat elaborate Regulations and being able to protect themselves behind a clause or rule.

Chairman.] We are much obliged to you.

(After a short adjournment.)

SIR MICHAEL SADLER, K.C.S.I., called in; and Examined.

MEMORANDUM SUBMITTED BY THE WITNESS.

1. The evidence submitted by the witness, who assents to the dual form of government embodied in the Bill, refers to Question 19 in the list circulated by the Committee.

2. The Report of the Calcutta University Commission discusses the future relations between the Government of India and the Indian Universities. Reference is made to this subject in the Report of the Functions Committee (paragraph 15 (1) and page 23) and also in "Views of the Government of India upon the Reports of Lord Southborough's Committee," page 35.

3. Speaking in his individual capacity and not as representing the Calcutta University Commission, the witness would submit to the Committee observations upon the proposals made in the Report of the Functions Committee (paragraph 45), with reference to the transfer of education as a whole, and upon the criticisms made on those proposals in the "Views of the Government of India upon the Reports of Lord Southborough's Committee," pp. 41-46, and referred to in Sir Sankaran Nair's appended Minute of Dissent, April 16, 1919.

Chairman.

4986. Sir Michael, you are Vice-Chancellor of Leeds University?—Yes.

4987. You were Chairman of the Commission which recently inquired into and reported upon the Calcutta University?—Yes.

4988. We know you have come here at great personal inconvenience, and we are very much obliged to you?—Thank you very much.

4989. What we want to hear from you most particularly is your view on this question of the allocation of education in India between the proposed two sides of Government, whether the whole of education should be a reserved subject or the whole of it a transferred subject, or whether part of it should be reserved and part transferred; and anything else that you can tell us, particularly dealing with the subject of education, but not confining yourself necessarily to that, which bears upon our subject of reference, we shall be grateful to hear?—May I begin by saying that I am in general in very cordial agreement with the proposals of the Bill, and that for my own part I should accept it gladly as a bold and reasonable experiment, giving large responsibility to Indians and affording opportunities to them to show, I hope within a few years, that they deserve a larger measure of such responsibility. I conceive that the responsibility to which the preamble of the Bill refers involves a form of government the chief agents of which are answerable to public opinion as reflected in a representative and elected Assembly. You know how limited my own knowledge of India is; I was only there for seventeen months, and almost for the whole of the time in Bengal, but I came away with a deep conviction that action on lines of this kind should be taken without delay. In saying that, however, I speak for myself alone, and I am not authorised to speak on behalf of any of my colleagues on the Commission.

I believe that the Agency foreshadowed in the Bill will bring a new spirit into Indian education, University, secondary, and primary, and that it will lead to improvements in education which will increase in due time the number of men who are able to take a responsible part in public administration of affairs. In answer to your Lordship's question about the special place that education would bear under the new system of administration, I should like first to report to you what the Commission recommend, and to indicate any slight differences of opinion there were among us on points bearing on your question, and then, in the second place, speaking in my individual capacity, to state what I myself think would be wise in regard to reservation or transfer. We say in our Report that with the increase in political responsibility India is passing into the fellowship of nations, and therefore that she should have as quickly as possible a system of education answerable to that status. We find that, speaking broadly, a very great work has been accomplished for India by the modern system of education, especially since the adoption of the principles laid down in the Despatch of 1854. To those principles we adhere, and we desire to see them extended and adapted to modern conditions. Our own work, as you know, was limited to Bengal and Assam, with some reference to Burmah, which we were not able to visit, and though in the course of our inquiry we paid short visits, either as a body or in groups, to Madras, the United Provinces, Bombay and Lahore, it is only of Bengal that we speak in detail, and only as to the present conditions in Bengal that I feel I have any claim to report to you. Though we feel that the University of Calcutta, which, under the Government of India, is responsible for the higher education throughout the Presidency, has done a very great and acceptable work, a work which has led to the diffusion of culture and science through scores of thousands of the population, we feel unanimously that the time has come when it needs much more generous support from public funds, a reorganisation of its administration, a great enthusiasm and professional skill among the teachers, and, above all, a new spirit.

When Western education was introduced into Bengal, in the 1820's, especially under the leadership of Rammohun Roy, and for many years afterwards, Western studies appealed to the most intelligent and vigorous of the Bengali youth like a new message; but, of course, familiarity has somewhat accustomed them to much that underlies Western education, and we feel at present the ordinary course of studies in the colleges has nothing like the same power to appeal to the enthusiasm and minds of the students as it had fifty or more years ago. It needs to be broadened; it needs to be diversified and, above all, it needs to have more science in it and more direct application to the duties of life, and underlying that much more care for the physical welfare of the boy, much more corporate life in the institutions and a clearer aim of civic responsibility of Indians for Indian welfare. Therefore we felt constrained to advise in our Report a very great change in the present organisation of higher education in Bengal.

The pivot on which our plans of change turn is a proposal that the first two years of the University course, now called the intermediate, should become higher secondary work instead of University work. We found an overwhelming body of opinion, Indian as well as European, supporting the view that a large number of the pupils who come up from the English high schools to the colleges are neither mature enough in mind for University studies proper nor sufficiently well trained in English to follow University lectures given to large audiences; and we suggest, therefore, that these two years of intermediate study should be put to another use, that the best kind of school teaching should be organised for the boys at that stage in their work, and that during those last two years of their higher secondary school work they should have opportunities of getting preparation, not only for the University, but also for certain practical careers.

We found that the terms of our reference, which included a study of the conditions which should be required for admission to the University, compelled us to look into the work of the English high schools. Therefore, our Report is really one on the whole of English secondary education in Bengal as well as on University education, which includes the degree and the intermediate course. We propose that there should be a new frontier between secondary education and University, drawn at the close of what are now the intermediate years. In order to provide this education in the best possible way we recommend that there should be set up in Bengal a new type of educational institution, for which we suggest the title of intermediate college; that in the greater number of cases these colleges should be attached to selected high schools, and that in a few cases they should be more isolated institutions. We propose that the present University Matriculation examination should be given a wider outlook, should be improved in method of test, and should come at a stage in the boy's career when with good teaching he would be ready to pass it at about sixteen years of age; in other words, we suggest that it should correspond to the examination which in the English secondary schools is now called first secondary school examination. We suggest that at sixteen a good many boys, as is already the case, would be ready to pass into various forms of industrial and office employment, but that those who were of greater promise should receive, during the next two years, a very thorough training in English and their vernacular, and a course as well, which would prepare them either for the University or for minor government appointments, or for entrance to the medical colleges, or for entrance upon the engineering colleges, or for admission to the agricultural department of the University, or for taking up work in connection with agriculture, or, and not least important, fit them for work as teachers in many types of schools. At the end of these two years there would be another examination, called the intermediate college examination, the certificates of which would give entrance to the students to many careers which they now wish to fill, and should also, under conditions approved by the University, serve as the Matriculation examination. At that stage the University course proper would begin, and should as soon as possible be a three years' course for the Bachelor degree, to be followed, of course, by the Master's degree, and for those who wished by the Doctorate.

We are glad to find a very strong, indeed irresistible, body of opinion in Bengal confirmed by much in other parts of India in favour of that change, and we believe that the whole future of higher education in Bengal would be changed by the building up of this organised course of higher secondary education, provided that along with it goes an improvement in the more fundamental work of the high schools proper. We have reason to think from our evidence that the new industrial and commercial developments in Bengal would be furthered in every way by the training of young men of that age on these new lines, so that at eighteen many of them might begin the practical work of life, or enter upon the special training which their practical career requires. Now a change of this kind in Bengal raises administrative difficulties of a very serious kind. The Committee will be aware that the power of conducting the University Matriculation examination, which in Bengal acts as a kind of leaving examination of the secondary schools, inheres in the University, and not in the Government.

Furthermore, it is with the University that lies the responsibility of deciding whether a given school is sufficiently well organised and staffed to deserve the right of being able to send in its pupils for the Matriculation examination. The result is that at present the University is really the controlling power in secondary education in Bengal. It has tried to do everything to fulfil its responsibilities, but there has not been enough money given to secondary education for it to be possible to reform these schools and to bring them to the standard which the University would desire them to reach. Therefore, the University finds itself in the embarrassing and humiliating position of often having to grant recognition to a school which, if larger grants from public funds were forthcoming, forthcoming, it would at once require to improve itself before it received power to send in pupils for matriculation. Now we find that there is an exceedingly strong opinion in Bengal that that power should not be transferred under present conditions from the University to the Department of Public Instruction. I think we are all satisfied that if any such proposal were made there would be violent and dangerous opposition, because though the University of Calcutta is in one sense a very officialised institution, and much under Government control, it has, nevertheless been wisely left as one of the channels through which Indian opinion may express itself on educational questions broadly. Therefore, we found on consideration that the simple proposal to hand over to the Department of Public Instruction the organisation of the first secondary school examination or high school examination, corresponding to the present matriculation, and the power of organising the work during what are now the intermediate years at college, and the right of deciding which schools should have this very valued privilege of sending in boys for this first examination, would be very unwise, and certain to provoke opposition which would disturb good relations between the Government and the educated classes.

On the other hand, we were glad to find many signs of agreement in favour of the plan which we have unanimously proposed, namely, that the supervision under Government of the chief tests of secondary and higher secondary education (to be precise, the English high schools and what are now called the intermediate classes) should be entrusted to a new Board of Secondary and Intermediate Education. We propose that in this Board should be vested the duties and power which now lie with the University in their sphere of education, and secondly that this Board should be the instrument through which the Government should frame regulations for the work, and inspection of the schools and intermediate colleges concerned. In order that the Board may represent University opinion and other types of experience, we found it necessary to propose that it should consist of from fifteen to eighteen members, seven of them nominated by the Universities (five by the University of Calcutta, two by the proposed University of Dacca), one elected by the non-official members of the Bengal Legislative Council, one the Director of Public Instruction ex-officio, and the others so chosen that there should be always three members competent to represent the experience and interests of Hindus and Muslmans respectively, with experience of industry and commerce, medicine, public health, agriculture, the teaching in schools and colleges, and of the educational needs of girls. We propose that over this Board there should preside a Chairman, receiving a salary, and devoting the whole of his time to the work, with the help of a secretary and a staff.

We suggest further that the Board should be helped by certain sub-committees or advisory bodies, one especially dealing with the education of girls and women, a very difficult and urgent problem, one or more representing the experience of the different parts of the Presidency and the need of special Provincial areas, and another dealing specifically with problems of Oriental study, both Islamic and Hindu. Our problem was to decide what should be the relation of this new Board of Secondary and Intermediate Education to the Government, on the one hand, and to the schools and colleges on the other. We did not see before we presented our Report to the Viceroy the Report which Mr. Feetham's Committee prepared under Lord Southborough's Committee, but I had the opportunity of more than one consultation with Mr. Feetham, and agree with the proposals which Lord Southborough's Committee make in this Report. We differed among ourselves a little as to what should be the part of the Government representatives on this new Board. The majority of us wished the large majority of the Board to be non-officials, though nominated by the Government of Bengal. Two of our body were inclined to a larger number of Government officials on the Board itself, and thought that the Director of Public Instruction might be the Chairman of the Board.

We differed again among ourselves as to what should be the limits of the executive power of the Board. All agreed that it must conduct both examinations, the high school examination and the intermediate examination, and generally have oversight over the course of study in the intermediate colleges. The majority of us thought it necessary to attach to this specific administrative responsibilities and to let the Board organise an inspectorate and recommend to the Government financial proposals for the necessary grants for the improvement of the schools and colleges. But we agreed to frame our plan in such a way that it would be adapted for use whether secondary education was in the terms of the Bill transferred or reserved. We are careful to say that the member of the Government who would have general oversight of the Board's work would be either Member or Minister, and as the question of transfer and reservation had been referred to another Committee, and as we had taken no evidence on the subject, we deliberately refrained from expressing any opinion as a Commission as to whether secondary and higher education should be transferred or reserved. Speaking for myself alone, I am clear, after thinking over the matter constantly during the last few months, that it would be wise, subject to the establishment of such a Board of Secondary and Intermediate Education in Bengal, to regard secondary and intermediate education as a transferred subject. The sphere of our inquiry, of course, stopped short at primary schools, but at the same time we were impressed by the fundamental unity of education in every country—a unity which has not yet been sufficiently reached in Bengal. Therefore we missed no opportunity of seeing primary schools, and consulted all those who are specially expert in their management in order so to design our plan that it would fit in with the reorganisation of primary education.

I have read with great care the Report of Mr. Feetham's Committee, the views of the Government of India, and Sir Sankaran Nair's dissenting minute attached to these views, and feel how very difficult the question is whether both primary and secondary and higher education should be transferred or reserved. I can only speak with any special knowledge of the present needs of Bengal, but my own judgment inclines decisively to the view that it would be wise to transfer all on the conditions first that the Universities are reorganised; secondly, that there is a Board for secondary and intermediate education; and, thirdly, if it were felt that the Minister would gain by such advice, that a Board differently constituted might be set up to help him with regard to primary education.

I feel great hesitation in differing from the views expressed by the Government of India on this subject, and, of course, I attach great weight to their representations; but I should like to offer, for the Committee's consideration, these reasons in favour of treating education in Bengal as one national thing under the supervision of one Minister, and regarded as a unit by public opinion. In the first place, though at present it is true that there is an administrative gap between primary and, to some extent, middle vernacular education on the one hand and high English and collegiate education on the other, the existence of that gap is a mark of the backwardness in the organisation of education in Bengal, and should not remain as a permanent condition. As education in Bengal becomes answerable to the real needs of the Presidency it will become more and more necessary to dovetail the work of the primary school in that of secondary school, the high English school, as well as in the middle vernacular, and almost at once very difficult problems will come before the Minister or member as to the conditions on which a pupil should be transferred from the primary school to the secondary, what arrangements should be made for organising the curriculum in the primary school so as to prepare the pupil for the transfer, and what adjustment should be made in the lower parts of the high school curriculum in order to receive, without inconvenience, pupils from the primary. All these questions, and the questions of scholarships for transfer will become numerous and acute directly the new Government sets to work to organise public education in Bengal on a large scale. I feel sure that if a Minister could not take a large and broad view of the whole whole problem he would find himself harassed and embarrassed.

In the second place, no part of the educational problem is more difficult and none will need wiser and earlier treatment than the education of girls.

Now, at present, education of girls is almost wholly limited to the primary school. The girls ought to stay at school much longer; whether under purdah or other conditions, it is much to be desired that the great mass of the middle-class girls should stay at school until 15½ or 16 years of age, and the problem therefore of girls' education, both in the primary and in the secondary schools together ought to come within the purview of the Minister, and through him under the consideration of public opinion. In the third place we find that, partly through want of funds and partly through the pressure of an old tradition, much too little is done in the Universities and in the high English schools for the scientific and thorough study of the vernacular. But the vernacular must be the basis of primary education, and should, in the judgment of our Commission, be far more than at present the basis of the high school education, and, therefore, as this great change is likely to come over education in Bengal (increased attention to the vernacular and side by side with that a perfected mastery in English being by no means incompatible) it seems desirable that the Minister who has oversight of the whole problem should have regard both to those schools in which the vernacular is now the dominant thing and those schools in which the vernacular should enjoy a larger place.

Then, further, I think that to divide education into two parts and to transfer the one and reserve the other, upon whichever half the choice might fall, would break the system of general inspection and advice into two parts unwisely. One must, of course, have inspectors and advisers with special knowledge of primary education on the one hand, and higher education on the other; but one needs more and more to unify all those specialist inspectors under the general direction and superintendence of chief inspectors, who should have regard to both.

Then, in organising primary education, which is one of the most difficult and perilous of all the tasks awaiting the Indian Governments, I feel with the Bishop of Madras that a great effort ought to be made to educate the village community as a whole and not simply the children of the community by themselves, that education really is a social function, and that we shall get much more quickly in India the benefits of primary education if side by side with the improvement of the primary schools we have the wise introduction of adult education for the parents and older people in the community also. The one thing dovetails into the other. They should educate both the older and the younger people together. You would get much more sympathy for the new conditions; you would get the whole community thinking of education; you would get the permanent outlook on education rightly balanced, not prematurely introduced into primary schools or too segregated for the older ones. But it would make it much easier to try experiments in organising the new forms of popular education on the basis of the community for the older and younger together if both these grades of education were under the supervision of one Minister than if primary education for little children were in one hand and all other kinds of education in another.

Further, the real defect in education in Bengal is anæmia, and this anæmia is due to want of money—money wisely spent and rightly guided, but, above all things, money—and I think it would be difficult for a Government to decide how to distribute among the different grades of education the necessary shares of the amount of the public revenue which could be spared for this purpose if the detailed and administrative supervision of the two heads of education did not come under the notice, and were not referred to, the single responsibility of the Minister in charge. I think that if everything is transferred, together with the safeguards I have suggested, we are more likely to get a form of expenditure which is at once balanced and economical.

Further, we were much impressed by some evidence which was given to us by Mr. Surendranath Banerjea, in which he indicated that there were in Bengal considerable endowments left originally for charitable, and, in some cases, for religious purposes, which were no longer satisfactorily applied to the original purpose, but which might, if there was a strong movement of public opinion in that direction, be transferred to the use of education. Of course, in England nothing is more difficult than to get an endowment transferred from its original purpose to even its proximate one.

4990. I seem to have heard of that problem before?—But we would put to the Committee the difficulty of the problem in the hope of solving it; and, of course, if education is looked at as one great function of Government, and if one man conspicuous in the public eye can speak for education as a whole, can direct public opinion to what is necessary for its reform, and can make, with the Government behind him, an appeal to the whole people to bear heavier taxation, and to sanction the transfer of endowments, the present functions of which are obsolete, the problem is at any rate simplified. On these grounds I myself (I am speaking only individually, and not as President of the Commission) am led decisively to the view which Mr. Feetham's Committee has taken, that it would we wiser to transfer education as a whole and not in parts; but although I have spoken decisively I feel the very great weight of the arguments which are adduced in favour of the opposite view.

4991. How was your Commission composed?—It consisted of seven members—Sir Asutosh Mookerjee, a Judge of the High Court in Calcutta, who was for many years Vice-Chancellor of the University of Calcutta, and has done more than any other man for the development of university education in Bengal; Dr. Zia-Uddin Ahmed, who at that time was a professor, and is now acting as Principal, of the great Mohammedan college at Aligarh, in the United Provinces; Mr. Hornell, who is Director of Public Instruction for the Presidency of Bengal; and four of us who came from Europe for the purpose—Mr. Ramsay Muir, Professor of Modern History at Owens College, Manchester; Mr. Philip Hartog, Academic Registrar of the University of London; Dr. Gregory, Professor of Geology in the University of Glasgow; and myself—and our secretary was Mr. Anderson, who is in the Indian Educational Service, has had long experience of teaching in Bombay, and has for some time been attached on special duty to the Department of Education with the Government of India.

4992. There were only two Indian gentlemen on the Committee?—Only two.

4993. One a Hindu and one a Mohammedan?—Yes.

4994. Has the Report been published?—The Report was published in India last Saturday week.

4996. There has not been time to ascertain Indian public opinion on the subject?—No, I have not heard anything about it. You will understand we took during the seventeen months which this inquiry consumed very great pains to bring ourselves into touch with Indian opinion at every point. Our first business was to issue a Questionnaire, which we sent out to more than 600 people in Bengal and other parts of India, and to which we invited anyone who desired to reply; and I should like to say that the replies to that Questionnaire, which was full of the most difficult problems, constitute some of the very best evidence I myself have ever had in any educational Commission or Committee. All those replies, arranged alphabetically by writers under the questions, are published in our Report, and there are about 400 of them, the great majority of them being by Indian witnesses, both Hindu and Mussulman. Then, with hardly an exception, we visited every college in Bengal, and on the occasions of our visits we received, as far as time allowed, witnesses of every kind for full discussion of our problem, and we must from first to last have consulted more or less intimately on these questions getting on for 2,000 people. We also, when we were preparing our Report, were very far from not receiving further suggestions; we did everything that lay in our our power to keep ourselves in touch with opinion, official and non-official, Indian and European. I feel that what we proposed is a revolutionary change in the administration of education in Bengal. It means the re-casting of the whole system; it means a new demand on the public finances of Bengal and on its private generosity, a demand for money help far in excess of anything hitherto given; but we are unanimous that it is absolutely necessary that those charges should be made, and confident that if they are made the new type of education will be a sovereign remedy for many of the great difficulties in Bengal itself, and will immensely increase its social, industrial and economic efficiency.

Major Ormsby-Gore.

4997. You said, in addition to Bengal you and your Commission visited Assam and Burmah?—We were not able to go to Burmah. We went to Assam.

4998. Assam was the only other Province you visited?—That is so, within the province of the University of Calcutta.

4999. How do you regard Assam as compared with Bengal? Did you find there was the same demand for education and the same interest in the subject in Assam that there is in Bengal?—In the southern part of Assam a very great zeal for it; of course, that is practically an extension of Bengal, and in the northern part of Assam a very rapidly growing interest in it.

5000. That is to say, you think that from the political point of view it would be very wrong to put Assam in an inferior position as regards popular control of subjects to Bengal? It is not a more backward Province?—I do not know whether I know enough about it to answer that question, the problem is so difficult. There is the multiplicity of languages, there is the division of the Province by the hills in the middle, and there are the differences of temperament between the populations.

5001. There is a notable difference, from your point of view as an educationist, between the Assamese speaking and the Bengali speaking?—Distinctly; the problems are rather different; in fact they must be stated and looked at separately; but we were clear that one of the Mufassal colleges, which has already gone nearest to reaching the status of an independent University college, and which should ultimately become a University, is Gauhati. It has an almost ideal site for such an institution, and we saw the makings of quite a centre of independent intellectual life there.

5002. In that centre had Bengali or Assamese the predominating influence?—I think it is very difficult to say; it is mixed. It is far less wholly Bengali than if it had been in the south.

5003. Did you find in the Bengali-speaking parts of Assam a desire to be united to Bengal and to be separated from Assam?—We took no evidence on that subject; but there is a very strong desire, which we found, indeed, all over Bengal, not to be separated in name, at present, at any rate, from the University of Calcutta. They value very much their connection with the University; they wish to be under its ægis. We found very little support, although some strong witnesses favoured it, in favour of a plan for the establishment of a University of Bengal, which should include the Mufassal colleges and leave Calcutta University the city institution. Therefore, in our plan we have advised the system by which the Mufassal colleges would retain their connection with the University of Calcutta, but enjoy under its general direction a much larger measure of independence and liberty.

5004. In the course of your sojourn in Bengal did you find, not necessarily from the evidence, but by going about among the people, an increasing interest in public affairs and in Government generally on the part of the Indians: that is to say, was the Reform Scheme, which I gather was published while you were there, very much discussed?—Very much indeed. So far as my knowledge goes I should answer your question in the affirmative, but I had never been to India before I went with the Commission, and, as I told the Chairman, we were only there seventeen months, but during that time there was quite markedly a great increase of interest in the larger political questions which were brought before all India by the Joint Report of the Secretary of State and the Viceroy.

5005. Is there a real demand for what you might call the higher political education at the Universities—that is to say, the study of history, the study of economics, and the study of the various subjects allied to politics?—I think amongst the most intelligent of the younger generation and among a large number of the more forward-looking of the older generation that feeling is very strongly held.

Mr. Montagu.

5006. I have only one question to ask you, Sir Michael. The Report of Mr. Feetham's Committee treats education in these words; they suggest for transfer "education other than the European and Anglo-Indian education"?—Yes.

5007. ("Excluding the Benares Hindoo University and Chief's Colleges), subject to Indian legislation as regards the controlling of the establishment and regulating the constitution and functions of new Universities and defining the jurisdiction of any university outside its own Province"—these are the points—and "in the case of Bengal for a period of five years from the date when the Reform Scheme comes into operation, subject to Indian legislation with regard to the Calcutta University and the control and organisation of secondary education." I presume those words were put in in order that Indian legislation might be passed as a result of their Report?—Yes.

5008. Am I right in saying that in those words and in that way you endorse the recommendations of Mr. Feetham's Committee?—Personally I do entirely, but the Report, of course, came out after our Commission was disbanded.

Lord Sydenham.

5009. Sir Michael, I understand you made a searching inquiry into the University of Calcutta, and you to some extent included in the scope of your inquiry secondary and primary education in Bengal?—Yes; secondary education more than primary.

5011. Were you surprised to find a very large proportion of boys and young men in the universities and secondary schools as compared with the total number of pupils under instruction?—I remarked the comparatively small number in the primary schools. I did not regret at all the number of those in the high schools or the universities. I want them earnestly to have a much better education, but I do not want any kind of curtailment of educational opportunity; on the contrary, an extension of it, and an improvement of it.

5012. Did you not rather get the impression that education in India was top-heavy because of the comparatively small foundation which the primary schools at present have?—Quite. Personally I want very much to see the base of the pyramid strengthened, but the apex of it not whittled away.

5012A. You know in past years there was a very strong pressure brought to bear on the Government as regards higher education, and that it is in comparatively recent years that pressure has been brought forward for a corresponding increase in primary education?—Yes. Coming as a stranger I was struck by the increasingly strong desire among Indians to develop as quickly as possible primary education. I think they feel now—indeed they may have felt for a long time—that under modern conditions the economic welfare of the whole community depends on having a thoroughly good system of primary education; but they also feel, if I am not misrepresenting them, sensitive to the stigma which attaches to India through the presence of so large a mass of illiterate population—illiterate I mean in our technical modern sense, though I am very far from meaning to imply that without modern education a man may not be shrewd and wise.

5013. I am sure you realised the immense sacrifices which many poor Indian parents make in order to get their children higher education?—I have never seen anything like it.

5014. There is nothing like it in the world?—It is very touching indeed, and the sufferings are often silently borne.

5015. You also discovered that the results are sometimes terribly disappointing to the parents themselves?—Yes; but in the main it has done great good all over Bengal.

5016. You did see that there was a tragic side to the higher education of India?—Yes, partly because the boys really do not get the grounding which they should for a really good secondary education, and, secondly, because, owing to the want of side tracks at appropriate points, a good many of them are encouraged to stay on throughout the University education, which is not the most appropriate training for the career they desire.

5017. I gathered from your brief summary of the opinions which appeared in the Press that you were dissatisfied both with the secondary schools and the arts colleges as they now stand?—Very much; there are very bright exceptions, but I think that the Commission (and here I can speak for all of them) would wish me to say most emphatically that they think that the present condition of the secondary schools and of the art colleges in the main is such as to require instant reform.

5018. I suppose you looked into the past history of higher education in India?—We endeavoured to do that from the first.

5019. It has been stated by some critics of the educational system that the standards in later years are not so high as they used to be in the past; did you come to that conclusion?—We found it almost impossible to arrive at a judgment about that. Some of the schools are rather better than they were; others, I think relatively, are worse than they were, and the standards of examination are insensibly affected by the condition of the schools in which the boys are prepared for them. What I think is clear is that a much wider range of the population are going to the high English and college education than ever before. In the old days you had rather a select minority; in these days you still have the same large number of very brilliant and promising boys, but along with them there is a much larger number of the duller and less fully prepared, and also you are getting a much larger number of boys from homes or districts in which there is very little to stimulate and deepen the education they get at school. I think that affects the problem very much.

5020. Did you find that the Indian education rather tends in the direction of quantity than quality or is quality now coming into its own?—I could not say that they went for quantity alone. I think there is a very strong and, as I think, a right conviction that India needs more education, and not less, and that of course expresses itself in the demand for an education which is quantitatively more efficient; but I think when our evidence reaches this country and you are able to read the Memoranda written by the Indian as well as the European witnesses you will feel that there is the conviction that the education now given should be made better, much better on the physical side, very much better in all that we call in England corporate life in schools, much better in many of the schools in the methods employed in the teaching of languages, and above all an education which will include science and the training of the hand, and which will have a wider outlook than the present education gives.

5021. Did you notice that the proportion of English professors and teachers to the total number has been rapidly dwindling in the last twenty years?—Yes, and in Bengal it was quite seriously small, especially in the high schools; but, of course, you will remember that we were there during the war, and therefore saw it under exceptional circumstances.

5022. Do you think there are some subjects in Western education which cannot properly be taught by Indians who receive their education mainly from other Indians who themselves have never been to Europe?—I think it would be always necessary to have in the education of Bengal a very considerable number of British teachers for the sake of English alone.

5023. English literature?—Yes, especially for the actual language; but to anyone who comes to India as a stranger, as I did, there is nothing more amazing than the high standard of mastery of English possessed by such a large number of the educated classes.

5024. You would not think that an Indian who had never seen a Western country could really teach English history?—I think he would teach it as well as a Briton who had never been to India would teach Indian.

5025. Do you agree with Mr. Chailley's statement that the text book is one of the banes of Indian education, and that the teachers often depend upon it?—The cram book? I think it is a perfect curse; but it is apt to be a curse wherever you get examinations, tyrants instead of servants.

5026. Following upon that, I suppose you found out that unessential examinations in India exercise a most evil influence upon education?—Yes, it was one of the most central parts of our Inquiry to try and discover remedies for that.

5027. Part of your recommendations is that the Universities of India should be made into teaching bodies instead of what they have been too much in the past, purely examining bodies?—Yes; we are anxious that the Universities, which are, of course, necessarily in close relation with the Government, from which they will draw so much of their necessary funds, should be far more autonomous than they have been and able to modify their course of study and their arrangements for examination.

5028. I suppose you read the Report of Lord Curzon's Universities Commission and Lord Curzon's Note on University Education generally?—Yes.

5030. I suppose you realise that there is nothing that Lord Curzon was more attacked upon than that Act of his upon University Education?—Education is always the conservative side of public opinion, and I am sure that many people who care as much as we do about the welfare of Bengal will criticise our Report as very drastic in its recommendations, but in the end I believe it will come through and people will agree with it, because we have not taken only our own conviction, but have really based it on the considered and public judgment of so many hundreds of experienced witnesses in the country.

5031. You do see that there has been in the past a danger in India of the question of education tending to be handled on political lines?—I think that is really true everywhere.

5032. But rather markedly so in India?—Quite, and to lessen it was one of the chief reasons why we want to see greater independent intellectual life in the Universities, and in the second place a much better paid and better trained and more highly honoured body of men as teachers in the secondary schools.

5033. You are advocating the transfer of education on a large scale to the popular Ministers as proposed in the Feetham Committee?—Yes. Your Lordship will remember that our Inquiry in India was concurrent first with the Inquiry of the Secretary of State and the Viceroy, and then with the Inquiry of Lord Southborough's Committees, and we presented our Report to the Viceroy before the Reports of Lord Southborough's Committees were published. Therefore we have expressed no opinion upon any of the points which came immediately within the purview of those Committees.

5034. But you yourself are prepared for a large transfer to the popular Minister?—Speaking as an individual and allowing all the hazard of it I should myself go quite decisively for complete transfer to the Minister subject to the conditions I have ventured to mention, which I think will help now.

5035. You do realise that it may be very difficult to get a Minister from the limited area of selection afforded to the Governor who knows anything whatever about education?—Yes. I am at a disadvantage in knowing so much less about the other Provinces, but I should not have said that about Bengal.

5036. In cases where large sums of money have been given for educational purposes—I myself received over a quarter of a million for educational services—in all these cases it was made a stipulation that the institutions were to be managed by the Government. Do you think they might raise that difficulty, that it is no longer managed by the Executive Government, but by a popular Minister?—Yes; almost the opposite kind of difficulty from that which was felt at first. At the beginning of our Inquiry I was conscious that many of those who appeared before us were extremely anxious that higher education and secondary education should not be handed over to the Government, because they regarded the Government as in no way representative of the mass of Indian opinion, or not directly representative of it. Then, as our Inquiry wore on, we reached a stage in which some might appear who would urge for complete transfer to the new Government, because that would give more authority in the matter to the chosen representatives of Indian opinion. I still think it is wise, as a transition into the new arrangement, to give the Minister the help of a body of really competent and well chosen administrators, such as we suggest in our Board, especially for this reason: that the defect of Indian educational policy has been its narrowness; it has been so little in touch with industrial, commercial and agricultural life; it has been very little in touch with medical science, and has had very little at headquarters that makes it sensitive to the new needs for the education of women. Therefore, to set up a Board in which all those kinds of experience are well represented would, I think, be of very material assistance to a Minister in the years of transition.

5037. Is it not true that the main difficulty with all education in India is the provision of properly trained teachers?—Yes; and, indeed, elsewhere too.

5038. Is it not better then not to make a large extension of schools until properly qualified teachers in sufficient numbers become available?—The one thing leads to the other. I wish there could have been much more done for the professional training of teachers before, but the fact that the schools are there, and that many schools are needed, is now the strongest argument you can get for improving the facilities and training, and for that we make what are very moderate, but at the same time very wide, recommendations.

5039. Did you have an opportunity of making a study of the very important Indian-managed college at Aligahr?—Yes. We all visited Aligahr, and we had the advantage of having one of the chief members of its staff on our Commission, so I think I have heard almost as much about Aligahr as any other single college in India.

5040. You understand that the difficulty of educating girls up to fifteen is that most of them are married long before that age?—Yes.

5041. Do you not think it would be very difficult to get the hard-working agriculturists to find time for primary education in the villages?—You mean for the adults?

5042. Yes, the adults, I mean, as mentioned in your plan?—I do not think it is impossible. I do not mean that they should attend at the same time as the primary school, but I think well-arranged classes, especially at certain times of the year, might be quite successful.

5043. At any rate you think the experiment would be well worth trying?—I think so. It is trying to educate the community together, and not training up the young generation on one plan and leaving the older generation unthought for.

5044. Do you realise the immense difficulty of diverting money left for religious purposes to the purposes of education?—Yes; under present conditions almost insuperable. I imagine that the difficulties, so far as the religious endowments are concerned, would be less if the schools to which these endowments were partly given were those in harmony with the religion for which the charity was given, but when the endowment was for charitable as distinguished from religious purposes the difficulty, although still great, would, I think, be less.

5045. It would be quite impossible for the Government as the Government even to contemplate such a step as that?—Quite. When Mr. Surendranath Banerjea made this very important suggestion to us, I felt, and I have felt ever since, that this is one strong reason for making education perhaps the chief thing by which Indians will try to reach responsible government first. In order to get the education of India at all to the level they desire will involve very great sacrifice, new taxation, great liberality and concentration of funds, but I feel we are much more likely to get that if a representative Indian asks his fellow countrymen for it than if it is asked for by somebody representing another race.

5046. You are opposed generally to sectarian educational establishments; you would wish all the religions of India to mingle in the great establishments for higher education?—Well, personally I think that you cannot have any true system of education unless you teach the boy and the girl some religious faith with it. Whether that should be taught in the school itself or not is, of course, a very large matter, but the fundamental thing in education is to teach the boy or girl what is right and what is wrong and the reasons for believing them so, and that really carries you into a religious faith. I can imagine nothing more disastrous for a country than for the whole of its educational system to be deliberately secularised. On the other hand, I hope the Committee will not think for a moment that I criticise or in any way wish to question the right principle of the Government of India not to in any way take sides in religious matters there, and I think that the policy of neutrality in the Government schools and colleges has been, so far as I am able to follow it, a wise and reasonable course, although I think it is capable, and will be found to be capable, of great new developments.

Sir J. D. Rees.

5047. May I ask you with reference to my noble friend's question, do you consider it is necessary that the Minister of Education should be an educational expert?—No, certainly not.

5048. Is he usually such in responsible democratic Governments?—I am not sure that I can answer that.

5049. Is he such in England, as a rule?—He is at this moment.

5050. I understood my noble friend to suggest that an objection to the transfer of education would be that an Educational Minister suitable would not be available, and if I am wrong my question has no point?—Of course, there are two different kinds of problems which come before Ministers of Education, some being administrative and others really professional and, in the wider sense, technical or educational. Now at this juncture all over the world education is at a stage in which it is extraordinarily important that the man at the top should be very well informed about the currents of educational opinion and shall be able to decide which are fads and which are wise. If you can find a man who has that knowledge, that living experience and administrative training and sense as well, you get your best Minister of Education; but in quieter times, when educational administration is carrying out an accepted series of principles, administration, including, of course, power of economic organisation, becomes probably more important than expert technical knowledge. At this moment in India I feel it is important to get in general control of education in the Provinces a man who has administrative experience, but also who has educational insight and knowledge, and, above all things, zeal.

5051. Do you know the common criticism of education in India or rather of those who have criticised it, that the Hindoo boys merely acquire education for mercenary purposes; do you see any reason to believe that they are different in that to boys elsewhere, and that their attitude towards education is really peculiar?—No, but I think it is accentuated, in Bengal at any rate, because so much more depends for the Bengali boy on passing certain examinations at certain stages and getting certain certificates than for any boy in this country, for example.

5052. More so you say?—Much more so. If a Bengali boy does not pass his matriculation, for instance, and cannot go on, he loses in fact the chance of any Government appointment or any important appointment in connection with the law, and the openings for him in industry and commerce and adventure generally are much more limited than here.

5053. It is not the boy's fault?—It is not, and to answer your first question, I think the necessary desire to qualify for entrance upon a responsible calling is a powerful element in the desire for an extension of higher educational opportunities in India, but it is only one factor out of a number of factors.

5054. You do not condemn the class receiving the education on account of that?—Not a bit, and it is not the only race that is in that position.

5055. Are the results which we see, which have more or less led up to this Commission, of the education given in India very much what might have been expected? Are they the results which would naturally accrue from the education given by the British Government—the attitude of the rising generation and that of the last risen?—I think access to the literature, ideas, and science of the West have opened a new life to India. On the other hand, I think it will be a much greater life for India if her own people intensely feel a sense of loyalty to the Indian past as well, and the two things are possible.

5056. Have the vernaculars sufficient place in the curricula in Indian education?—We have had no replies more interesting than those on that point, and none showing greater division of opinion among Indians. Our own judgment is, that except in the teaching of English and of mathematics, and possibly in some parts of the teaching of science, a very great deal of the teaching in the high schools ought to be through the vernacular.

5057. Do you agree with that?—I agree with that so far as I am competent to express an opinion, but always on the condition that you have not simply as much knowledge of English as you have now, but far better teaching of it in order to produce better results in a shorter time. India ought to be bi-lingual.

5058. It is getting to be so very quickly?—Yes.

5059. If you can, will you express an opinion as to whether the British officers you saw in India are sufficiently acquainted with the vernacular languages? Is your knowledge of the country, generally speaking, sufficient to enable you to answer that?—I could not go into that.

5060. I have to ask you still one or two questions. Do you think education is one of the subjects most suitable for transfer to popular Ministers? Do you not think it is eminently suitable?—I feel that under Indian conditions it is a subject for India of the greatest importance; that Indian opinion is especially interested in it; that the development of education is vital to the future welfare of Indian national life; and therefore, in spite of all the hazards of the change, that the transfer of education is an experiment which ought under safeguards to be tried.

5061. You have stated in the course of your evidence that you contemplated more generous payment from public funds for the schools for physical welfare of the child and better paid teachers; do you contemplate a very much larger expenditure on education than is possible under the revenues at present collected in India?—I should only speak to the question of Bengal, and perhaps, as the question is a large one, I ought to refer you to our chapter on finance. There we have endeavoured not to shirk the difficulty in any way and to show exactly what will be the additional cost of the changes we have recommended.

5062. From the point of view of education as a solvent of caste, would you think that it is consciously and intentionally worked in that way by those who have control of the administration of education?—I never found that.

5064. Could anything be done, and do you contemplate doing anything, to improve or mitigate, shall I say, the educational nomenclature, which warns off so many people and makes so difficult of comprehension this subject?—I am glad to think that if our recommendations were adopted for Bengal there would be a greater uniformity between English and Bengali nomenclature of education than is at present the case.

5065. And that will be an improvement, I gather?—I think anything that helps them to understand our system, and us to understand their system, is an improvement.

Chairman.] Thank you very much, Sir Michael; we are greatly indebted to you.

tion contained in the Preamble?—I accept the proposition that it is desirable to bring about the progressive realisation of responsible government in India. By responsible government I mean the amenability of the executive to the Legislature, and through the Legislature to the electorate. I generally accept the proposition contained in the preamble.

2. Do you think that the realisation of responsible government in the Provinces involves the establishmen in Provincial Legislatures of a substantial elected majority (Clause 6)?—I think that the realisation of responsible government in the provinces involves the establishment in provincial legislatures of a substantial elected majority.

3. Do you think that the non-official members of the Provincial legislatures should possess power to control the actions and policy of the Executive? Do you think they possess such power at present?—I do not think that the non-official members of the provincial legislatures should immediately possess power to control all the actions and policy of the executive. That power is not possessed by such legislatures at present, although they very powerfully influence the actions and policy of the executive, and to an extent greater than is commonly realised.

4. Do you think that there are certain matters or functions of Government in the Provinces in which at present the Provincial Executive must remain responsible to the Secretary of State and Parliament, and must therefore be in a position to enforce its wishes?—I think that for a period of years there are certain matters or functions of Government in the provinces—in particular the preservation of law and order—in which at present the provincial executive must remain responsible to the Secretary of State and Parliament, and must therefore be in a position to enforce its wishes.

5. If you accept the propositions stated under questions 1 to 4 do you think that the dual form of government embodied in the Bill is the best means of securing them? If not, what are your objections to that feature of the Bill, and by what other means would you attempt to secure the objects in view?—I think that the dual form of government proposed in the Bill is the best published means of securing these propositions. In saying this, I wish to make it clear that none can be insensible to the disadvantages in the conditions of India of a dual form of Government and of the advantages of a strong homogeneous unitary executive. But I have seen no other scheme for a provincial constitution which at once secures these propositions and secures that the King's government shall be carried on. I further qualify this statement by the expression of opinion that every effort should be made to secure unity in the administration by the discussion of reserved and unreserved subjects by the Council and the Ministers in common, and that in the instrument of instructions issued to each Governor this goal should be insisted upon.

8. In particular, do you think: (i.) that Ministers should hold office "during pleasure," i.e., should be liable to removal if they are unable to support the action decided upon in their department by the Governor, or if they fail to retain the confidence of the legislature (Clause 3 (1))? (ii.) That the Governor should have power to disregard the opinion of his Ministers if he considers that action in accordance with that opinion is inconsistent with the due discharge of his responsibilities (Clause 3 (3))? (iii.) That the Executive Council should in all provinces normally consist of one official European and one non-official Indian (Clause 4)? (iv.) That the Governor should have power to dissolve his Legislative Council (Clause 7 (4))?—(i.) I think that ministers should hold office "during pleasure," i.e., should be liable to removal if they are unable to support the action decided upon in their department by the Governor, or if they fail to retain the confidence of the legislature. (ii.) That the Governor should have power to disregard the opinion of his Ministers if he considers that action in accordance with that opinion is inconsistent with the due discharge of his responsibilities. (iii.) That the executive Council should in all provinces normally consist of one official European and one non-official Indian. (iv.) That the Governor should have the power to dissolve the Legislative Council. Provided that there is established the Standing Committee of Parliament on Indian Affairs foreshadowed in the Montagu-Chelmsford report.

9. Referring back to Questions 2, 3, and 4, if your answers to the first and third of these are in the affirmative, and if you think that the legislatures should be given greater powers of control and influence than they possess at present, do you regard the limitations imposed generally by Clause 9 of the Bill upon their financial and legislative powers as (1) suitable, or as (2) unnecessarily severe, or as (3) inadequate to safeguard the responsibilities which the Government owes in the last resort to Parliament (Clause 9)?—I regard the limitations imposed generally by Clause 9 of the Bill upon the financial and legislative powers of the legislatures as broadly satisfactory.

10. In particular: (i.) Do you think that the legislature should have power with whatever limitations to vote supplies (Clause 9 (2))? (ii.) Do you accept the plan of Grand Committees as the means of giving to the Government the power to secure essential legislation in the event of their failure to carry their propositions in the Council? If so, have you any modifications of detail to suggest? If not, what other method would you suggest to secure the object in view?—I think that the legislature should have substantial power over the voting of supplies, and I accept the scheme and limitations outlined in the Bill. (ii.) I accept the plan of Grand Committees, because it has the weight of opinion behind it. These opinions are subject to the qualification that the scheme of contributions from the provinces to the revenues of the Government of India should be accepted as transitory only. The basis of that scheme is not regarded as just or equitable, and is put forward as the best adaptation of the existing system. I hold that the basis of responsibility both in the provinces and in the Government of India requires that each shall raise and spend their own revenues. On this ground I hold that the principle should be definitely accepted that the goal should be the allocation of the whole of the provincial revenues to provincial purposes, the Government of India raising all the monies which it requires for its purposes. Whilst this goal is not immediately obtainable owing to the necessities of the Government of India definite steps should be marked out for its realisation by a continuous reduction, say 10 or 20 per cent. each year, so as to secure the elimination of the provincial contributions whilst the Government of India is given time to develop its own revenues. Only in this way can genuine responsibility be built up in the provinces, and the admitted inequities in the proposed scale of contributions removed. The provinces will be responsible for the great ameliorative agencies in India—education, sanitation, local self-government and industrial development, and the whole of their resources will be required for the discharge of these duties.

11. Do you accept the position adopted in the Bill (Part II.) that the time has not yet come to give the Legislative Assembly a similar measure of control over the Central Government as that given to Provincial Legislative Councils over Provincial Governments?—I accept the principle that pending the development of responsible government in the provinces the Government of India must remain responsible only to Parliament. This seems to me incompatible with giving the Legislative Assembly a similar measure of control over the Central Government as that given to provincial legislative councils over provincial governments. Subject to this broad consideration, I am in favour of giving the Legislative Assembly the most liberal constitution compatible with the securing of the primary condition laid down.

12. Do you agree that it is advisable none the less to provide for a substantial elective majority in the Indian

Indian Legislature (Clause 16)?—I agree that it is advisable to provide for a substantial elective majority in the Indian legislature.

13. Do you accept the plan of a bicameral legislature as arising out of this, as constituting both a satisfactory machine for the ordinary purposes of legislation, and as affording the means to the Governor-General in Council to secure legislation which he regards as essential (Clauses 14, 15 and (16)?—And I accept the principle of a bicameral legislature, for I regard the evolution of a strong senatorial body as entirely suited to Indian conditions and conducive to the ordered development of the country. I cannot express an opinion on a technical point such as whether a bicameral legislature affords the Governor-General in Council the means of securing legislation which he regards as essential, but accept the opinion of the Government of India on this point.

14. Do you accept the provisions of the Bill as to the course of legislation in the Indian Legislature (Clause 20 (3) and (4))? Or do you regard them as unnecessarily restrictive on the popular will, or as an inadequate means of ensuring to the Governor-General in Council the discharge of his responsibilities?—I accept the provisions of the Bill as to the course of legislation in the Indian legislature.

15. Do you accept the changes made by the Bill (Clause 21) in the constitution of the Governor-General's Executive Council? If not, what are your reasons, and what modifications would you suggest?—I accept the changes made by the Bill in the constitution of the Governor-General's Executive Council.

17. Do you agree that the gradual realisation of responsible government involves periodical examination of progress, by independent authority, and that the provisions of Clause 28 of the Bill are well designed to afford such examination?—I agree that the gradual realisation of responsible government involves periodical examination of progress, by independent authority, and that the provisions of Clause 28 of the Bill are well designed to afford such examinations.

18. Are there any matters which it is proposed in the Bill to deal with by rule which you would suggest should be provided for in the Bill?—No.

19. Have you any observations to offer in the Reports of Lord Southborough's Committees and of the Committee on the Home Administration of Indian affairs?—In view of the strong opinions which have been manifested, I would leave the question of female suffrage to be decided by the Legislative Councils. Every development in the amenability of the Government of India and the provincial legislatures to the elected councils must be accompanied by a proportionate reduction of the control exercised by the Secretary of State. It is impossible to express an opinion on the proposals of the Committee on the home administration of Indian affairs, until the exact structure of the reconstituted Government of India and Provincial Governments has been determined. At the same time, I feel strongly that the proposed Advisory Council to take the place of the Indian Council can serve no useful purpose. As long as the Council is retained, it should have definite statutory power and authority. The great object in view should, I suggest, be to keep the India Office in quick relation with the rapidly changing conditions in India, and with that end in view the personnel should be drawn from the Indian Civil Service, and service at Whitehall should form a part of the Indian civilian's official career. The official members of the Council should equally be drawn from men in active service, and if retired officials are selected, their term of office should be limited to five years.

5069. Is there anything you would like to say in supplement?—I would rather answer specific questions on any points which the Committee desire me to elaborate.

5071. Will you develop that argument and make suggestions as to how it might be composed?—I am particularly anxious not to take upon myself the role of a constitution maker. I think only those who have had practical experience of administration, which I cannot claim, are competent to speak on that subject. But on the general principle I think that a Second Chamber of a senatorial character is entirely suited both to the political conditions and to the genius of India, and that it would form a revising body composed of men who would not always be able or desire to secure election by a general electorate. It could fulfil in that capacity a most valuable function in the development of the Indian constitution.

5072. Would you amend the present Bill by turning the Council of State at once into a Second Chamber?—It seems to me, when you come to consider the question of the Council of State in its relation to Indian polity, there are certain very important principles which must first be decided, and the greatest of them is, what is to be the attitude of Parliament towards India and the Government of India as reconstituted under this Bill in future? As I read the situation, it seems to me inevitable that the Government of India must undergo a very considerable, not to say a radical, change; many of the existing portfolios will disappear. I am thinking particularly of Education, and in all probability Revenue and Agriculture, which have outgrown their influence and value, and even the Home department; and fresh departments must be created to deal with the new conditions which have arisen. In the reconstituted Government, I think the great forces which will be considered will be economic and fiscal rather than social and educational, because those will be transferred to the Provinces. Unless Parliament clearly makes up its mind to devolve substantial functions and powers in those directions on the Government of India, we cannot proceed to consider how that senatorial body and its powers should be framed.

5074. There are two points of view from which to consider that if you would develop the thought. The first is the one you have indicated, the relation of Parliament to the Government of India in its transitional stage; the second is the power of the Government of India to achieve that legislation which it considers necessary, as long as the responsibility rests upon it?—You are rather taking me into a domain I would rather not traverse, that is, constitution making, of which I do not regard myself as avowedly qualified to speak, but my own personal belief is, that provided this substantial power is devolved by Parliament on the Government of India, particularly in relation to these burning questions of fiscal autonomy and of economic progress, the powers of the Government of India to secure essential legislation need be much less than under the existing scheme.

5075. I will not drag you into that most difficult question, constitution making, if you prefer not. I turn to another point. You have read the Report of the Crewe Committee?—I have.

5076. I rather gather from your answers that you would not be in favour of interfering with the Council of India at the present stage, except in its constitution?—I will put it somewhat differently. With regard to the report of the Crewe Committee, I can see no value in an advisory Council. I do not think men of the requisite calibre and authority would care to sit on a Council where their advice might be accepted or disregarded, where they might be consulted or ignored at the

the personal discretion of the Secretary of State. As long as the Council is retained, I think it should retain definite constitutional functions. The great object in the alteration of the constitution of the Indian Council should proceed on quite different lines, and it should aim at what I understand was the main desire of the Admiralty—you will correct me if I am wrong. I believe the main desire of the Admiralty was to keep the administration in very living contact with Sea Command. At the present time the India Office is not in that quick contact with the rapidly changing conditions in India, which many regard as absolutely essential to the whole purpose of India Office Reform, and the change should be, I think, to establish that living contact with the conditions in India, which change so fast, and which, so far as I can see, is in no way provided for by the Report of the Crewe Committee.

5077. If that living contact were established, would you be in favour of suggesting, with Sir James Brunyate, that the Council of India should be left as it is until after the first decennial review, and whether it expired then or not would depend upon the decision at that time?—No, I would not.

5078. Lord Sinha reminds me that his idea was that it should come to an end at the end of ten years, unless the Commission of Review otherwise advised?—The Council of India should be retained not as at present constituted, but both the Council of India and the India Office should be reconstituted to attain the end which I venture to put before you.

Lord Brodrick (Viscount Midleton).

5079. With regard to that question, do you think that any Secretary of State who is not acquainted with India taking up office would be really able to carry out his duties without some efficient Council beside him?—I do not think he would.

5080. Your main point is that the men who advise him should be fresh?—Yes, and also the personnel of the office, too. They should be drawn as far as possible from men acquainted with modern conditions in India.

5081. In fact, you would like the two services interchangeable?—I should.

5082. Do you regard that as an advantage to both sides?—Undoubtedly. I can see nothing but an advantage in an Indian civil servant, after he has acquired a reasonable knowledge of the country, coming and serving at the India Office for two or three years, and thus gaining a more intimate knowledge of British administrative methods and of the spirit of British politics than he could possibly acquire by remaining in India and studying these questions when he is on leave.

5083. It would be an advantage to the Indian civil servant to get in touch with home opinion?—I think so.

5084. You speak of the rapidly changing conditions in India. What do you exactly mean?—Do you mean great advance in political interest or what?—I go much further than that. I would say the whole conditions of India have been completely revolutionised since I first went to India in 1897, and that revolution covers every form of economics, the social structure, and politics. I think that the greatest change of all has been in the economic condition of India. When I went to India in 1897 it was a country with a poor and congested agricultural population, subject to decimating and enormously dislocating famines, such as those of 1896 and of 1899. The condition of India now is one when every single industry is short of labour. If you look back to the old records, before I went to India, we were taught to believe that the greatest problem of India was an enormous scheme of State-aided emigration. The greatest problem of India to-day is to find an adequate supply of labour for every form of industry, even including agriculture as well as manufacturing industries. Secondly, there has been a very marked change in the financial power of India. If you will bear with me I will show that by one set of figures. In 1914 the Finance Member thought he had accomplished an unparalleled achievement by raising a Government loan of 5½ crores of rupees in one year. That was the largest Government loan which had ever been raised. In 1917 and 1918 the aggregate Government borrowings were 140 crores of rupees, which was achieved without any dislocation of the financial market. That is the difference in economic conditions reflected in finance. Thirdly, I think there has been an extraordinary change in the whole social outlook of India; there has been a great quickening of public spirit affecting every form of life, social service, the desire for education, the desire for a higher standard of living, desire for a higher standard of social surroundings, which is bearing slow but very useful fruit. There has been a quickening of the whole political activity of Inda, which has developed to an extraordinary degree, but not, I think, out of proportion to the other great changes which have been going on in the basic forces of the State. There have arisen in India two main forces; one is the desire of Indians to take the larger share in the government of their own country, not from purely selfish motives, but with the idea of quickening the growth of those forces on which they think its national progress depends; and an even stronger force than that I think is the desire of eminent Indians in every walk of life that India shall rise to her full stature amongst the dominions of the Empre. I think that is one of the strongest forces in India to-day.

5085. Making an allowance for that great advance, do you still consider that, as in other countries, strong powers must be reserved to the Central Government?—I think during the period of development that the one great thing we have to avoid in India is anything in the nature of a revolutionary change. If we can only get our constitutional policy on sound evolutionary lines, leading towards a definite goal in a comparatively reasonable period, I think we may face the future with serene confidence.

5086. One question about your statement as to finance. Speaking of the scheme of contributions from the Provinces to the revenues of the Government of India, you say that the basis of that scheme is not regarded as just or equitable. Did you mean by one Province as compared with another, or did you mean they were to contribute too much?—I mean one Province as compared with another. The scheme put forward by his Excellency the Viceroy and Mr. Montagu took a rough-and-ready adaptation of the existing system, and did not pretend that it was just or equitable, and it cannot be because of the different Land Revenue systems in different parts of India.

Chairman.

5087. Because of the permanent settlement?—Yes. The scheme put forward even later by the Government of India does not pretend to be equitable, and I think it essential that Provincial finance should be made so equitable that each Province should bear its full share of the cost of those agencies which it is anxious to develop, and should not batten on other Provinces by paying less than its fair share of contribution to the Government of India. The only way you can get rid of that inequity is to draw an absolutely sharp line between the revenues of the Government of India and the revenues of the Provinces. That line, I think, should aim at giving the Provinces within the shortest possible period the whole of their Provincial revenues and imposing on the Government of India the duty of raising all its own revenues. I think that the scheme outlined in the Government of India's letter, which aims at the revision, at an early date, of the scale of Provincial contributions, cannot be carried out, because it would cause such a dislocation of Provincial finance that it could not be adjusted. Moreover, I think we want to impose both on the Provinces the responsibility—the full financial responsibility—of financing their own agencies, and on the Government of India the full financial responsibility of raising the money which it wants for its own requirements. As a matter of fact considerable progress has been made towards that goal, if you watch the figures, particularly by the development of Imperial sources of revenue like Customs, Income Tax, Railways and Super-tax.

Lord Brodrick (Viscount Midleton).

5088. Does not that involve establishing two sets of tax gatherers?—Practically not. I speak subject to correction, but the main division under the scheme will be income tax where the Provinces collect the money and the Imperial Government takes it, and the Provinces get a small commission on collecting it, because it it is an unpopular tax, and without an interest in the usufruct otherwise they would not be energetic in the work of collection. But I cannot conceive why the Government of India should not develop its own income tax collecting agency, particularly as the machinery is being steadily improved.

5090. Do you not think there is a certain danger in directing the minds of people who pay taxes to certain services which are remote, and from which they get a very remote benefit, that is to say, asking them to put into two categories that to which they contribute?—Not under what would be the basis of our financial system in India. The main sources of Imperial Revenue would be Customs, Salt, Posts and Telegraphs, Railways, Income Tax, and Super-tax; and, if further sums were needed, probably something in the nature of an even more steeply graduated Income Tax and Death Duties. I know under the scheme the Succession Duties are given to the Provinces. If by Succession Duties are meant what may ultimately grow into Death Duties, I cannot conceive that that is sound finance. I think that is an Imperial source of revenue.

5091. You have had great experience with a view to directing the minds of the electorate to the work which is to be done, and not merely to agitating for something more; what period would you fix, without regard to the period fixed in the Bill, if a substantial step forward is made, before there should be a re-consideration of the powers given?—If a substantial, generous, and confident step is made now, anl made promptly, I think the ten years selected by the Bill is not an excessive period in which these changes might be worked out.

5092. You are aware it is said that in America, where there are only four years, there is only one year which is free from electioneering?—I believe that is so.

5093. In how many years do you think we should get free from discussion of powers rather than the use of powers?—With the world moving at the present rate, I should be loth to fix a longer period than ten years.

Sir Henry Craik.

5094. In your statement you express yourself as not insensible to the disadvantages of the dual system?—I do.

5095. You are rather forced into it as the only means you can suggest?—It is the only scheme which has stood in the same degree the test of criticism. When the scheme was proposed it was not popular. I think there has been a very strong rallying to it as the best available means of meeting the position which has to be faced to-day.

5096. Have you any precedent that you can quote in favour of this scheme as a means of development?—None. I do not think we have any precedent either for the existing conditions in India.

5098. You see in this scheme, I presume, the disadvantage that it would be a nominal unified government in the Province, at the same time composed of two elements which might be very diverse, one from the other?—That is so. On the other hand, I have specified my own personal opinion that although you have a duality of functions, it should be a distinct charge committed to the Governor of every Province by

His Majesty when he delivered him his instructions that his great aim should be to preserve as far as possible unity in that Executive; that the pay, status, and emoluments and position of Ministers and members of Executive Councils should be identical; that all important questions should be considered and discussed in common; and whilst the final decision in one set of cases would rest upon the Governor and his Council, and the other on the Governor and his Minister, those decisions should not be come to on major questions until they have been discussed in common. And so far as the Bombay Presidency, with which I am chiefly concerned, is affected, I see the very greatest hopes of arriving at a much more substantial unified government than may appear from a perusal of the scheme.

5099. Have you ever given any attention to the question of a joint or separate purse?—The joint and separate purse has only come to the front since the last despatch of the Government of India. To that proposal one would like to give the greatest weight as coming from the eminent authority by which it was framed. On general grounds I should be very reluctant to accept that proposition.

5100. You do accept it?—I should be very reluctant to accept it.

5101. I thought you said, "I should very reluctantly accept it"?—No, I say I should be very reluctant to accept it, and I would not unless it was shown that no other course was conceivable. I think the question of the divided purse will inevitably tend to a division between the two elements of government when we want to preserve unity. Unless I saw the scheme worked out as to a particular Province, I think it is more likely or just as likely to create friction as it would be to create common action, because the revenues of Indian Provinces vary enormously from year to year. Thirdly, I would impose on Members of Council in charge of the reserved subjects the same incentive to economy and to care in administration that I would impose on Ministers, and if they have fixed revenues they would be inclined to spend up to them instead of economising, which I regard as one of the primary functions we have to pursue in India. On those grounds I say unless it is proved to be absolutely essential I think the separate purse is a proposal which should not be pressed.

5102. Do you not think that responsible government can best be developed by making arrangements which would recognise the responsibility which rests on each Minister for his own particular province?—You mean with regard to developing his own sources of revenue?

5103. Responsibility all round?—I do.

5104. You cannot have responsibility without financial responsibility?—The Government of India say in their letter that they have worked out their scheme as applied to a particular Province. I do not think it is published in the Report. I should like to see it before I expressed a definite opinion on any principle. I am totally opposed to the theory of the divided purse.

5105. But it is not with regard to any particular scheme; it is the principle only upon which I am asking you a question. I ask you, if you are to bring home responsibility to any Minister, is it not necessary that that responsibility should be financial?—Responsibility for the expenditure of the department which he administers.

5106. And for raising the taxation that is necessary for that?—Pardon my ignorance of constitutional questions, but I do not know any constitution where every Minister is responsible for raising the whole revenues of his department.

5107. That is quite true, but surely in that case there is constitutionally a Finance Minister, and the decisions with regard to the Finance Minister are unanimous decisions of the whole Cabinet or the circle of Ministers. How can you have that when there are two elements, the popular and the official element, which may fundamentally disagree? Who is to decide in that case as to financial responsibility?—Under the scheme, and under the Bill, I take it the Governor and his Executive Council decide it.

5108. That simply makes the authority which you give to the Minister one which is subject at every turn to the ultimate decision of the Governor and his Executive Council?—I think that "subject at every turn" is further further than I should like to go—I should say subject to that decision on his Budget allotment for his department. Once it was settled he would have almost a free hand in the spending and allocation of that money.

5109. You are not going to give him—I do not care for the free hand—the responsibility which seems to me constitutionally far more important than a free hand—the responsibility for raising money and for increasing taxation which may be consequent upon his administration?—If I understand the Bill aright, the responsibility for raising taxation is deliberately imposed on a Minister if it is essential for his own department.

Sir J. D. Rees.

5110. Have you had any other occupation in India besides that of a journalist?—I was for nine months Vice-President of the Publicity Bureau.

5111. Have you been brought into contact with the people in Bombay?—I have had a good many outside activities.

5112. You described the changes which have taken place in India. Do you think it would be possible in view of those rapid and recent changes to continue to rule in India upon the old bureaucratic lines?—I do not like the word "bureaucratic."

5113. The old lines?—I say you would be deliberately courting disaster.

5114. Do you see in the fact that even now those who agitate for these reforms are a minority any reason for refusing or postponing them?—None.

5115. Do you think the people in India have taken into account the fact that a small, vocal, and capable minority of women in England got the Franchise even without going to an election?—That is rather a more general question than I should like to answer.

5116. You describe the improvements in India, from which I gather that you do not accept the creed that the establishment of a foreign trade between England and India is a drain which bleeds the country to death?—I think that theory has exploded since you left.

5117. It is still maintained by one of its apostles, as you know, who has just written a book about it. You refer to the Legislature's at present powerful influence on the action and policy of the Executive. Will they still have it and more under the scheme of the Bill?—I think so.

5118. You say that no one can be insensible to the disadvantages in the conditions of India of a dual form of government. Is not this almost inseparable from a country in which there is a foreign people at the head of the Government and indigenous people in the country?—I have seen no other scheme which carries out the preamble of the Bill.

5119. In answer to Sir Henry Craik you explained very clearly your objection to the separate purse as militating against the unity of the administration. Sir Henry thought there would be great difficulties in bringing home the responsibility of expenditure to the Minister. Do you think that should be considered as a great obstacle?—I think not.

5120. Has there been brought home to Ministers in the British Government the responsibility of expenditure for their own Departments?—Not unless I have strangely misread the news of the day.

5121. Then it would hardly be an insurmountable obstacle in starting this scheme. In answer No. 8 you make certain stipulations, things which you say you think should be done. As I understand, they are the Bill, with the exception of the last, the Standing Committee. If I am right, it is needless to ask questions upon that?—Practically the Bill, yes.

5122. I pass that. You say in answer 11: "These opinions are subject to the qualification that the scheme of contributions from the Provinces to the revenues of the Government of India should be accepted as transitory only. The basis of that scheme is not regarded as just or equitable." Are you saying that out of solicitude for Madras and the Central Provinces, or out of a sense of justice that Bombay should relinquish its privileged position?—I am saying it on the principle that until that is carried out there can be no true Provincial responsibility, because some of the Provinces will be spending money which is not legitimately theirs.

5123. You say the principle should be accepted that the Government of India should raise what moneys it requires for its own purposes. Do you think it can, for the Army, the railways, and all the very large operations it has to carry on?—Immediately, no; but as spread over a term of years, I think yes. The whole tendency of Indian finance goes to show that what you may call the Imperial revenues are growing out of proportion to the Provincial revenues. The land revenue is practically stationary; income tax and railways are rapidly growing.

5124. You give as an instance of that the system of capturing capital which is known as death duties?—I do.

5125. Is it the case in India that the House of Lords occupies a very high position in the public estimation—the people there look to it very much for light and leading and guidance?—Well, that is a general question which I should not like to answer.

5126. You do not know?—No. I would say that I think the discussion in India of the principle of a Second Chamber has been dominated by a failure to appreciate the value of a Second Chamber in a democratic constitution, such as that of France or the United States, and if greater attention and study were given to the constitution of the United States, as against the constitution of the United Kingdom, much of the present opposition to the principle of a Second Chamber would disappear.

5127. It would be a relevant question in favour of the establishment of a Second Chamber in the Central Government, whether or not the limitations which have been imposed on the authority of the House of Lords are, or are not, very unpopular in India?—I think that is too general a question for me to answer.

5128. You would rather claim to represent European opinion in Bombay?—I do not claim to represent any opinion but my own.

5129. Have you anything you wish to say as to whether, under the scheme of the Bill, you think the upper classes would be able, unless certain alterations were made in it which I do not mean to cite, to oppress, or wish to oppress, or are likely to oppress the lower classes?—It depends mainly on how far the principle of communal representation is carried. I say at once I differ in toto from the criticism of the communal principle which has appeared in the Report of His Excellency the Viceroy and Mr. Montagu. I say that the experience of India goes to show conclusively that, so far from a reasonable recognition of the communal principle being non-democratic and non-national, it is precisely the contrary. No one who was in India before the Morley-Minto reforms of 1909 were introduced, and who has been there since can fail to appreciate that such success as that scheme has had was largely due to the recognition of the principle of communal representation for the Mohammedans. So much so that some of the most eminent Hindu opponents of that principle afterwards recognised that they were wrong. If there is to be any preventive against the oppression of minorities, or even large uneducated majorities, under this Bill, it must be done by the recognition of the communal principle in the constitution of the Provincial and Imperial Councils.

5130. Where the people you describe would be 97 per cent. of the population, is it possible to give them communal representation? Does not that mean the exclusion of the 3 per cent. rather than the representation of the 97 per cent?—That is the reductio ad absurdum, is it not?

5131. But it is so easily so reduced, is it not?—It is so easily done, and it is so easily not done, I think.

5132. I leave that. Do you think that the objection to the transfer of certain subjects of administration and to the creation and appointment of Ministers really is that they are to be Indian Ministers and Indian administrators of those subjects, or to the technical objections to a division of authority?—Of what class of objection are you speaking?

5133. The objections which are raised—the criticisms directed against the division of subjects?—Unless you specify the particular class of objection, I could not hazard an opinion.

5134. I do not think, then, I will pursue that. Do you think that sufficient representation is provided for European commerce in Bombay?—Yes.

5135. You think it is satisfactory.—Yes.

5136. Do you see any reason why British commerce and the investment of British capital in India should be impaired by the acceptance of the scheme of the Bill?—No.

5137. Is there anything to be said for the objections raised?—I think the apprehensions are natural, but I do not think that they are likely to be justified in practice.

5138. Do you hold that the flow of British capital into India is of great advantage to that country?—I hold that it has been of immense advantage to that country, although in future I think that India is likely to be not only less dependent on the supply of British capital, but may conceivably be completly independent. The increase in the borrowing power of India, and in the money power of India, has been so phenomenal that the old dependence on the London market, which paralysed government in your day, Sir John, has practically disappeared.

5139. In view of the recent labour troubles in Bombay, are you still of opinion that the creation of the cotton mills in Bombay was a good thing for the operatives in India?—Undoubtedly.

Mr. Spoor.

5140. I do not know whether you were present at the Committee yesterday morning?—I was not.

5141. You have not read probably the evidence given by Mr. Welby, another journalist?—I have not.

5142. It appears to be rather contradictory to yours. In answer to a question Mr. Welby said this: I asked him with regard to the development of political consciousness in India during recent years, and as to whether there was any real demand for reform. In answer to that he said: "As far as the bulk of them is concerned there is no demand for self-government or anything approaching it. There is no doubt some vague feeling that progress in certain directions would be desirable; here and there there is that feeling even among the masses." Do you agree with that answer?—I would prefer, if you would not mind, that you asked me specific questions rather than ask me to express dissent from, or agreement with, answers given by another witness.

5143. Then I will ask you, in your opinion, is there a real demand throughout India for responsible self-government?—The greatest error we fall under in India is arguing from the particular to the general. My twenty-two years have been mainly spent in Bombay; although I have travelled over every part of India, and was for nine months with the Government of India, I am not qualified to express an opinion in regard to any other Province of India than Bombay. But I say in regard to Bombay there has been an undoubted quickening, a remarkable and phenomenal quickening of every form of Provincial life and energy, and a rapidly and markedly increased desire to take a more personal and even a self-sacrificing part in developing a more national form of government. I believe that, subject to variations between Province and Province, that is true of the greater part of India.

5144. If there has been that extraordinary development, do you think that this Bill is a sufficiently substantial first step, or would you be inclined to go further?—With regard to the Provinces I think the Bill is a sufficiently substantial first step, so much so that some of the most advanced Indian politicians, when it was published, expressed to me the opinion that with regard to Provinces it went further than they had asked for.

5145. Do you think that even at the beginning the franchise might be widened somewhat?—That is a matter which refers more to the districts than with the cities, and I cannot claim to speak of the districts.

5146. In your answer to question 19 you say, "In view of the strong opinions which have been manifested I would leave the question of female suffrage to be decided by the Legislative Councils." I would like you to amplify that?—When this question of women's suffrage has been discussed in India there have been markedly varying opinions even amongst Indians who take an active part in public life. As I have read the summaries of evidence one set of opinions only has been put before this Committee, and that in opposition to the views both of the Franchise Committee and of the Government of India. In Bombay there are a large number of ladies most eminently qualified to exercise the vote, and who are taking to-day a most valuable part in public affairs, although chiefly on the social side. Most certainly, to exclude such ladies from the vote if they wished to exercise it could not possibly be justified. In other Provinces the position may not be quite so strong, and orthodoxy may be stronger. I would leave each Province to settle it in its own Legislative Council according to its own wishes.

5147. Speaking for Bombay you emphatically support Women's Suffrage?—Yes; provided one thing. I believe amongst the objections raised to women's suffrage is that it would need all sorts of special means of recording the vote. That I do not think would mean Women's Suffrage in the true sense of the term. I believe at our present municipal elections a lady who wishes to exercise the suffrage exercises it through the recognised channels. I am strongly in favour of that so far as the Bombay Presidency is concerned.

5148. You spoke of the revolution in economic conditions. I was extremely interested in what you said about the shortage of labour in industry. What effect has that had upon wages, because we hear terrible accounts of the appallingly low wages?—Speaking from my own experience in Bombay City, in the last fifteen years wages have gone up nearly 400 per cent., and certainly until the war created this complete bouleversement in prices, the wages of the operatives in the mills of Bombay were quite adequate for their social needs. That is not my opinion, nor is it the opinion of anybody connected with the industry, but it is the opinion of one of the most active and devoted social workers we have. Of course the sudden inflation of prices from 1916 onwards upset everything; but the rise in wages has been astonishing, and has affected many of the poorest and most backward parts of India.

5150. That, of course, simply refers to the City of Bombay?—Mainly to the City of Bombay. You might also take Ahmedabad; there are only two or three manufacturing cities in Bombay—Bombay, Ahmedabad and Sholapur.

5151. Do you think the economic conditions which have obtained there for many years have been one of the contributory causes of this awakening?—No. Let me qualify that. I think the spectacle of low economic conditions has quickened in the minds of many Indian publicists and patriots a desire to take a more active part in a policy which will improve those economic conditions. I thought your question applied to specific operatives.

5152. No?—Then I will qualify my answer in that way.

5153. With regard to whether the Bill is sufficiently substantial, after what you said about this extraordinary development throughout Bombay—and I take it that as far as you know it would apply to other Provinces—do not you think that a substantial measure of responsibility might be given in the Central Government?—With regard to the Central Government everything hinges on the relation of the Central Government to Parliament. Under the reformed or revised constitution of India the main political questions in the Central Parliament will be fiscal and economic. Now if Parliament is going to force on that re-constituted Government, against the unanimous opinion of all members of that Government, English and Indian, a measure like the Excise Duty on cotton piece goods, I say you dare not contemplate any measure of responsibility because you would not get that policy carried out. If, on the other hand, Parliament is prepared to give the Government of India, as constituted, a reasonable freedom in dealing with these matters, I think we should approach that question of responsibility in a totally different manner, and I, personally, should rejoice if it were possible possible immediately to introduce an element of responsibility on those lines in the Government of India.

5154. You think that subject to those conditions responsibility might be safely introduced into the Central Government at once?—A measure of responsibility.

Major Ormsby-Gore.

5155. Am I to understand you think that the time has come when Parliament should give up its present powers over the Indian Budget?—Substantially, yes. I think it should content itself with the revising and criticising power.

5156. That is to say, you think the fiscal policy of India should be left to India, that is to say, to the Government of India and the Legislative Assembly, and should not be dictated by the Secretary of State in Council and Parliament?—Most emphatically.

5157. Would you look to keep both the theory and the fact that all the revenues of India are the property of the Secretary of State in Council?—I would rather look to the application of the theory itself.

5158. If you do away with the financial veto of the Council of India, which is the basis of its statutory power at present, do you think you could give it any other function which would attract the best type of Indians and the best type of Englishmen to serve on that Council?—It seems to be inevitable that during the evolutionary period of the Indian constitution the interest of Parliament must be quick and vivid in Indian affairs, much more so than in the past, and I think on this ground alone, amongst others, you would attract many of the best brains in India to the service of the Secretary of State's Council.

5159. If the Council were retained, would you be prepared to see half that Council consist of Indians and half of Englishmen?—Yes, I think I should.

5161. That is to say, you would like to see the Government of India, quite apart from the Secretary of State, have a High Commissioner in London?—I should, charged with the functions suggested in the Report of the Crewe Committee.

5162. If the recommendation of the Crewe Committee, that where the Government of India and the Legislative Council agree there should be no interference by the Secretary of State, were carried out, would not that constitute a measure of advance towards responsible government in the Government of India?—It would.

5163. And that would be regarded and appreciated as such by the Indian people?—They must speak for themselves. I hope it would be, because that is the reasonable view to take.

5165. You spoke of economic development. Do you look forward in the next ten years to a considerable increase in the industrialisation of India?—I do, and I regard it as one of the most essential conditions to Indian progress. Without a considerable expansion of the manufacturing industries of India there can be no real progress in the country, for this reason: 70 per cent. of the population of India to-day is dependent upon agriculture. That agriculture is dependent, again, upon a most erratic rainfall. Every time the rainfall fails there is a tremendous social and economic disturbance of the whole of the affected area. We are moving towards much greater stability. I saw the famine districts of 1896 and the famine districts of 1899, and I hope I shall never see such sights again. Last year we had a failure of rain, I believe almost equal to, if not greater than, that of 1899, and if you look at the figures which are published weekly, you will see an enormous reduction in the number of people who had to come for State relief. That reduction is due to several causes—the extension of irrigation, the rise in value of produce, which has raised the economic status of the people, but it is due in a very large degree to such development of industries as has occurred and which has absorbed a larger proportion of the agricultural population in time of need. The census population of Bombay is 900,000. When I left Bombay on the 3rd May, the Health Officer estimated that owing to the influx from the famine districts the actual population was 1,400,000, and there were no unemployed. The industry of the City had absorbed, without any demand for State aid, that overflow from the agricultural population brought about by the failure of the rains. In 1899 I visited the Ahmedabad district in the famine year, and the condition was too grievous for words. In 1911 there was an equal failure of the rain, but the whole of the surplus agricultural population was absorbed by the mill industry of Ahmedabad. When you consider this intimate relation between the growth of manufacturing industries and the social condition of the agricultural population, you must come to the conclusion that one of the greatest efforts in India must be made towards a considerable increase in manufacturing enterprise almost regardless of cost.

5166. Would you be prepared to transfer such subjects as factory legislation and labour welfare and housing to the popular side of the Government?—I should. There has been a very remarkable quickening of interest in social welfare of recent years.

5167. And you think that the suggestion that the higher castes do not take an interest in social questions but are merely interested in political questions is quite unfounded?—I would put it slightly differently. I would provide for the representation in the Councils of all interests, and then you need not bother about your higher castes or your lower castes. Those people will speak for themselves, and they will get their own point of view substantially recognised.

5169. On the point of communal representation, do you ask us to give communal representation to any particular class or section of the community that is not to get it under the proposals of the Southborough Committee?—I do not want to go into details if I can help it, but I do ask you emphatically to recognise the principle that communal representation is a national, a democratic and a unifying force in the transitional stage of India.

Mr. Bennett.

5170. I think you did yourself rather less than justice, did you not, when you said that you spoke from a Bombay experience mainly? Is it not a fact that during the 22 years you have been in India you have had opportunities for seeing the whole of India and seeing Indian questions from an Indian point of view. You have travelled very largely in India?—I have visited every part of India, Burmah and Ceylon, and most parts of India many times, and have done my best to acquire a knowledge of its conditions.

5171. You have come into exceptionally close contact with official thought, with European thought and with Indian thought of all classes, have you not?—I would rather somebody else answered the question, but I think I have.

5172. I put that question in order that the Committee may estimate the weight of your evidence You have spoken of the enormous increase in the political life and consciousness of India that you have seen in that time: Is it not the case that a number of classes and interests, which in your earlier days in India took no part in politics, are now taking a very active part in them?—I think that is undoubtedly so.

5173. In fact, what has happened in India may be described in a word of Gambetta's—new social strata have been brought into political life?—I think that is absolutely so.

5174. It is the case that the commercial element and the manufacturing element of India, which held aloof from political movements a few years ago, now have a very active place?—It has a much more active place in all political movements.

5176. You would probably point as an illustration of it to the movement during the recent terrible epidemics, the organisation of a social service for the benefit of the stricken multitude in Bombay at that time?—I think you can take a field much wider than that. Those of us who went to India 22 years ago know that the official was then almost unaided in dealing with all forms of natural calamity—famine, plague or pestilence. Now, I think most officials will agree with me that they are able to call upon an amount of Indian volunteer effort which they could never have dreamt of getting hold of 20 years ago. We have also an organised society, like the Servants of India Society, and others, who are prepared as corporate bodies to take up this work. A very remarkable illustration was just before I left. A Hindu lady of high caste left Bombay to go through the famine-affected district of Katiawar to try to help the Purdah women who were suffering from the effects of famine. That was almost inconceivable 20 years ago.

5177. You spoke of Clause 28 in the Bill. I think you spoke with satisfaction of it. So far as its directions for inquiry into the working of the new system are concerned, do you regard that clause as going quite far enough? You notice this that one of the subjects of the Report is "whether, and to what extent, it is desirable to extend or modify the degree of responsible government then existing in any Province." Have you heard that section criticised?—The Bill was published after I left India, but on the general principle of these examinations by the Commission I think it is a most valuable provision, which should govern any recommendation on this question. Our difficulties in India are that our political life is much more static than dynamic. That must arise out of the conditions of the country. You have your governing body immensely busy with their everyday work, almost hopelessly overworked; you have no very large and articulate electorate pressing for reform; and without something in the form of a periodical revision Indian politics must develop rather by explosion than by evolution. I think we want to get rid of that now, and provide that after a certain period, whatever it may be, the Indian constitution should be re-examined by an independent body appointed by Parliament, and I would suggest that that body's powers should not be curtailed by any narrow reference to it or narrow description of its functions.

5178. Have you heard this criticism? The inquiry is limited to the extent to which it is desirable to extend or modify the degree of responsible government which is existing in any Province; have you heard the criticism that that excludes the consideration of whether in the Central Government any extension of power should be given?—I have not heard that specific point raised, but I should think it would be perfectly natural if it was raised.

5179. Do you agree with ten years being absolutely fixed as the time at which the inquiry is to take place? Do not matters move so rapidly in India that even before the ten years have expired we may be called upon to reconsider our position, and consider even then whether another step might be taken? You would not at the time, for instance, of the passing of the Morley-Minto Reforms have thought that it was possible that in six or seven years the question should be raised whether a radically different system of Government should not be applied to India? Things have moved very rapidly since the Morley-Minto Reform?—Very rapidly.

5180. When was their incompleteness for the necessities of India first discovered by those who did discover it? Some, of course, would say there was no such thing?—The Morley-Minto schemes were not accepted by the extremer element on their actual passage, and a certain movement began fairly quickly, but I should feel inclined to say it began to gather force just before the war, and, of course, gathered tremendously accelerated force during the war. Theoretically, there is nothing to be said for the fixed ten years. It may be desirable three or five years hence. Practically, I suggest there is a great deal to be said for a fixed period, provided it is not too far ahead. Otherwise, lacking that assurance, there will be an inevitable tendency for those who are dissatisfied with the existing system, to stimulate inquiry by expressions of discontent, whereas if they feel that within a certain reasonable period the work will be overhauled by a thoroughly independent body in close contact with the political life of India, they will be more prepared to say: "Let us work this scheme out together till that period comes."

5181. Do you think it would be a wise modification to say that a Commission should be instituted not later than ten years hence?—I think it would be.

5182. You are in favour of the women's vote not for universal application, I take it? Would you think that an enabling clause, empowering the various Local Legislatures, if they thought fit, to admit the women to the franchise would meet the necessities of the situation?—I think it would.

5183. An enabling clause?—Yes.

5184. The scheme provides for the separate representation of mill-owners. Are you altogether satisfied with separate representation of employers, when no specific provision is made for the representation of those whom they employ? Is not that likely to keep alive rather unsatisfactory controversies as between capital and labour?—I am strongly in favour of separate representation for the great industrial and commercial interests, which has been provided for in the Franchise Report. I am, because in the special conditions of India, and for the reasons which I have given, I regard industrial progress as one of the paramount aims to be attained in the immediate future. I think it would be most unwise to shut out of the Councils of the State at such a time specific representatives of those interests. After all they are a mere handful of the whole. I cannot conceive that such a small number would be likely to dominate the very large number of other interests which will be represented. If it were possible to represent labour I would unhesitatingly approve of it, but the trouble in India is that you have no organised labour body, and until that organised labour body is created on a substantial basis I think you must come down to nomination as provided for in the Southborough Committee's scheme.

5185. Have you thought of the possibility—it is a very remote possibility, I admit—of having the industries represented as a whole?—I have thought of it, but you are up against the difficulty of the peculiar floating character of your industrial population. As the Chairman of the Mill Owners' Association recently said, an agriculturist the Bombay operative was; an agriculturist he is; and an agriculturist he will remain; and a man who is never at his work continuously, who works for one year and then returns to his village, is very difficult to weld into any form of association of the character which you have in view. If I were an operative I would rather be represented by one of the social workers than by anybody I might be able directly to elect.

5186. Do you find in the political life of India any of that altruism which existed in England in the '40's, when, long before the vote had been given to the operative classes, the conditions of factory life in England were radically improved, mainly by the action of men belonging to the English aristocracy?

Mr. Bennett—continued.

Do you find any altruistic feeling corresponding in any degree to that amongst the intelligentia, as they are called?—That the intelligentia are more interested in the economic condition of the operative classes than they were I think is an undoubted fact, but curiously enough the impetus to better economic conditions is coming from the employers themselves. I suppose it is rather anathema maranatha to say anything good of any employer, but if you study the conditions of factory life in the pages of the Report of the Industrial Commission they will tell you that in Madras Messrs. Binney and Company have set up almost ideal conditions for their operatives. I am assured by my friends from Bengal that the jute manufacturers of their own volition, and without any pressure either from public opinion or the State, have effected great sanitary improvements. In Bombay City there is a movement on foot to reduce hours by two per diem, and a considerable number of mill owners are now setting out to construct better quarters for their operatives. They are doing this without any assistance from the rates or from the State, and they are practically regarding as a bad debt every single penny that they spend on it, because labour cannot be well housed on an economic basis.

5187. They have been rather slow to arrive at that, have they not?—They have been slow—painfully slow—and the conditions are painfully bad, but the improvement is coming from within.

5188. We have heard from a number of witnesses here of the necessary unpopularity of the Minister of Finance. Do you agree that it is an invidious nad an odious task to levy taxation?—Taxation is always unpopular; but the ratio of taxation in India has been considerably increased in the last five years, and the Finance Member who was most responsible for it left amid somewhat flattering demonstrations of personal popularity.

5189. In India there is nothing worse than what in an old phrase was called "an ignorant impatience of taxation"?—I think not.

5190. In referring to the women's vote you said you would not like special provisions to be made for the women. That means, I take it, that you would make no special provision for Purdah ladies?—No; otherwise you lose the educative value of the vote.

5191. You wish the women to develop their political muscles, so to speak?—Yes; and to have the opportunity of developing them.

5192. With regard to the strength of the Moderate Party in India, will you say something about that?—It is a very difficult question to answer. If by strength you mean their hold on the country, at times of political excitement it is always the men who shout the loudest, who bulk most largely. I think Mr. Pickwick's advice is as true now as it was at the Eatanswill election; but that behind those manifestations of public activity the men who constitute what I call the Moderate Party in India do exercise a very great, and a very valuable, and a very strong influence on nearly all sections of the community, I think is perfectly true. But that influence cannot remain unless it gets practical expression. If you shut off their political creed from expression in the development of your constitution they are stalemated at once, and, naturally, public opinion will veer round to those who are apt to cry the loudest.

5193. We cannot by any means speak of it as a fixed quantity?—I think at the present time we should find it very difficult to speak of any political force as a fixed quantity.

5194. But you would hope that if a generous measure of reform were passed by Parliament the Moderate Party of India to-day would gather around them a very large public indeed?—I think so; perhaps not at the first election, but assuredly at the second.

5195. And if the measure were a seriously disappointing measure the Moderate Party would disappear altogether?—Inevitably.

5196. What effect do you think the passing of this Bill will have on the influence which is exercised by the Extreme Party, the extreme element in India? Do you think they are likely to lose influence?—Those are theoretical questions which it is very hard to answer, but I do think behind all the political activity in India there is a very large concentration on the things which really matter—education and sanitation, co-operative credit, and industrial growth—and I think people are attaching increasing importance to those men who are engaged in that work. When you speak of the Extreme Party, they will either have to come forward and justify themselves as practical administrators engaged in practical questions or their influence will disappear. They will be put on their trial.

5197. At the end of your paper you speak about the Secretary of State's Council. You are opposed to the proposed advisory Council, but you want the present Secretary of State's Council to be reconstituted, I understand?—Yes.

5198. You say that: "The personnel should be drawn from the Indian Civil Service, and service at Whitehall should form a part of the Indian civilians' official career." Can you say why you consider the present Council unsatisfactory?—It is almost entirely composed of men who have retired from active service in India and have no intention of going back. Everybody admits the great changes that are taking place and yet the Secretary of State's advisers are mostly men immune from and cut off from the changes. Instead of taking a civilian at the end of his career, I would take a civilian when he had reached the grade, say, of a Secretary, let him serve three years on the Council, and go back as a member or as a Lieutenant-Governor. I think he would be a better member and a better Lieutenant-Governor because of it if the period were not too long; and the Secretary of State would be kept in actual contact with the conditions in India. Secondly, I cannot find any sound administrative canon which places the very wide administrative power vested in the Secretariat of the India Office in the hands of men who have never been to India, and are never likely to go to India, and who know nothing of Indian conditions. It seems to me that those duties would have a far better chance of being discharged satisfactorily by members of the Indian Civil Service, after 10 or 15 years' service, coming home and having three years here and then going back. If you go to the argumentum ad hominem and see how it applies to the present constitution of the India Office and the personnel of the India Office, it seems to me that the present position is very hard to justify.

Lord Islington.

5199. Following up that question, would not you say correspondingly it would be greatly to the advantage of the Indian Civil Service if by your system of interchange they could have contact with the political world of England?—An immense advantage.

5200 Of advantage to India?—Yes, and to the Service.

5201. They would go back in their turn with a corresponding amount of administrative efficiency?—And not only that, they would have been able to imbibe more closely the British political atmosphere than they could possibly do by coming home tired for short leave.

5202. Would you keep the recruitment the same or suggest the absorption of recruitment of the Service in the India Office in India?—I should say that the personnel of the India Office should be an integral part of the cadre of the Indian Civil Service.

5203. As to what form of examination recruitment would be made upon, you would leave that open?—Yes.

5204. But you would like to see it an integral part of the cadre to a greater extent than it is now?—Yes.

5205. It would hardly amount to an interchange really?—No.

5206. Your suggestion is going beyond even the suggestion of interchange; it is appointment?—Yes.

5207. It may be to the India Office or it may be to India?—Yes.

5208. It should be one and the same Service?—Yes, and the men may be serving at one time in Whitehall and at another time at Simla, Madras or Bombay.

5209. I would ask you one or two questions on the duality of government. You appreciate the disadvantages, and you recognise the superior virtues of a strong united government, but you have shown us quite clearly that you do not see any alternative. You say that you would like to see all questions, whether they be reserved subjects or transferred subjects, fully discussed in a united Government composed of the Ministers and the Executive Councillors?—By all questions I mean those which normally come before the Council.

5210. There would be many which would not come before the Council, and would be dealt with by the Minister in his Department?—Yes.

5211. Would you be prepared to go a step further in your desire to see unity of government and say that they should make their decisions in common, but at the same time that the Governor should have a definite instrument of instruction issued to him to see that in the end the transferred subjects should obtain on the one side and the reserved subjects should obtain on the other?—It seems to me that there you would be cutting away the essential principles of diarchy.

5212. No; I have not got in my mind that I am cutting away the essential effect that you want to see produced by diarchy. I am trying to cut away all the arrangements before that result. What you want to get is the result?—Yes. Theoretically I am entirely with you. I think it is a good thing. I have an immense faith in the common sense of the average man, and I think if you have four men sitting round a table under a Governor, discussing these matters on terms of equality, in 99 cases out of 100 you will come to a decision by that means.

5213. You have answered the very question I was going to put to you, that in 99 cases out of 100 the mere fact of discussing it will bring it to an agreed conclusion?—Yes.

5214. Now you have to deal with the hundredth case?—In the hundredth case under your proposal the Governor's decision, in consultation with whichever side is concerned would be final.

5215. Would you be prepared to see the machinery in operation on those lines?—That is one of those points upon which I think only those with an experience of administration which I cannot pretend to can express a competent opinion.

5216. You said you would like to see all members of the Government enjoying an identical status and position—Ministers or members of the Council?—I should. But would you allow me to say one sentence in addition?

5217. One question first. Would you agree to all members of the Council holding office during pleasure?—I would. I regard it as absolutely essential to the working of the scheme that the pay, position, status and prestige of members of the Council and Ministers should be identical.

5218. And tenure of office?—Yes. Once you have this principle of equality established your chances of coming to a common decision are enormously increased, because there is never any question of prestige coming in. At the same time I am frankly appalled at the expense of adding to the top of the administration, when your lower grades are badly paid, this increased expenditure.

5219. It is contended that if you give the power to the Governor to dismiss a member of the Council it would affect the status and prestige of the member of the Civil Service who occupied the appointment; but would you say that would be mitigated if the Governor should have that power, subject to the assent of the Secretary of State?—With right of appeal.

5220. You say in answer 8 of your answers, that you would give power to the Governor to dissolve the Legislative Council provided that there is established a Standing Committee of Parliament on Indian affairs. What do you mean by that?—I think Indian opinion has been focussed unduly upon what I call the mandatory sides of the scheme, regardless of the fact that we hope they will very rarely come into operation. But if Indian opinion was assured that there was always an informed body of Parliament reflecting the dominant temper in politics, taking a keen interest in Indian politics and Indian affairs here, and that any Governor exercising his powers in an arbitrary manner would have substantially to justify himself to this parliamentary body, I think it would very much reduce the fear of these necessary powers in the Indian mind. That is one reason. My other reason is that I think Parliament will be bound to be in the next ten years much more keenly interested in Indian politics than it has been in the past, and I think it will be an enormous advantage to India to have a small standing body representing both Houses, who are specially studying Indian questions and who reflect the opinion of all parties in Parliament.

5221. It is argued by some that such a body would tend to become the recipient of every fad and agitating movement in India, and might be misguided by the advice which would come in volume from India in that direction. What would you say to that?—Provided that the proposed powers are conferred upon the Provincial and the Imperial Governments in India, I am unmoved by it.

5222. You think that the Legislature should have substantial powers for voting supplies. Do you think that it should always rest with Ministers to introduce fresh taxation?—Personally, I do not think it should. I think if fresh taxation were wanted for the administration of a reserved subject it should be the duty of the member of Council in charge of that branch of the administration to come out and justify it. I want to throw upon the members of Council, and equally upon Ministers, the need for economy and efficiency in the administration.

5223. But now do not you think it is essential in starting a scheme of constitutional government, that, as regard finance, all finance should be in the hands of one responsible Minister fully possessed of a financial department to advise him?—I do.

5224. Do you suggest that in all matters of taxation the Minister, who would have to submit those proposals to the Legislative Council, should be the Minister for Finance?—Under the scheme, I take it that finance would not be a ministerial charge or a transferred subject.

5225. I was coming to that point in a moment, but would you say that in all matters of Finance, including, of course, matters which entail the proposals for additional taxation, they should be submitted on behalf of the Government to the Legislative Council by a responsible Minister?—I do not think I should be prepared to go to that extent. I think that, as regards Provincial Finance particularly, being an exceedingly technical subject, until we get some experience, it will be unfair to charge a Minister with the administration of it, and I think that it is eminently one of those responsibilities which, in the transitional state, an experienced civilian is obviously marked out to discharge. At the same time I do not regard it as inconsistent with the scheme put forward that if a Minister wants additional revenue for a specific purpose he should come before the Council and justify it.

5226. He could actually come down with his Bill for that particular increase of taxation?—Yes.

5228. Do you think that would lead to a good system of finance?—The principle of taxation will be worked out in common. It would only be the presentation of the decision of the government, as constituted, to the Legislative Council for their acceptance or rejection.

5229. That would be in its very extreme form an unprecedented method of government, would it not, in any country?—I think it would, but then our conditions are unprecedented.

5230. Can you see any reason why such an unprecedented method should be introduced into India?—I do. I think it is essential to the theory of responsibility laid down in the Bill.

5231. I will not press you further. You say you do not like a scheme of contributions from the Provinces to the revenues of India, and that each should raise their own; you, in other words, would prefer to see the Imperialised scheme of divided heads?—Oh, no; I wish to see the whole of our present Provincial revenues by successive stages made over to the Provinces for their sole user.

5232. I quite see that?—The Provinces will want that money.

5233. I want to see how you would get the Imperial revenue?—That would be developed in two ways. They would develop their existing sources of taxation.

5235. Have you any idea what proportion that would be towards the amount they require for their central purposes?—I think, roughly, the existing requirements of the Central Government are about £60,000,000. I have not had the papers to work it out, but I imagine there would be considerable possibilities of economies in the Central Government, and the Central Government ought to be given a strong incentive to economise by having to raise its own revenues. Moreover, I think we can quite easily add to the revenues of the Imperial Government by an increase in the Customs Duty and a steeper grading of the Income Tax.

5236. And you do not think that that method would tend towards making the raising of the Imperial revenues very unpopular amongst the ordinary taxpayers in the Provinces?—No; I think it would be far less unpopular than the present system, where the Imperial Government raises revenues from the Province on a basis which nobody attempts to justify, least of all the most eminent financier who has advised this Committee. Everybody knows the system is bad, everybody knows it is inequitable, and everybody knows that you cannot make it equitable without a dislocation of Provincial finance, which the Committee that is proposed to be set up would not dare to do. The only way to make it equitable is to say to the Province: there are your revenues; you must spend them. If you want more money for your ameliorative agencies, you must take it out of your own people in your own way, but you are not to have that money by paying a smaller share to the Imperial Government than Provinces which are infinitely poorer than you are called upon to do.

5237. Are you satisfied that it is impossible to adjust on a more equitable basis the contributions of the Provinces?—I think when you came to put it on an equitable basis the Provinces which have underpaid would have their whole financial basis rudely disturbed.

5238. You are very anxious to see industrial development?—I am.

5239. You regard that as almost as important as the scheme of reforms?—Almost more. I regard the two as inseparable.

5240. Would you say that if it is to be successful it must be by the combined and co-operative effort of Europeans and Indians together?—I think so, and I think that is proved by the fact that wherever Indian capital under Indian management launches out into a big enterprise they are only too glad to secure the best brains wherever they can get them.

5241. Would you like to see the starting of new enterprises and the extension of existing ones in the hands of the Provincial Governments? I am not talking of social conditions now, but purely of enterprise?—Substantially I would; yes.

5242. So far as Government has to interfere with enterprise?—Yes.

5243. You would like to see that substantially in the hands of the Provincial Government?—Yes; because it is impossible to centralise without inefficiency, waste, delay, and—I do not wish to use too strong a word—exasperation.

5244. To that extent you would not agree with the Report of the Industrial Commission?—I do not. I hold very strongly that the functions of the Imperial Government in industry should be primarily the functions of research and co-ordination, but the function of administration should be entirely Provincial, very much as we work our agricultural experiments to-day.

5245. Would you say the Government of India in the past decades has been an active and enterprising promoter of industrial enterprise in ndia?—I should not say it had, but I should say it has done infinitely more than people will give it credit for. I think if you ask any of the promoters of the major modern industries in India they will agree.

5246. You would like to see it handed over to the Provinces?—Yes.

5247. Those enterprises will require capital?—Yes.

5248. A great deal can be raised in the Provinces?—Yes.

5249. By combined efforts of Europeans and Indians; but more capital will be required, and therefore certain guidance and help and assistance will be required from outside the Province. Would you approve of a scheme by which that guidance, assistance and control should be transferred to a reformed India Office rather than to the Government of India?—No, I should not.

5250. Could you give your reasons for that?—I think it is essential, in order to maintain confidence in the enterprise, confidence in the capitalists, and to get reasonable expedition, that these enterprises shall be practically solely controlled by the Province in which they are situated. I do not think enterprise will wait for enormous delays, nor do I think it is necessary in order to secure such influx either of British capital or British brains as are necessary for the development of Indian industry.

5251. Would you make it exclusive to the Province?—Yes.

5252. Removing all the control of the Government of India from it?—Yes. I would keep to the Government of India the powers of co-ordination and research. You cannot provincialise research, because you cannot afford it, nor could you have two different Provinces setting up competing model factories; but beyond that the assistance of industry should be transferred to the Provinces.

5253. So far as the Government controls it, would you suggest that the control should be on the transferred side or the reserved side?—I should feel inclined to say it should be on the transferred side. I think it is one of those questions which can be transferred under the scheme set up.

Lord Sinha.

5254. You said with regard to the members of Council that their position should be in every respect the same as that of the Ministers, and vice versa. The position of Ministers with regard to pay, emoluments, status, tenure of office, and so on, should be the same as members of Council?—Yes.

5255. That is to say, the members of the Executive Council should hold office during the pleasure of the Governor. You said something about the right of appeal. Of course, Ministers have not the right of appeal. Would you give the members of Council the right of appeal when, as a matter of fact, the result of their ceasing to be members of Council would be that they would revert to their substantive position in the Indian Civil Service? That is the only effect of it. They are only seconded for the membership. If the Governor does not want them they revert to their ordinary position in the Indian Civil Service. Would you in that case give them the right of appeal, because that would differentiate the position of members of Council from that of Ministers?—Their whole position must essentially be different. In one case you are taking a man from a Service in which he has nothing to look forward to beyond his pay and pension; in the other case you are taking a man who has made his mark in public life, and who has probably got his own sources of revenue and income totally independent of his official position.

5256. I agree that if the Governor's not wanting a member means discharge from the Service he ought to have the right of appeal, as he would have in every case if he were discharged or dismissed; but if it only means that he gives up his position as a member and goes back to his previous position in the Service, would you still give him the right of appeal?—I would give him the right of appeal for the sake of its practical advantages. It would be invaluable in protecting the services during the time of transition.

5257. In other words, in giving a member a greater sense of security?—Yes.

5258. Of course, you remember the third formula in the Joint Report about the Central Government not being affected by the changes proposed? Of course, that formula, like every other portion of the Report, was offered for criticism?—Yes.

5258A. The criticism might have the effect of reducing the scheme or of enlarging it, including the Central Government. You have either read or heard that nearly the whole of the Indian evidence before this Committee with regard to the Central Government suggests that there should be some element of responsibility introduced into the Central Government?—Yes.

5259. Is your opinion about the Central Government based on the formula in the Report which says that until the experiment in the Provinces has justified itself nothing is to be done to the Central Government, and that the Central Government is to remain solely responsible to Parliament?—It is based on two reasons. It is based on the personal conviction that what is really going to matter to India in the next few years is not the Imperial Government, but the Provincial Governments. I think once this scheme gets to work Indian publicists will realise to a degree to which they do not realise it to-day that their vital connection will be with the Provincial Government, and it is to that that they will look for activity and progress in all those things which really count. That is one thing. Secondly, it is based substantially on the formula laid down, particularly responsibility to Parliament and to the working out of the system. My own personal view, for what it is worth, is that the Government of India, if it has no real freedom in fiscal and economic questions, will matter very much less to the life and growth of India than the Provinces which are going to be placed so substantially under the influence of Indian opinion. But that Indian opinion is almost unanimous in desiring some element of responsibility in the Government of India I entirely agree.

5260. Do you agree with the view that to the extent that Parliament relaxes its control over the Central Government, that control should be vested in the Legislative Assembly?—I do; or, rather, I would say that the control should be vested in the Representative Institutions, because I look for a Senate as well as a Legislative Council.

5261. The Indian Legislature?—Yes.

5262. And to the extent that control is made over to the Indian Legislature it should be exercised through Ministers responsible to the Indian Legislature?—Yes.

5263. May I take it that if, and when, Parliament does relax any portion of its control over the Government of India the element of responsibility should be introduced as in the Provinces?—Yes.

5264. Having regard to the practically unanimous expression of Indian opinion, is it your view that if the element is introduced now, in however small a form, it would help the working of the scheme, inasmuch as it would promote an atmosphere of friendliness and co-operation?—It is.

Chairman.] Thank you.

(After a short adjournment.)

MR. V. CHAKKARI CHETTY, B.A., B.L., MR. P. CHENCHIAH, B.A., M.L., and MR. B. P. WADIA, called in; and Examined as follows:—

Chairman.

5265. You gentlemen, I think, are representing the Madras Presidency Association?—(Mr. Chetty.) Yes.

5266. And you have been good enough to furnish the Joint Select Committee with a Memorandum which we have all had (see Appendix O)?—Yes.

5267. Perhaps you would like to supplement that Memorandum by a statement?—Yes. My Lord, there are two important matters which I, on behalf of the association of which I have the honour to be the official secretary, should like to place before your Lordship's Committee. The first question, a question which has been much canvassed before your Lordship's Committee, is that of the relations subsisting between the Brahmins and the non-Brahmins in our Presidency, and the resulting effect of these relations upon the representation of the various communities of our Presidency. In the second place, I should like to say only a few words upon the general question of constitutional reform which your Lordship's Committee is considering here. On the latter question I do not propose to take up much of your Lordship's time, as the views of our association are in general agreement with those put forward by the leading political organisations of our country, namely, the National Congress and the various Home Rule Leagues. Therefore, I wish to confine myself only to a few general observations on the latter subject. Our association, the Madras Presidency Association, is an association consisting of those people whom one of the witnesses before your Lordship's Committee stigmatised as pro-Brahmin, non-Brahmins, and I wish to plead guilty——

5268. I think I would say described?—Described—yes; but I thought there was a stigma attached to this description. I plead to a certain extent, if it is a charge, guilty to this charge, because from the very inception of our association we have been placing before us the ideal of co-operation and harmony between the several communities of our Presidency. Some of the most important leaders of our association have been from the very beginning associated with the Indian National Congress. Our President, the Dewan Bahadur Kesava Pillai, was a member of the Congress from the very beginning, with other leaders of the South Indian Liberal Federation. Therefore it was not possible for them suddenly, in the latter part of 1916 and in the beginning of 1917, to turn their backs upon an association like the National Congress, with which they had been identified from the very beginning. Therefore, the association stands, in the first instance, for supporting the general aims and views of the Indian National Congress, and in the second place, owing to the exigencies of political controversy in our Presidency, as practical politicians we have been obliged to put forward the view of communal representation, which is a via media between the views put forward by the South Indian Liberal Federation, which demands communal electorates for the representation of the non-Brahmins, and the views of those extreme people in the National Congress who say that the very principle of communal representation is outrageous, and should not be introduced at the very outset of responsible government in our country. Our association has a large number of very influential and important men, and it has held conferences all over the Presidency in important centres, putting forward the views that I have just now placed before your Lordship's Committee. Therefore, I should humbly submit to your Lordships' Committee that we do have the right to represent our views before this Committee as the views of a considerable section of the non-Brahmins. Some of our members, the more enthusiastic among them, would even go further and say that we represent a larger section of the non-Brahmin communities than the other associations, but I shall be content to say that we at least represent 13½ millions of the 27 millions of the non-Brahmins of our Presidency, leaving the other associations to represent the rest, namely, the other 13½ millions.

I wish now to say one or two words with regard to the next question, the relations subsisting between the Brahmins on the one hand and the Panchamas on the other, and then the relations subsisting between the Brahmins on the one hand and the non-Brahmin Hindoos on the other hand. It is to me a travesty of the facts to maintain, as has been done by some of the witnesses, that the Brahmin is a tyrant, and is the villain of the play, and that the poor Panchamas in the outlying villages of our Presidency are being victimised by the oppression of the Brahmins. As I have stated already in my Memorandum, the social conditions prevailing in the Presidency and the basis of the Hindoo polity are responsible for the social conditions which cannot be traced to any definite source or authority within living memory. They extend to times far beyond living memory, and therefore to fasten responsibility upon any particular community at this juncture of our national history seems to me, to say the least about it, unfair to them. On the contrary, I must confess I regret that the conditions prevailing among the Panchamas are traceable, if we are going to fasten responsibility on any community, to both the Brahmins and the non-Brahmins. Both of them have left many things undone which they ought to have done, and they have done many things which they ought not to have done. I am quite frank in my statement with regard to this matter, but I am unwilling, and my Association supports me, when I state that that the responsibility is not to be fastened solely upon the Brahmins of our Presidency. On the contrary, I have been myself a social worker—I have been myself a member of several social service organisations, and I am glad to acknowledge before this Committee that the Brahmins of our Presidency in the last ten years have become fully alive to their responsibilities, and have extended the right hand of fellowship to the Panchamas in the slums. In the social service organisation to which I have the honour to belong, there are many Brahmin men who do not hesitate to go into the cherris, as the slums in our part of the Presidency are called, and to do all they can to alleviate the misery and distress there. This association, this social service league in the City of Madras, is to-day presided over by one of the Brahmin judges of the Madras High Court, and the communities in Madras would witness to the fact that he and his fellow Brahmins in the league have been rendering meritorious service to the cause of the Panchamas in our city. Then again, we have the Social Reform Association, a very large and influential association, in our Presidency, which was for many years presided over by Sir C. Sankaran Nair. After him, the Presidentship went to the present Advocate-General of Madras, who is a Brahmin gentleman. He is a very strong supporter of social reforms, and I believe against him no charge of Brahmin prejudice has ever been brought forward by even the most enthusiastic elements of the non-Brahmin movement in our Presidency.

Then again it was represented by one witness that the feeling of caste was on the increase in our Presidency. My Lord, I cannot help feeling that this statement is a mere argument of despair, and is quite contrary to the impartial testimony of both Europeans and Indians alike. It seems to me that that statement could not have been made except in the circumstances in which the South Indian Liberal Federation finds itself. To-day there are conferences held in various parts of the country, and such conferences are being held in which Brahmins and non-Brahmins have sat down together for a common meal. I myself as a non-Brahmin attended many sessions of the National Congress, and many provincial and district conferences in our Presidency, and the Brahmins of our Presidency coming there, members of the most orthodox families, have not hesitated to sit down with me and take their food. Therefore, it seems to me that to maintain that the caste system is on the increase, especially in the political field, is not a correct representation of the facts.

Now, in this connection I should like to say one word with regard to the alleged connection between the Home Rule Movement and the Varnashrama Dharma movement. So far as my knowledge goes, there is hardly a single Brahmin of any eminence in the political life of our Presidency who has given any countenance whatever to the Varnashrama Dharma movement in our Presidency. On the contrary, I think these people, reactionaries as they are, have held meetings to extol the past glories of our country and to bring back the caste system at least in a modified form to suit the conditions of advancing civilisation, because, my Lord, even the Varnashrama Dharma cannot go back to what they call the pristine beauty of the ancient Indian polity; they must yield to the expanding necessities of our times. I say that not a single Brahmin in the political field has ever appeared upon the Varnashrama Dharma platform, but, on the contrary, they have systematically discountenanced it, and I may say, in justice to the Home Rulers, that for example Mrs. Besant, who represented the Home Rule movement in Madras, and her paper, "New India," have definitely and openly disassociated themselves from the Varnashrama Dharma movement; so much so that the reactionaries in the social field have charged the Home Rulers with being anti-Hindoo and anti-national, and they have said that for the sake of political advancement these Home Rulers have denied their Brahminism and their Hindoo traditions.

I have pointed out these facts to your Lordship and your Lordship's Committee, but many of the statements which have been made before this Committee are not true. My Lord, I wish to point out one or two facts with regard to the elections that have been held. The President of our Association, the Dewan Bahadur Kesava Pillai, was for two terms a member of the Madras Legislative Council, and when the last election took place he was not returned. When he appeared before Lord Southborough's Franchise Committee in Madras he was asked the question by a co-opted member of the Committee whether it was not because he was a non-Brahmin that he was defeated at the last election, and I should like to place before your Lordships' Committee the answer that our President gave to this question. He said that it was not because he was a non-Brahmin that he was defeated, but the election turned upon inter-district prejudices and claims; he belonged to one district, and the candidate ultimately returned was a man belonging to another district, and therefore it was rivalry between the two districts; but many Brahmins voted for him and many non-Brahmins voted for the successful Brahmin candidate. In 1912, when the election took place for the Madras Corporation, the man who was returned was a Brahmin, but Dr. Nair, who was at that time in the Corporation, and who subsequently led the non-Brahmin movement in the South Indian Liberal Association with such conspicuous ability, voted for the Brahmin candidate. It was said of him in those days that he was the most zealous supporter of Brahminical claims in our Presidency. Therefore, my Lord, it cannot be contended that things are so ugly, so irretrievably bad in our Presidency that we should fall back upon the device of forming a communal electorate for the representation of the non-Brahmin communities of our Presidency. When this question was mooted by some of the non-Brahmin leaders in our Presidency our people knew that this would act as a barrier in the way of the solidarity of national feeling, and that it would segregate the Brahmins and non-Brahmins in watertight compartments. Therefore, we said that we would neither take the side of those who advocated communal representation altogether nor the side of those who wanted communal electorates. Therefore, we met the Brahmins in various conferences and arrived at a compromise.

5269. You met whom?—Well, there was the Madras Presidency Association, which I have the honour to represent, and among other important bodies there was the Madras Congress Committee and the Home Rule League. We met those bodies and discussed this matter, and then we reached this compromise—namely, that while we discountenanced the creation of communal electorates for the representation of the non-Brahmin communities, we ought to have general territorial electorates in which a certain number of seats should be assigned to the non-Brahmins, or a certain restriction placed upon the possible number of Brahmins who would be returned by the general electorates to the Legislative Council. That was the view which our Association took, a view which we pressed before His Excellency the Viceroy and Mr. Montagu when they came to Madras, and which we also pressed before the Franchise Committee when we attended before them and gave our evidence. My Lord, that is in a few words the position of our Association with regard to this question of Brahmin and non-Brahmin.

5270. Which of those two alternatives do you prefer?—So far as our Association has said anything definitely (I have got the resolution of the Association here, which is embodied in the Memorandum I sent to your Lordship's Committee) our Association has said that the Presidency of Madras should be divided into twelve general territorial electorates returning nine members each, and we have said that of these not more than two should be Brahmins.

5271. In each constituency?—That is so. That is the resolution as it stands among the resolutions passed by our Conference during the last session, and this is, as I have stated, the device we have formed in order to obviate the necessity of having general communal electorates. We believe that when the scheme of our Association is put forward the non-Brahmins would be in an even more advantageous position, and while avoiding the defects of communal representation it would bring to the same political platform

Brahmins and non-Brahmins alike, and thereby pave the way for a closer understanding of the two communities.

We also put forward another suggestion before the Franchise Committee. We think, after all, in the increasing democratisation of our political institutions which will take place certainly under the reform scheme which your Lordship's Committee are going to suggest to Parliament, the necessity of communal representation, even on the basis we have put forward, will gradually disappear, because I believe, and my Association will support me, when I say that hereafter elections will not be fought upon a purely communal basis. If, for example, in the more politically minded districts of our Presidency an election took place under the new reform scheme, I strongly believe that a man will not be elected because he is a Brahmin or because he is a non-Brahmin; the election is surely going to be run on political principles. By the people in such a district the question would be asked whether the candidate is a Radical or a Conservative, and if it is a Radical district I am quite sure that the non-Brahmin Radical has a better chance of being returned by even the Brahmins than a Brahmin Conservative. Therefore, it seems to me that this device of communal representation under general electorates will have a definite place only for a temporary period until the revision of the constitution takes place after ten years as suggested in the Report and in the Bill. Then the whole question will have to be reviewed, and it will have to be altogether removed from the Rules which may be framed under the Bill.

I desire to add only one or two words about the general question of reforms. As someone has said, all the Indian representatives have been forced to acknowledge the necessity of diarchy in the present circumstances of political life, at least in England. There are many Congress men in our Association who, so far as the Provinces are concerned, would not consent to diarchy, but as practical politicians they know that diarchy is a thing we cannot dispense with. Therefore, in regard to Provincial Government, our Association is in favour of transferring all subjects, including land revenue, as Sir Sankaran Nair's Dissenting Minute has conclusively shown. With the exception of law, justice and order, our Association is in favour of transferring all other subjects. In the second place, our Association is in favour, like other Associations, of introducing the principle of transferred and reserved subjects in the Central Government. We think that the pronouncement of the 20th August, 1917, is quite in consonance with the simultaneous advance in the Central Government, and if such an advance is not made our Association thinks that the spirit and intention of the announcement would not be carried into effect. Therefore, our Association prays that this Committee may recommend the introduction of a certain measure and element of responsibility in the Central Government. We are also in favour of lowering the franchise so that a larger number of electors than was recommended by the Madras Government and the Franchise Committee may be brought on to the electoral roll; we are in favour of reducing the franchise to such an extent that wage-earners may come in. I may say to your Lordship, and to your Lordship's Committee that as has already been said by Mr. Wadia in his evidence as the representative and as the head of the labour organisation in Madras, the non-Brahmin operatives in the various mills of our Province have no grievance in any sense against the Brahmins. They are anxious that the country should take an important place amongst the nations of the world, and I believe from my knowledge of the operatives, because I have moved about amongst them and have taken part in many of their meetings, that they are seriously anxious that these vexed questions of Brahmin and non-Brahmin should not disturb the even tenor of national life in our country, and they would be quite prepared to discharge any responsibility that the British Parliament might entrust to them under the reform scheme.

5272. You endorse Mr. Wadia's evidence?—I heartily endorse Mr. Wadia's statement. Then, again, my

Lord, as a liberal and as a democrat, I, with the members of our Association, am heartily in favour of the enfranchisement of women, and I support heartily Mrs. Sorojini Naidu's statement before your Lordship's Committee, that women should be given the vote. In our Presidency, except among the Mohammedans, there is no restriction placed upon the free movement of women. Brahmin as well as non-Brahmin women go about freely; there is no purdah among them, and I have attended many conferences which women have attended along with men. We had last year a conference at which the question was keenly debated, and many women present there took part in the discussion and voted according to their judgment upon the questions submitted. Therefore, speaking on behalf of my Presidency and my Association, I would strongly recommend the franchise for women, which has been so ably put forward before your Lordship's Committee by Mrs. Sorojini Naidu.

Those are the only things I wish to say, but in conclusion I may be permitted to make an additional reference so that your Lordship's Committee may be in a position to appraise the state of feeling with regard to social matters in our Presidency. My learned friend to the left and myself are both by birth Hindoos, not Hindoos in faith; we are Christians in faith, and my friend to the right is a Parsee. Although we differ from the majority of the members of our Association, who are non-Brahmin Hindoos, in certain of these higher religious and speculative questions, they have not thought it fit to distrust us, but they have sent us here believing that we will do justice to the claims of the non-Brahmin Hindoo communities. This itself will prove to your Lordship's Committee how the various communities of our Presidency are rapidly rising above distinctions of creed and caste, and are trying to join hands for the well-being of their country. My Lord, that is the statement which I have to make before your Lordship's Committee.

5273. We have already had the pleasure of hearing Mr. Wadia's statement, but do you wish to add anything by way of supplement, Mr. Chenchiah?—(Mr. Chenchiah.) With your Lordship's permission, I should like to say a few words, and I would like to restrict my remarks to the Telugu area, which consists of twelve districts to the north of Madras, as I am acquainted with the conditions there. The relation between Brahmins and non-Brahmins in the Telugu area is more cordial and harmonious than it is in the South. Although there have been many conferences, both of the Provincial Congress Committee and of the Andhra Conference, I do not think the question of communal representation has been discussed in any of these conferences. An attempt was once made, but it was not pressed home. The real living issue in that area is not the communal representation question, but the question of separate Province for the language area. I may also state that the proposals which are made in our Memorandum as to retaining general electorates and to securing some seats for the non-Brahmins will meet with large acceptance at the Brahmins and non-Brahmins in the Telugu area.

I should like also to refer to one or two remarks which have been made with reference to the Telugu districts. The charge is brought against the Brahmin that with regard to political matters he is closely associated with the Varnasrahma Dharma movement. As far as the Telugu countries go I may speak with some confidence when I say that there is not a single leader, either Brahmin or non-Brahmin, who has anything to do with the Varnashrama Dharma movement. It has no following in the Telugu country, and with regard to the non-Brahmin movement itself it was initiated in the south, and through some propagandist work which has been carried out, it has met with some response in our country, but the response has not been very great because, as I have already stated, the real living problem is the one of the constitution of a separate Province, and not the question of communal representation. The remark has also been made that in the Telugu countries the Brahmin does not pay the taxes, because he holds Inams, which are tax free. These Inams were granted by the ancient rajahs, irrespective of the caste of the holder. With regard to the water tax, to which a reference has been made in the evidence, they were free of water tax because the new irrigation system introduced by the British Government has deprived these lands of their original source of water supply. The whole question has no relation to the holder being a Brahmin or a non-Brahmin, but has relation to the services which they have rendered to the ancient rajahs.

The last remark I should like to make is that my Telugu people would strongly resent any attempt to segregate the non-Brahmins from the Brahmins, but would endorse any scheme which, without dividing them into two separate camps, safeguards the interests of the non-Brahmins, and the scheme we have suggested, we believe, would meet the needs of both the Brahmins and the non-Brahmins.

Chairman.] We are much obliged to you, gentlemen; if I may say so, you have made your position quite clear; thank you.

MR. B. V. JADHAV is called in; and Examined, as follows:—

Chairman.

5274. I believe, Mr. Jadhav, you have come to speak for the famous Mahratta people?—Yes, and other backward classes, my Lord.

5275. You are Vice-President of the Mahratta League?—I am.

5276. You are also speaking for the Deccan Ryots Association?—Yes.

5277. You have been good enough to send in a Memorandum (see Appendix R) which has not yet reached the Committee, but of which, I can assure you, every member of the Committee will have a copy, and it will be carefully studied. This is your opportunity for making any statement in supplement of that Memorandum if you wish to do so?—I do not think it necessary to say much upon that point, because I have made myself clear, and my friends here who have been examined before me also have made the position clear. The condition of the Bombay Presidency is rather a peculiar one. It is not a homogeneous Presidency, and the two divisions, Sindh and Gujerat, are quite distinct from the Deccan divisions, the Central Division and the Southern Division. There is one district called the Thana district in the Northern Division which is part and parcel of the Deccan division, but for the convenience of administration, or perhaps because there were fewer districts in the Northern Division, it was attached to it, so that the condition of this Thana district ought to be taken into consideration along with the Central Division and the Southern Division districts. In this district the Mahrattas and other backward communities are very backward indeed, as can be seen from their educational progress. There are barely 2 per cent. of literates, and so their condition is rather bad, and they require some special handling. I have given in my Memorandum why the questions are so different with regard to them from the questions with regard to advanced communities.

5278. You would not call all Mahrattas a backward community, would you?—There are amongst the Mahrattas gentlemen who are learned and educated, there is no doubt, but the community as a whole is very different, and I beg to observe and bring to your Lordships' notice that the case of the Mahratta is a case by itself. It is known under two designations, the Mahratta and the Kunbi. Really they are one and the same community, and the Mahrattas and the Kunbis ought to be classed together, as the Honourable Mr. Carmichael said in his Note. There are other communities, too, which are very akin to them, which have the same conditions of life and conditions of work and conditions of education and so on, and what I propose on behalf of the Mahratta League, and on behalf of the Deccan Ryots Association, is that they should be given a certain protection in the electorates. They do not ask for any communal seats or communal representation at all, but that they should have reserved to them certain seats in the general electorates, so that on the electoral roll, in case any of them did not succeed at the polls, some consideration should be shown to them, and although they did not secure the maximum number of votes they should be considered as elected for a few years; I may say one or two elections, and that is all. It will not be necessary to have that concession extended for a longer period.

5279. How many reserve seats do you ask for?—I have made the answer, about 30 per cent., because our population is over 80 per cent. agricultural, and if 30 per cent. seats were reserved from the non-Mohammedan rural constituencies, that will suffice for the present. Of course, they will have the opportunity to contest seats in the general electorate, and if they organise themselves properly in the near future perhaps they will secure a larger number of seats in proportion to their numbers and importance. I do not want to have any communal representation, and I am not going to ask for that. Two members of the Franchise Committee, Mr. Hailey and Mr. Hogg, have also recommended that, and I think the arguments advanced by them, and the advantages they have shown for those reserved seats, will be convincing to your Lordships, and your Lordships will therefore extend that concession to these backward communities. They want certain leaders to lead them forward, and this is the only way in which these leaders can come forward and assert themselves. If they are elected to the Council for the first one or two elections by a fewer number of votes than others, then they will be looked upon as their leaders, and they will be able to organise that body, and henceforward, after some ten years, such a concession will not be necessary, and they will be able to stand shoulder to shoulder with other advanced communities. In this way I am not asking for any distinctions for Mahrattas and non-Mahrattas. Of course, the Mahrattas have done greater service to the Empire; they have fought the battles of the Empire and supplied the labour market and so on, and they form a very important community, and their historical importance, too, is not small. Other communities also, I hope, will be given that advantage along with them. I pray your Lordships not to make any distinction between Mahrattas and non-Mahrattas, but to take the backward communities together. By "backward" I mean backward in education, and all those whose education is below 10 per cent., say, ought to be classed as backward, and they should be given some certain percentage of reserved seats.

5280. Would the whole community for which you are speaking be agricultural?—It cannot be distinguished in that way, my Lord, because the majority of the community are agricultural, but they have taken to other occupations too; so from the professional point of view no distinction can be made.

5281. What percentage would be all agricultural?—More than 80 per cent.

5282. Is that all you wish to add?—That is all.

5283. You have developed this in your Memorandum, have you not?—I have.

5284. We are very much obliged to you, Mr. Jadhav?—Thank you.

MR. MAUNG PU, B.A., and MR. BERNARD HOUGHTON are called in; and Examined, as follows:—

Chairman.

5285. You and your colleague are a deputation from the Burma Reform League?—(Mr. Pu) Yes, and not only the Burma Reform League, but I represent a very large section of the Burmese population. The Burma Reform League is only a portion of it, and I put down my name as President, because I happen to be the President

President of the Burma Reform League at the present moment.

5286. You have come, I think, all the way from Burma on purpose to lay your views before this Committee?—Yes.

5287. My colleagues and myself would be very happy to hear any statement you wish to make. You have, I think, put in a Memorandum?—Yes, I have put in two, one a plea for Burma (see Appendix M.) and the other a definite proposal as to a scheme of reform for Burma (see Appendix Q.).

5288. Perhaps you will make any statement you wish to make in supplement to this Memorandum?—May it please your Lordship, on behalf of the people of Burma, I am much obliged to your Lordship's Committee for giving me the opportunity to place the views of Burma before this Committee. At one time it was thought that Burma would not be allowed to give evidence, but happily we are now allowed to give before the Committee the views of Burma. Burma, your Lordship knows, is a fairly large country—I think the largest Province in India; it is larger than France and larger than the British Isles, with an area of 270,000 square miles, out of which 172,000 square miles are directly under the British Government. The rest of the country consists of independent native states or of semi-independent native States. Burma has a population of 12,000,000, out of which 10½ millions are composed of Buddhists, and the rest are composed of Christians, Hindoos, and Mohammedans. Of course, these latter form a very small minority in the country. As your Lordship knows, most of the Burmese people profess a religion which has given satisfaction to the spiritual yearnings of a very large number of people in this world. That religion is professed by over 500,000,000 of people in the world. Burma had a very great past in her history. We had a proper kingdom when the British came under the Norman Conquest, so that we have a fairly ancient history behind us.

As regards my credentials, we represent a very large section of the Burmese population. We have a council which comprises over 220 associations spread throughout the length and breadth of Burma, composed of over 10,000 members. We have control of 30 schools, including four high schools and four girls' schools. In addition to that, the views of the General Council are essentially shared by the other members of the public—that is, I meant to say, the Hindoos and the Mohammedans settled down in the country. Of course, certain sections of the public, namely the European sections, are rather nervous about these reforms, thinking they may be left out, or their powers reduced, but we Burmese profess a religion which has no stain on her history for intolerance or persecution, and when we have professed such a religion for such a long time, you will understand that we are a very tolerant and broad-minded people. We always recognise the claims of other communities, and we shall certainly do so in connection with our constructive proposals in this connection. We distinctly allow them that liberty, so that they need not be anxious that they will be left out or have their claims overlooked by the rest of the country.

You already know that His Majesty's Government made a famous announcement in August, 1917. I need not read the announcement, as it is quite familiar to your Lordship's Committee. This announcement filled the hearts of the people of Burma with great expectations and aspirations, and we looked forward that we would be given the same privileges just like any other part of the Indian Empire. When His Majesty's Secretary of State went out to India in connection with a Commission, Mr. Montagu was not able to come to Burma, but we did not fail in our duty in sending a deputation to Calcutta. We sent deputations. Of course, other communities also sent deputations. We presented our case. Your Lordship will remember that in the Joint Report which has been drawn up by Mr. Montagu and his Excellency the Viceroy the Burmese case has been left out for certain reasons. It is referred to in paragraph 198 of the Joint Report, and just to refresh the memory of your Lordship's Committee I will read it. "Our reasons are that Burma is not India. Its people belong to another race in another stage of political development, and its problems are altogether different. For instance, the application to Burma of the general principles of throwing open the public service more widely to Indians would only mean the replacement of one alien bureaucracy by another. The desire for elective institutions has not developed in Burma; the Provincial Legislative Council as constituted under the Morley-Minto schemes has no Burman elected element; and the way is open for a different line of development. There was also a practical reason for not proceeding to investigate the particular conditions of Burma in the fact that one Lieutenant-Governor had very recently laid down, and a new Lieutenant-Governor assumed, office." The last reason does not apply now. At that time he had just assumed office, and there was some plausible reason at the time these were drawn up, but as regards the other reasons your Lordship sees it says that we "belong to another race in another stage of political development." In India there are different races. India is a continent.

Then the Report says that the problems with regard to Burma are different. What are the problems? The problems are to transfer the power from the bureaucracy to the representatives of the people. Therefore, there can be no different problems altogether in Burma as distinguished from other parts of India. Then the Report goes on: "The desire for elective institutions has not developed in Burma." It has been admitted by Sir Reginald Craddock himself that there is a desire and demand for elective institutions. As a matter of fact, since the Joint Report came out, public meetings were held all over the country, and constructive proposals were brought forward claiming the same privileges practically as the rest of India, so that that also falls to the ground. As regards the public services, if they are thrown open, the Report says, "it will mean the replacing of one alien bureaucracy by another." That, of course, might also be safeguarded in many different ways. These were the reasons given in the Joint Report, and I submit to your Lordships that there are no very strong reasons why Burma should be excluded from the privileges of the Reform proposals. Then it was left to the Local Government to find out how far the Reform proposals in the Joint Report could apply to Burma.

In a speech which was delivered at a Durbar, held at Rangoon on the 14th August, 1918, by his Honour the Lieutenant-Governor, his Honour foreshadowed that there would be a conference between the people of Burma and the Government to consider what proposal would suit Burma. There was an informal discussion some time about September, 1918, and the scheme of the Local Government was out in December, 1918. As soon as the scheme was out again there were public meetings held, and, all over the country, criticisms were made at the various associations, pointing out a number of modifications in the scheme.

I here desire to say a few words to show that the scheme which has been approved by his Honour the Lieutenant-Governor is very inferior to the proposals made by the Joint Report. At present I do not need to go into that question. Then, recently, at a Legislative Council meeting, his Honour, in his speech, mentioned that certain modifications were being made. These modifications were considered by the people of Burma to have become more retrogressive than ever. The result was that we had a general Council meeting, held in May, 1919, when we entirely condemned the Craddock scheme, and the result is that the deputation is sent which I have the honour to represent before your Lordship's Committee.

If your Lordship will permit me I will just give an outline of what the Craddock scheme is. I do not know whether your Lordships will allow me, but it is partly relevant in presenting my case here. I will not go very much into details, but just give an outline of what it is and show where it falls short of the Joint Report. According to Sir Reginald Craddock's idea he is going to group a number of villages into groups, each group returning one representative to the Circle Board. His Honour expects that these representatives will principally be the headmen. I may explain that the headman is an executive officer who who collects revenue and has certain judicial and magisterial functions on a small scale, so that he is an officer—there is no doubt about it. The village group will select one representative for the Circle Board, so that the Circle Board will be filled by the village headmen, and his Honour expects they should do so for a long time to come. Each Circle Board will elect a President to the District Board and a member for the Legislative Council would be elected from the Circle Board. So in the first instance his scheme is an indirect election, and he expects for the purpose of a rural area these headmen should come on the Legislative Council. A large number of the representatives for the rural area will be village headmen, who are, as I have already submitted to your Lordship, the executive officers of the Government. They will not be in any sense real representatives of the people. For the rural areas his Honour reserved 31 seats, and for large centres, Rangoon, Syriam and Insein, he reserved five seats, and for other municipal areas, which would be grouped later on, fourteen seats. Then there are some special bodies like Chambers of Commerce, Trade associations, the University, and Anglo-Indians, which are each allowed one and European two. So that the elected members come up to 56. That is about 60 per cent. Out of that your Lordship will see that 31, or more than half, will be the village headmen who are executive officers of the Government. There are, of course, non-official members who will be nominated by the Government. They have had six seats reserved for them. There is also power given to the Commissioner in each division to nominate one for each division, which is eight, so that the nominated non-official members will comprise a little over 15 per cent. Then there are the two experts and twenty officials. The officials and experts will represent about 23 or 24 per cent., including the head of the Department, that is ninety-three, so that your Lordship sees at the utmost that the scheme falls very far short of the Joint Report.

My submission to your Lordship's Committee is that the scheme of the Local Government is entirely opposed to the letter and spirt of the announcement made by His Majesty's Government. That is, the constitution of the Legislative Council. Then, of course, he proposed four Boards, and out of those four Boards three Presidents are reserved for Burmese and one for a European. Of course, the Presidents will be selected by the head of the Province—that is, the Lieutenant-Governor—but practically they have no power at all. They cannot over-rule their Boards; when they want to over-rule it they must do so only with the concurrence of the Lieutenant-Governor. The Legislature has practically no control over the Executive, and no control over the Budget either, so that, strictly speaking, the Government, although nominally it is a popular Government, is really a bureaucratic Government in a different form. When this scheme was put before the country naturally the whole country was quite dissatisfied with the scheme. My submission to your Lordship is, therefore, that this scheme of Sir Reginald Craddock's is entirely opposed to the letter and spirit of the announcement of the 20th of August made by His Majesty's Government. In the first place there is not the substantial majority that is contemplated by the announcement, because there are thirty-one votes which will come in out of ninety-three—about one-third of the votes—as I have already submitted to your Lordship, which are those of headmen, who are Government executive officers, and there will be quite a number of nominated officials and non-officials. There will be no direct election, and no control of the Legislature over the Executive, and there is no provision whatsoever to transfer power from the bureaucracy to the popular assembly by stages, and there is no control of the Legislative Council over the Budget either.

Although his scheme does not satisfy us, Sir Reginald Craddock has found that there are certain elements in the Burmese people which are very suitable for a popular form of government. He has admitted both in his Durbar speech and in the original scheme itself that there is a certain capacity among the Burmese people to enjoy some form of representative government, but the only thing is that he is inclined to think they are not fit to enjoy the same privileges as other parts of India. I will just quote his exact wording so that your Lordship may know exactly what he says. In the first Durbar speech, when he was appointed, he said: "I perceive in Burma many strong grounds for hopeful anticipation. In primary education Burma is more advanced than India, and the general level of intelligence among the Burma masses is able to hold its own and more in any contrast with the average intelligence of the Indian masses. The social system of Burma presents various features favourable to a system of election, and to the growth of democracy, which are not present in India. There are no caste distinctions at all, there is no hereditary division by occupations, there is no landed aristocracy, while religious cleavages among the indigenous races of Burma are almost entirely absent or carry with them no political significance. There are, therefore, few of those obstacles to the eventual success of democratic institutions which appear to be so formidable in the case of Indian Provinces. These encouraging features lead me to hope that the path of Burma towards the goal of responsible government may well prove smoother than will be found to be the case in India, once a start has been made on sound and suitable lines."

Now, the question is whether his scheme gives us a good start, as His Honour said, on sound and suitable lines. My submission is no; that we are not given a good start at all. Again, in his original proposal Sir Reginald Craddock has something to say on behalf of the Burmese. He says "It can be confidently affirmed that Burma is endowed with many advantages, notably in respect of those conditions which favour development on democratic lines. Thus she is free from those acute religious dissensions which militate against the co-operation of men of different creeds. Toleration of the scruples and prejudices of others is a ruling tenet in her religion. There is an entire absence of caste, and no marked cleavages of social distinction or occupation exist. The man of humble birth has, in Burma, always been able to rise as high as his ability and education might carry him. The emancipated condition of the Burmese woman conspicuously distinguishes Burma from India, and though secondary education may be backward, nowhere in India has primary education reached so advanced a stage of development. The average standard of living and of comfort of the mass of the population is decidedly higher in Burma than in India, and among the indigenous races, as distinct from the immigrants from China or India, the extremes, both of wealth and of poverty, are far less marked than in any Indian province. Moreover, Burma possesses a ready-made electoral register for rural tracts in the annual rolls which are prepared in every village for the assessment of capitation tax, and thathamada." The capitation tax is something like the poll-tax. "It would therefore be as unwise as it would be unjust to exclude Burma from reform merely because, for historical reasons, there are certain directions in which she is backward. Caution must be exercised in framing her scheme of government, so that adequate allowance may be made for her deficiencies, but at the same time full weight must be given to the many favourable characteristics manifest in her history and social conditions." Those are the words used by Sir Reginald Craddock in his original scheme. Then also as regards the want of experience of the elective system in Burma, Sir Reginald himself has admitted that we have some sort of elective system in Burma, not exactly the same as the Legislative Council, but I see he says, "The elective system, it is true, is by no means unknown in Burma. It has been utilised to a limited extent in connection with the appointment of Pagoda Trustees, of members of Municipal Committees, and last, but, perhaps, most important of all, of members of Committees for Co-operative Societies." And I may add further to that that we are in the habit of electing our members of Committees of various associations. We have conferences almost every year. We know how to run our associations and to look after our own schools, so that it cannot be said against the Burmese people that they do not know what an election is, or how how to run an election. The loyalty of Burma is well known, so I need not go into that question. It is obvious to all the head of the Province that there is no trace of disloyalty among the Burmese. During the war we have rendered yeoman service to the Government in giving men, money and materials, and that has been acknowledged by the head of the Government in the Durbar speech and also before the Legislative Council. I need not go into all these questions. All I urge before your Lordship's Committee is that after hearing all I have stated just now, are we or are we not entitled to share the benefit of the reforms which are in the Bill which is now before Parliament? My submission is we have a greater reason than India for obtaining the reforms in the Bill.

There is the announcement of August, 1917, and I submit to your Lordship that the local Governor is bound by this announcement. He cannot override that. We do not need anything more; we want our reforms like any other Province in India. We Burmese have great faith in British Statesmen and British justice and the British Parliament. We submit that the fate of Burma is better placed in the hands of the British Parliament than in the hands of the Local Government, who have their local prejudices and local interests. I have submitted a copy of our proposal embodying what we want. Possibly some members of the Committee may not have seen it yet, and, to cut it short, I will not go into the questions of small detail as to the Indian Council, the Indian Legislature and the Indian Executive Council and so forth. The various leaders of India have explained their views before your Committee, and I think it far better to leave these questions in the hands of your Lordship's Committee. I do not think I will be able to add anything more than the Indian leaders have placed before your Lordship. We submit the real needs of Burma. One of these is that we want a Governor sent out direct by the British Parliament, and we expect that a British public man from England should be at the head of the Province; Burma is quite big enough and rich enough to have a good man at the head of the administration. We want an Executive Council consisting of three members, one a European and two Burmese, selected by the Governor from the elected members of the Legislative Council. That is as regards the Executive Council. Then we come to the Legislative Council. These are tentative proposals, and I do not submit that your Lordship should take them literally or that we want the exact figures, but the principles are there. We want a large and substantial elected majority, that is to say, four-fifths should be elected and one-fifth nominated. For your general guidance I have given an outline: elected members should represent (1) pure urban areas, (2) rural areas, and (3) special electorates. Urban areas like Rangoon, Mandalay, Moulmein, Bassein, Akyab, Henzada, Prome, Pegu, Myingyan, and Pakokku are large, important centres, trading and industrial towns. They are already enjoying municipal or local self-government, and they are to get separate seats, and for these important centres we reserve about 20 seats.

Then, barring these important centres, the rest will be thrown into the rural areas. Small urban areas, where they have town committees, will go along with the rest of the district. For these districts—of course, if they are too big they can be split up—there will be two seats, or three, according to the population. Our rough idea is to have a population basis barring the population of these urban areas, where there are the special seats, and if the population is under three lakhs we expect one seat, if it is over three lakhs we expect two seats, and if it is over four lakhs we expect about three seats. Those are the principles. Then we have the special electorates. We have not got a university yet, but a university will soon come into existence. At present we have an educational syndicate, but the Burma university is in progress, and it will not be long before a university will come into existence, and for the university we will reserve one, which will probably be filled by a European. The European element need not be anxious that they will not be fairly represented. Then it is quite possible that certain minor interests will have to be protected, and to protect their interests we reserve five non-officials and 16 will be officials. Therefore, putting them together, we get from the urban areas 20 and the rural areas 55, together 75; elected (special electorates) 4, making 79; nominated (non-officials) 5; nominated (officials) 16, together 21; so, that, roughly, it comes to about 100. Those figures are given as a sort of general guide. What we really want is that the principle of a substantial elected majority should be applied, about four-fifths elected members and about one-fifth nominated.

As regards franchise there is not much difficulty in Burma, because Sir Reginald Craddock himself has admitted that we have Assessment Rolls and Municipal Franchises, which are quite ready, and it is only a question of detail. Therefore all that is necessary is that with regard to all persons over 21 years of age and of sound mind in the rural areas and the small urban areas which are grouped along with them, if they pay capitation tax—that is, the poll tax—and Thathamada tax, or who are specially exempted from these taxes other than through poverty, we suggest that they should be entitled to vote. These will come, out of the 12,000,000 to between 1,000,000 and 2,000,000 voters. We say there should be no residential qualification for the candidates. Anyone who gains the confidence of the electors, no matter where he may be, can stand for any seat he likes.

As regards women, your Lordship will notice the admission made by His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor, that the Burma women occupy a very high status. In certain things I may say that they occupy a better status than the English ladies here, because they have control of the purse in the family, which is not the case in England. They should be enfranchised.

As regards functions we are here suggesting on the assumption that in the Provincial Legislature there will be reserved and transferred subjects, and our proposal is that there should be reserved Foreign and Political relations, Army and Navy, Police, Appointments and Discipline, Law and Justice, Ports and Land Revenue, except Capitation and Thathamada. Capitation and Thathamada, I may submit, are not to be found in other Provinces in India, so we have purposely left out the Capitation and Thathamada. These should be transferred subjects, and all other subjects, including the Budget, should be transferred to popular control. As regards contributions to the Central Government, I have mentioned in paragraph 11 that those taxes, the Thathamada and Capitation, are entirely peculiar to Burma, and therefore with regard to any contribution from the Provincial funds to the Imperial funds, my submission is that the revenue from these two sources should be excluded entirely from the Provincial revenue. They should be handed over to the local bodies.

Then, in general, I do not propose to go into details as to what we should get and what we should not get, but our main proposal is that the reform should include similar privileges to those to be granted to the major Provinces of India, and it should in no case be less than that of the United Provinces, for these reasons: that although the population of Burma as compared with the United Provinces is less, in Burma we have quite a number of small landed proprietors; and secondly, the standard of literacy is very high in Burma. I will read an extract which I have collected from the Indian Year Book, 1918. Speaking of the general literacy, it says, "Thanks to the free instruction imparted in the monasteries, and the absence of the purdah system, which hampers the education of females in other parts of India, Burma easily holds the first place in respect of literacy. In the whole population 222 persons per mille are literate, and the proportion rises to 314 amongst persons over fifteen years of age. In every 1,000 persons of each sex 376 males and 61 females are able to read and write. Of the other main British Provinces Bengal and Madras come next with seventy-seven and seventy-five literate persons per mille respectively (so that it shows very poorly as compared with Burma). Bombay follows closely on their heels. Then after after a long interval come Assam, Behar and Orissa and the Punjab. At the bottom of the list are the United Provinces and the Central Provinces and Berar with thirty-four and thirty-three literate persons per mille respectively." So that your Lordship will understand that in the case of literacy we occupy a very high status indeed; and there is another fact which I should urge before your Lordship, and that is the position of women. In Burma there is no difficulty about women. Women at present get the Municipal Franchise, and in the rural districts for the election of headmen they have the vote. As a matter of fact, our women occupy a very high status in Burma; most of the retail business is in their hands, and they move about quite freely like an

Chairman—continued.

English lady in the West, so that although our population is very much less than that of the United Provinces, taking all these various factors into consideration my submission is that we ought not to be left far behind that of the United Provinces. I think I have fairly submitted the general lines of our case, and I trust that your Lordship's Committee will report favourably on behalf of Burma in connection with the reforms which will suit Burma.

Chairman.] We are much obliged to you. You have put your case extremely clearly, and from the Memorandum which you have put in I think we understand exactly what those you represent wish us to understand.

Mr. SYDNEY LOO-NEE, is called in; and Examined, as follows:—

Chairman.

5289. You, sir, have come specially to represent the Karen Association of Burma?—Yes, my Lord.

5290. You have handed in a Memorial, which I have read (see Appendix N.)?—That is so.

5291. Do you wish to supplement that by a statement?—Very shortly. As my friend who has preceded me has just said, we want in Burma the elective system. With the growth of education, and the fact that we are progressing very rapidly on the road of civilisation under the protecting care of the British Government, we desire that our representatives should be elected by us. In Burma, my Lord, there are many different races, and I have the honour to represent the Karen race. In point of population, taking the indigenous population of Burma, we stand second. Our wish and desire is that we Karens of Burma should also participate in the reforms which are in store for Burma. It is needless for me to point out to your Lordship and the members of the Joint Committee that in paragraph 198 of the Report on Indian Constitutional Reforms the eminent authors use these words: "Throwing open the public services more widely to Indians would only mean the replacement of one alien bureaucracy by another." This, I take it, clearly indicates the fear that those eminent authors entertain that if the people of Burma or the races in Burma are not to be protected it will be a case of the weaker to the wall, but we have no such desire, and it is the desire to respect minorities and weaker races that has inspired these words. It is very obvious that, taking the people of Burma as a whole, competition with our Indian brothers will not be in our favour; but the Secretary of State for India, assisted by the Viceroy of India, is going to see that the people of Burma get what is due to them. As we say in paragraph 4 of our Memorial, which is before your Lordship's Committee, we are one of the races in Burma——

5292. I think the meaning of that paragraph 198 is quite clear; it is that an Indian Civil Service in Burma will be just as foreign as an English one?—That is so, my Lord. So, in Burma, the interests of the people of the country are not going to be ignored by the Secretary of State for India and the Viceroy. If that is the case, we, the Karens of Burma, come to this fountain of British justice and ask that under any scheme that is fashioned out for Burma we also may participate. As it appears in his Honour the Lieutenant-Governor's scheme we Karens were to come only by nomination into the Legislative Assembly. We have given our reasons why that will not suit us, and those reasons appear in paragraph 6 of our Memorial, which is before your Lordship's Committee. So, my Lord, we have come here, confidently anticipating that, although we form a minority in Burma, our needs will not be overlooked, and that the rights which attach to British subjects may also be claimed and shared by us. These are the statements I have been privileged to make supplementary to the Memorial which I have submitted to your Lordship's Committee.

5293. What proportion of the population are the Karens?—The Karens form, roughly, about one-seventh of the Burmans.

Chairman.] We are much obliged to you, thank you.

Major Ormsby-Gore.
Sir J. D. Rees.

The Right Honourable the Earl of SELBORNE in the Chair.

Sir HARRY STEPHEN is called in; and Examined as follows:—

Chairman.

5294. You were a judge of the High Court of Calcutta?—Yes.

5295. And retired in 1914?—Yes.

5296. You have been good enough to answer questions which we sent to you?—Yes.

The questions and answers are as follows:—

1. Do you accept the proposition that it is desirable to bring about the progressive realisation of responsible government in India? And, if so, how do you define the expression "responsible government"? And do you generally accept the proposition contained in the preamble?—I accept the proposition that it is desirable to bring about the progressive realisation of responsible government in India because the principle has been accepted by both Houses of Parliament, and the country is therefore pledged to do all that can be done to apply it with success. Personally,

Chairman—continued.

Personally, I consider that the political state of India is not yet sufficiently developed for it to be possible to say that responsible government, or any other particular form of government, will be what is best suited to Indian conditions. I had rather not attempt to define responsible government; but for present purposes I take it to mean a system in which the executive is responsible to and controlled by a body that is representative of the people at large. The term is borrowed, I believe, from our Colonial policy, where representative and responsible governments are distinguished from representative governments, and in talking of responsible government we therefore take its representative character for granted.

2. Do you think that the realisation of responsible government in the provinces involves the establishment in provincial legislatures of a substantial elected majority (Clause 6)?—I think that the realisation of responsible government in the provinces does involve the establishment in provincial legislatures of a substantial elected majority.

3. Do you think that the non-official members of the provincial legislatures should possess power to control the actions and policy of the executive? Do you think they possess such power at present?—I do not think that members of provincial governments should have as much power of controlling the actions and policy of the executive as the Houses of Parliament have. I think that they should have more than I understand they have at present. They should have enough control to make it possible to say that they are responsible for any particular measure or that they advocated a policy that was not adopted. I am not in a position to say how much power of control they have at present.

5. If you accept the propositions stated under Questions 1 to 4, do you think that the dual form of government embodied in the Bill is the best means of securing them? If not, what are your objections to that feature of the Bill, and by what other means would you attempt to secure the objects in view?—I do not think the dual form of government embodied in the Bill is the best means of obtaining the object aimed at, namely, responsible government. My objections to a dual form of government are as follows: (a) It is a complete novelty, the actual working of which no man can foresee. (b) It would weaken government generally, and I believe that a strong government, by which I mean a government that can have its decisions carried out completely and speedily, is necessary for India now, and for any time that we need consider. This is so partly because the number of matters in which government interferes is greater in India than it has hitherto been in England or in any English Colonies. (c) Differences between Councillors and Ministers would be fully developed in the Governor's Council, and would certainly be known of outside it. I do not believe that Councillors and Ministers could loyally defend measures of which it is known that they disapproved, as it is suggested in the Montagu-Chelmsford Report that they should (paragraph 283), and I cannot think that the sight of them doing so would be good political education. The suggestion of the Government of India that a convention should be established by which "each half of the Government should abstain from opposition to the other half"—(paragraph 107)—seems to me a less objectionable but hardly a more practically useful suggestion. (d) I cannot believe that it is possible to divide the functions of government so that some should be exercised by one body and others by another. (See the letter from the Government of Bombay, paragraph 6.) (e) I cannot believe that members of the proposed electorates would recognise the difference in responsibility for reserved and transferred subjects. Practically all the blame for unpopular measures would be put on the Governor and the Councillors, and the Ministers would take credit for the rest. Very few people in England know, for example, who is responsible for certain measures of an education authority, or how the Police are controlled. Ignorance of such matters in India would go much further. (f) The position of the Governor in a dual government seems to be impossible. I do not understand paragraphs 219 and 240 of the Chelmsford-Montagu Report; and if the instructions to be drafted for his guidance develop those paragraphs I shall not understand them. He is to be in the position more or less of the Governor-General and the Prime Minister of Canada. But he will be directly responsible to the Secretary of State and the Legislative Council, and he will not be able to rely on the support of a political party, as according to prevailing ideas on representative government it is essential that he should. He will have to administer a system of government of which neither he nor anyone else will have had any experience. He will have to make himself as familiar as may be with wholly new conditions, and he will have to divide his confidence between two sets of advisers, who may "pull different ways," one of which he will have to educate in the principles of responsible government and the other in the principles of government generally. (g) Personally, I am much impressed by paragraphs 109, 110, of the letter of the Government of India, which show how the legislature in a dual government will constantly attempt to convert a legitimate influence in reserved subjects into a control, which it is considered that the Government must as constantly resist. Such resistance will not add to the unity, nor, I venture to think, to the efficiency of the Government. A somewhat similar point is made in the European Association's final statement, in the paragraph "Final Stages of the Transition." I fully agree with their argument.

6. If you have any other method to suggest, does it (i.) provide possibilities of advance by stages and facilitate the "progressive realisation of responsible 'government,'" and, if it does, in what way? (Clauses 2, 3, etc.) And (ii.), does it afford means of judgment (a) to the electors and (b) to the Statutory Commission which is to examine and report on progress of the success or failure in results of the control exercised by the Legislature and those who represent it in the Executive?—I suggest the method of government indicated in the proposals put forward by the Indo-British Association. I think that such a system will provide possibilities of advance by stages and facilitate the progressive realisation of responsible government for the reasons stated by the Minute of Lieutenant-Governors of the United Provinces, etc., on 15th January, 1919, and the Government of Bombay. I regret that I have not time to answer this question more fully.

8. In particular, do you think (i.) that Ministers should hold office "during pleasure"—i.e., should be liable to removal if they are unable to support the action decided upon in their department by the Governor or if they fail to retain the confidence of the Legislature (Clause 3 (1))? (ii.) That the Governor should have power to disregard the opinion of his Ministers if he considers that action in accordance with that opinion is inconsistent with the due discharge of his responsibilities (Clause 3 (3))? (iii.) That the Executive Council should in all Provinces normally consist of one official European and one non-official Indian (Clause 4)? (iv.) That the Governor should have power to dissolve his Legislative Council (Clause 7 (4))?—My answer to (i.), (ii.) and (iv.) is yes. I had rather not answer (iii.) definitely, but I incline to the opinion that an Executive Council of two is too small. I have no experience of any Province except Bengal.

9 and 10. Referring back to questions 2, 3 and 4, if your answers to the first and third of these are in the affirmative, and if you think that the Legislatures should be given greater powers of control and influence than they possess at present, do you regard the limitations imposed generally by Clause 9 of the Bill upon their financial and legislative powers as (i.) suitable, or as (ii.) unnecessarily severe, or as (iii.) inadequate to safeguard the responsibilities which the Government owes in the last resort to Parliament (Clause 9)? In particular, (i.) do you think that the Legislature should have power with whatever limitations to vote supplies (Clause 9 (2))? (ii.) Do you accept the plan of Grand Committees as the

the means of giving to the Government the power to secure essential legislation in the event of their failure to carry their propositions in the Council? If so, have you any modifications of detail to suggest? If not, what other method would you suggest to secure the object in view?—I ask leave not to answer these questions.

11 and 12. Do you accept the position adopted in the Bill (Part II.) that the time has not yet come to give the Legislative Assembly a similar measure of control over the Central Government as that given to Provincial Legislative Councils over Provincial Governments? Do you agree that it is advisable, none the less, to provide for a substantial elective majority in the Indian Legislature (Clause 16)?—My answer is yes.

13 to 17. Do you accept the plan of a Bicameral Legislature as arising out of this, as constituting both a satisfactory machine for the ordinary purposes of legislation and as affording the means to the Governor-General in Council to secure legislation which he regards as essential (Clauses 14, 15 and 16)? Do you accept the provisions of the Bill as to the course of legislation in the Indian Legislature Clause 20 (3) and (4)); or do you regard them as unnecessarily restrictive on the popular will, or as an inadequate means of ensuring to the Governor-General in Council the discharge of his responsibilities? Do you accept the changes made by the Bill (Clause 21) in the constitution of the Governor-General's Executive Council? If not, what are your reasons, and what modifications would you suggest? Do you think that the development of provincial autonomy on the one hand, and of self-government in the Provinces on the other, involves any modification of the provisions of Sections 2, 33 and 45 of the Government of India Act (Clause 23)? Do you agree that the gradual realisation of responsible government involves periodical examination of progress by independent authority, and that the provisions of Clause 28 of the Bill are well designed to afford such examination?—I had rather not answer these questions.

18. Are there any matters which it is proposed in the Bill to deal with by rule which you would suggest should be provided for in the Bill?—I am not in a position to answer this question fully; but generally I view the powers given to the Secretary of State with great apprehension. I have to write without having the Bill before me; but the provision that the Secretary of State may limit the powers of Parliament by an Order seems to me very dangerous.

19. Have you any observations to offer on the Reports of Lord Southborough's Committees and of the Committee on the Home Administration of Indian Affairs?—I have not been able to study the Reports mentioned with sufficient care to be able to answer this question. But I do not think that Lord Southborough's Reports offer a solution of the difficulty that either the constituencies will be so small as to create an oligarchy in favour of the educated classes, or so large as to be unmanageable by the educated classes or anyone else.

I hope I may be allowed to add a few words as to the future position of the Public Services, not, of course, as Lord Curzon says, from the point of view of "opposing vested interests to the course of constitutional change," but of "conserving for India during a difficult period of transition the only agency likely to be available for affording the necessary help and guidance." The merits of the Services are fully recognised in the Montagu-Chelmsford Report, and Lord Curzon lays down as one of the leading principles to be followed that nothing is to be done "to weaken or to diminish the protection that they afford to the vast multitude of the population" from the oppression that they have to fear "from different classes of their own countrymen." The Government of India shows how this is to be done. The appointment, pay and pensions of the Services generally are to be controlled by the Secretary of State, and all officers are to serve in any capacity, and therefore under the control of Indians if necessary. "Ministers"—

I quote from the Government of India—"will be taking over departments staffed by public servants, European and Indian alike, with no experience of popular government, who may tend to be impatient of new methods and unappreciative of changes in policy. . . . Ministers may be apprehensive of obstruction and intolerant of the rigidity of official methods. We recognise that it is possible that in the exercise of their responsibility, and from the best of motives, Ministers may adopt a policy which the Service feels that it cannot, consistently with its conscience and self-respect, carry out. . . . Ministers may naturally prefer their own agents, and be disposed to treat lightly vested claims to important or desirable appointments. Officers who personally render themselves unpopular will be treated with less consideration than they sometimes receive now."

No rules can be laid down for meeting such cases, but the Governor must do his best to deal with them. In the last resort "an officer finding his position unendurable should be entitled to apply to the Government of India for a proportionate pension." . . . In the case of disciplinary orders passed by Ministers which affect an officer's emoluments or pension "there would be an appeal to the Government of India and to the Secretary of State." "In the event of Ministers' orders being reversed a difficult position would no doubt ensue, but in this case also the only ultimate solution might be to grant retirement on proportionate pension. . . . In paragraphs 156 and 259 of the Report expressions occur which will be read as promising detailed support and protection to a public servant in discharge of his duties. In our opinion this involves too frequent opportunities of intervention to be a workable arrangement or to be consistent with the due exercise of his responsibilities by a Minister. We think that all that can be wisely guaranteed is, in the last resort, a right of retirement on fair terms."

I admit that I do not see how any other scheme can be provided that will make dual government possible. But the proposals of the Government of India do not seem to me to provide that the beneficent powers of the Services shall not be weakened or diminished. If a conscientious public servant can be forced into retirement, whether he has acted rightly or wrongly, I cannot think that harmony in Government circles will be increased, that the political education of Indians will be promoted, or that the credit of the Services, and particularly of the Indian Civil Service, will not be seriously impaired.

5297. You have not answered all the questions, I think?—No, there are some questions which I would ask leave not to answer.

5298. Is there anything you would like to say in supplement?—Not at the moment.

5299. There is nothing you wish to say?—There are several matters which I have omitted because my time for answering the questions was exceedingly short; it was hardly more than two days. I have said nothing about communal representation. I am not prepared to say anything about it at the moment.

5300. What we should like would be for you to say anything that you wish to bring before us now, if it is more convenient to us that you should tell us exactly what is in your mind, and then we shall ask you questions?—May I have a copy of my answers? (The same is handed to the Witness).

5301. We should like you to direct our attention to every point you think it ought to be directed to?—Personally, I should like to draw your attention to the fact that I have said that I accept the principle of the pronouncement of the 20th August. I myself do not agree with it. At the same time I accept it, as I am accustomed to accept other matters which I do not always approve of. As far as I have anything to say, it is chiefly about the dual form of government. With regard to the points I have made, I do not know if I may go through them. Perhaps not. I will only say now that if I had thought more about the form of my communication, I should have put in my remarks about the Civil Service as a part of my objections to dual government, because it is the duality of the government which, in my opinion, raises the very great difficulties that arise on that question. I support the proposals put forward by the Indo-British Association, that is as far as constructive criticism is concerned. I am not competent to discuss financial matters, because I am not naturally at all familiar with them, and, as I have said before, I am speaking at very short notice. I am not competent to express more than a very general opinion about the position of the Government of India. I agree with the arguments put forward by the European Association; personally I should like to see the Government of India left as it is or practically as it is while these changes in Provincial Government, which are really the key of the situation, are proceeding. I am not competent to go into that matter in very great detail, but I think it is most important to have a strong Central Government to keep together those elements of the service and the Government of India which it is possible may tend to fly apart. In the same way I am not at all competent to criticise except in the most general possible way the policy of changing the connection between the Secretary of State and the Government of India. I have not knowledge enough to venture to do that. But I do feel very great apprehension at the enormous powers which are given to the Secretary of State by the Bill to make alterations merely by rule. I think I am right in saying that this system has gone far further in this Bill than it has in any other Act in existence. There are large powers under the Judicature Act, but there is nothing approaching the power which is given to the Secretary of State under this Act. Under this Act the Secretary of State can by rule limit the powers of Parliament, of himself, and of the Viceroy. This is a departure from ordinary legislation of a very extraordinary kind, and it seems to me in fact most dangerous. Not only do I think it dangerous, but there is this to be remembered: We are starting India on a new system of government, which is to be developed to a very great extent, as it is hoped. Surely we ought to start it under the best possible auspices, and if on such an occasion as this Parliament legislates by means of referring things to the administrative orders of the Secretary of State that is about as bad an example to the Indian Legislatures as it is possible to give. The Indian Ministers will, I apprehend, like all administrators, be inclined to extol their power at the expense of the controlling authority—at the expense of the Legislature. And here is an example in the Act which constitutes their position encouraging them to go to very great lengths in that matter. It is a very exceptional and a very bad form of legislation in the present case, and I think as an example to the Indian Governors of India it will be about as bad as it is possible for it to be.

I have not said much about the influence of caste, which is connected with the question of communal representation. My knowledge of the subject is indirect. Most of it comes from books and from the information of others, and, of course, caste in Bengal is not what I understand it is in Madras and some other parts. But I am quite certain that when the community as a whole begins to take political action and to organise itself in any way it will organise itself on the lines of caste. I do not want to make an obvious remark about caste, about how old it is and how invincible. Bengal is not, I understand, very much caste-ridden, but, at the same time, I have had, even as a judge, plenty of experience of how caste comes into every conceivable action which you may expect to be taken in India. It is a matter which a stranger certainly can never have out of his mind. I do not think an Indian could get it out of his mind. The stranger certainly has always to remember it and to be prepared for all kinds of surprising appearances of the caste motive. I have no suggestions to offer in the matter of communal representation, because of the want of personal knowledge, but what I say with confidence is that any scheme which neglects differences of caste, differences of religion, differences of race, is certain so far to result in failure.

I have said that I do not myself personally agree with the principle of the pronouncement of the 20th August. I have said so in another place as plainly as I could, and I have no wish to conceal my views. I may, perhaps, be allowed to add the lines on which should like to see reforms proceed, and they are these: That you should go on developing what we have done already, that you should constantly give a greater share of public employment to Indians, that you should—as you do—put Indians into important official positions, chiefly because they are Indians, even at the expense of efficiency, that you should take every opportunity of giving public work to Indians individually and to Indians collectively, and you would then see on what lines the political genius of the Indian people—which admittedly still remains to be developed—develops. In that way you would have a chance of developing the politics of India on Indian lines, and you would avoid the mistake which I think you are committing — a mistake we have so often committed before — of supposing that because a thing is good for England it is therefore good for India. We made that mistake, I understand, in education; to some extent there was a danger in making it in religion; and it was made in Bengal in respect of landed property. We have suffered from those mistakes. If you make it on this occasion I think we shall suffer, and that the results will be irreparable. Personally, therefore, I am anxious to see the reforms develop, so that they may develop hereafter on Indian lines, and not necessarily on English lines. Of course, I have to accept the decision of the two Houses of Parliament; but the practical result of that is that I entirely support the recommendations of the Indo-British Association, which are, in effect, those of the Government of Bombay, and of the heads of Government of those five Provinces. I need not enumerate them. That is all I have to say.

Lord Sinha.

5302. Do you believe in responsible government in any country?—Yes.

5303. In England, for instance?—Yes; of course.

5304. As I understand you, the principle which these reforms are intended to carry out in their application to India is a false one?—I do not say it is false. What I do say is, we can none of us foretell how the thing can develop. We none of us know how the political genius of India will grow, and I think it is rash to lay down any definite aim of that kind, and it may do great injury.

5305. I believe it is your opinion that responsible government is not suitable to India now, and will not be suitable in any time that we can contemplate?—Yes. Any time that we can contemplate—well, I leave it at that; yes.

5306. And that, therefore, it is really labour lost to lay down steps for accomplishing that purpose?—I think it is worse than labour lost to try to foreshadow the ultimate form of the Government of India in Indian hands. But we are English; we are starting this development, and it is inevitable that we should start it more or less in our own way. Practically, that is inevitable, and I accept that.

5308. Do you think that they have imbibed at all the idea of responsible government for their country?—The great difficulty about all Indians is that they are apt to copy. It is very difficult to get an Indian to originate anything. Read through this Bill—the Government of India Bill—and I think you will see that it is entirely an English idea, and when you get the most educated Indians you find that they are copying English affairs, as it seems to me, without any thought or really any knowledge of their own country. They are making the same mistake which the English are in supposing that English things are good for India—that English things are the best possible under all circumstances. I do not want to say that the Indians are worse off in that matter than the English. I do not think they are.

5309. Do I understand you to say that in your view they are incapable of assimilating the ideas or ideals which which they copy?—I do not know. If we start this off we have to start it off on lines of representative government. I need not go into that. We agree about that. We have to start it off on those lines because the model comes from England. Very well, start it off on those lines and see how it goes, and then let the thing develop itself as far as possible, and as far as possible according to the best Indian opinion.

5310. By that do I understand that you would advocate the enlargement of this expansion of the Legislative Councils, both in the Provinces and in the Central Government?—As at present existing?

5311. And expansion from what they are at present?—I speak with reserve about the Central Government. I do not know anything about it, really.

5312. But your idea is that the Legislative Councils should be made larger and more representative of all shades of opinion in India?—Representative as far as possible; but larger, yes.

5313. Do you think it is possible to make representative institutions in India?—Oh, yes, to some extent. I do not know how far; that remains to be seen. I think by a system of nomination you might get a very representative institution. I do not suggest there should be a large system of nomination, but I think it is more than theoretically possible.

5314. That is to say, government by people all-wise and all-powerful?—Yes; and well-advised.

5315. That you would say of every country that where they are governed by wise, well-advised people, you would rather have that than popular representatives—that is to say, by the vote?—No, I would not say so in a developed country; but we are dealing with a country—I need not repeat it all—where the people are poor and ignorant beyond any European standard—where 90 per cent. of them are not fit for, and do not desire, any political power; and I think it is very difficult to get a body properly representative of those interests on the lines of election. I am quite in favour of trying it, but you must not compare it with England.

5316. When you advocate the enlargement or the expansion of the present Legislative Councils I think you advocate that measure on the basis of election?—No doubt it would increase the elective principle in the government of the country, certainly.

5317. Would you deny all power to those Councils?—No.

5318. Or any power to those Councils?—No; I have never suggested that.

5319. I am putting it to you?—No.

5320. In giving that power would you give them power over the Executive—the power must be over somebody?—Yes.

5321. So that you would give these enlarged Legislative Councils power over the Executive?—Some.

5322. Some power over the Executive?—Yes.

5323. But not all?—Not all.

5324. Therefore we have to divide the powers?—No.

5325. How do you propose to give some and not all if you do not divide?—Of course, you can say they have power in some things and not in others, but I would go on the lines of giving the Indians generally the same power over everything rather than the other way on, rather than complete power over some.

5326. There would have to be some division in any case—whether it is as it has ben called horizontal or vertical, there will have to be a division of power?—I do not think so. They would have very great influence over the whole system of government, if you call it influence—or power, I do not mind. That is a question of words.

5327. I was trying to distinguish between the two—influence and power?—I cannot.

5328. Between absolute control and mere influence?—No. You are trying to work the thing out neatly on paper; I am thinking of what would actually happen.

5329. Perhaps you may agree to differ. We hope that what is put down on paper will be carried out, and that it will not be camouflage?—I do not for a moment suggest it is comouflage. I think it is more like what we might call—I do not want to be rude—moonshine.

5330. You consider the scheme embodied in the Bill unreal?—I do not think it will work as is expected

5331. Can you give the Committee any indication as to how you would divide the power in the way that you suggested—some power over all, but not all power over some?—It would be in the amount of power given. Personally I cannot work the thing out in detail enough to make it pat on paper, but if you imagine a Province with a representative Assembly of a certain size—it seems to be agreed that about 100 is the right number——

5333. I am sorry to say I am not familiar with the specific scheme of the Indo-British Association, if it has put forward any specific scheme, but I do know the scheme put forward by the five heads of Local Governments. Is the Indo-British scheme the same as that?—It is very much the same in principle.

5334. Is there any variation in points of detail, because I have not seen it put forward in any complete form anywhere?—We have done our best in the Indo-British to publish it. I have only had two half-days really. It is a point I would have worked up in detail. I have not worked it up in detail. I would rather not answer without having gone into it carefully.

5335. Has the scheme of the Indo-British Association been worked out in detail?—Yes, it has been worked out in detail. We published a pamphlet, which I think was forwarded to you; in fact, I know it was.

5336. With regard to what you have said about caste, I think you said that in Bengal the influence of caste is very much less than it is in other Provinces?—I should like to say that I understand that in other Provinces it is more than it is in Bengal.

5337. In Bengal did you find the observance of caste interefere with questions of politics at all?—I found they interfered with every question with which I had any connection—differences of caste.

5338. In what way? Did the fact of a man belonging, say, not to the Brahmin caste, prevent him from having any profession or occupation which the Brahmins were free to have?—When he was in the profession with which I am chiefly concerned, I think it made a considerable difference to him. It made a difference in the law.

5339. That is what I wanted to find out. Is it your experience that Brahmin lawyers have any greater chance than non-Brahmin lawyers?—Yes.

5340. How many judges——?—You are getting very near personal questions which I must ask you not to put to me. You know the answer to your question.

5341. No, I do not, I am sorry to say; but if you would rather not answer it——?—It comes down to such very narrow compass, and you are asking me about my colleagues. Would you put the question and let me see if I would rather not answer it. I particularly do not want to shirk anything.

5342. Have you not had very distinguished judges of the Court in which you sat, non-Brahmins?—Yes, one.

5343. You would admit only one? There have been many judges?—I prefer to speak of my own time. The rest were all Brahmins. My other Indian colleagues, I think, were all Brahmins—there were two who were non-Brahmins and four who were, I think. You can help me.

5344. I cannot for the moment think, but my impression is there has not been much difference between the two. Of course, they are all higher castes except one?—And with that one it was always mentioned as an objection to him. He was one of my ablest colleagues. The question of caste was always mentioned as a very serious objection to his appointment.

5345. But as a matter of fact, he made a very good judge of the Court?—He did.

5346. He had risen very high in his profession as a pleader before he was given a judgship?—His abilities were very great, but I have always heard it was a serious objection to his appointment that there was a difficulty about his caste. I do not know what the difficulty was.

5347. So far as you are aware, was there any difficulty in society, so far as that judge was concerned, in his social relations?—I tried to avoid knowing that.

5348. You do not know, therefore?—In his social relations?

5349. Yes?—I always heard that A and B would not meet him.

5350. Did you? I confess I never heard it?—You know more about it than I do.

5351. My feeling is that there were no social difficulties. As regards the profession of the law, apart from the judges you know, many distinguished non-Brahmins in your Court had risen very high?—Yes.

5352. And belonged to all castes practically?—Yes.

5353. To very many castes?—Yes.

5354. And therefore, so far as the profession of the law is concerned, at any rate, there was nothing in the way of a non-Brahmin?—There were a good many advantages for Brahmins.

5355. Oh yes, naturally, because they have had the benefit of education for centuries?—Yes.

5356. But do you think that their caste in itself gave them any advantage in respect of the profession of the law with which you and I are familiar?—Yes.

5357. You think it did?—So I always understood.

5358. Now as regards other castes, they are landlords, doctors and practically everything else, in the same way as Brahmins are in Bengal?—Yes.

5359. In Calcutta itself did you observe any of the rigours or rigidities of the caste system?—Yes.

5360. In what way?—There was the Marwari Hospital. Caste men could not go to the ordinary hospital, and therefore a Marwari left money for the foundation of a hospital for caste men. I was chairman of the committee of that hospital. There came a time when the English doctor who had started it was retiring. There was a question of who was to be appointed in his place. He was anxious to have his second in command. I have rather forgotten my facts, and I do not want to say anything wrong; but what I do remember is they were very anxious to have an English doctor and not an Indian one at the time. I tried to make it the other way, but they would not have it at all.

5361. That is the hospital for Marwaris?—Yes. You know it, I think. I have forgotten the name.

5362. It was a hospital for Marwaris?—For caste men generally—for high castes.

5363. Perhaps my recollection may be at fault, but that is not my impression. It was a hospital for Marwaris?—My recollection is it is a hospital for men of high caste, the Marwaris, in the first place.

5364. They are people who come from Marwari?—Yes

5365. And they are traders, commercial men in Calcutta?—Yes, as Rajputs come from Rajputana.

5366. It was for their benefit that the hospital was founded, if I remember rightly?—When I was introduced to the hospital I understood it to be a hospital for high castes.

5367. It do not quite see how from that you deduce the influence of caste?—It shows the practical importance that caste had.

5368. That caste people will not go to hospitals?—When I began my observation I had something else in my mind to say that I am not quite sure about. I thought of saying that the doctor it was proposed to appoint was not high caste. I cannot remember now whether he was or not, and I would rather not state it.

5369. What you stated, namely, that they wanted a European doctor, might very well be due to the fact that they thought the European doctor was the better doctor?—No—well, it is not a question of caste. May we avoid that?

5370. As between European and Indian, it could not be a question of caste?—No.

5371. And the European doctor was probably preferred because of what was believed to be his superior skill?—No, it was not so.

5372. You said something about the draft instructions to the Governor in your answers?—Yes.

5373 Have you read the draft instructions—the form appended to the despatch of the Government of India?—No; has it be other than that published?

5374. The proposed draft?—Where?

5375. Annexed to the despatch of the Government of India?—I have never been able to see the letter.

5376. You have the first one probably of the 5th March?—Is there any other published?

5377. Yes?—Really these things come out so very secretly that the public has no means of gaining much information about them. I do not know anything about it.

5378. I do not think you can say that, because they have been published, and are available for sale, and presented to Parliament?—I learn that for the first time. I have been trying to get hold of these Indian publications, and everything connected with this Bill is very difficult to get.

5379. I do not know why it should be?—No, nor do I; at least, I must not say.

5380. Do you think that in the form recommended by the five heads of Locel Governments there is any responsibility attaching to any of the members of the Council?—Yes.

5381. In what way?—Members of the Legislative Council who are put into the government of the Provinces will, in fact, be responsible to a very great degree to the Legislative Assembly. Whatever you say on paper, whatever rules you like to make, that responsibility will, I think, be fully recognised. In my experience, if you take in the Indian and do any work with him you find that he is constantly thinking, quite naturally, quite properly, of his fellow-countrymen. I mean in the case where English and Indians are working together the Indian is constantly in his mind, referring questions that arise to what he supposes to be the opinions of his fellow-countryment. The Englishman, I am well aware, is constantly doing the same thing. Of course he is. And those are the circumstances under which we have got to associate. The Englishman is responsible to English opinion; the Indian to Indian opinion.

5382. Is that responsible or amenable? Would you call that merely amenable or also responsible?—In matters of law I always view that with great apprehension, these neat distinctions; in matters of politics I think they are altogether out of place.

5383. The fact that they belong to their country, and are therefore likely to be influenced by the opinion of their countrymen, is enough in your mind to create responsibility?—Certainly.

5385. Am I right in saying that responsible government means a government liable to be overthrown by those to whom they are responsible?—Yes.

5386. Do you think that there would be responsibility in that sense in the Council as proposed by the five heads of the Local Governments?—Yes. I think it will be quite impossible for a Minister to remain a Minister who was in disagreement with the majority or with a majority of the Legislative Assembly—the elected members.

Chairman.

5387. Not the Legislative Assembly?—The Legislative Council. I think it would be as impossible as it would be improper.

Lord Sinha.

5388. You mean because he would himself not choose to remain?—Yes.

5389. But the Legislative Council could not, by a vote of want of confidence, compel him to go?—I think it could very easily make his position impossible. I am supposing the Governor to have power to dismiss a Minister. Would it be possible for the Governor to to retain a Minister who was always having votes of censure passed upon him, and whose projects were always disapproved of? Surely not.

5390. Then in your scheme you contemplate that the Indian portion of the Executive Council will be removed if the Legislature disagrees with them in essential or important matters?—There will come the point when he will be removed. Where that point is depends upon how far the political organisation of the country develops in that particular Province. It would be one of the most important functions of the Governor to decide that kind of question, and it is one which I think a man with experience of English political life, as I understand the Governor presumably would be, would be exceedingly well qualified to deal with.

5391. If that is the scheme of the Bill, would you approve of it—namely, that the Indian portion of the Executive Council should resign if the Governor thought he had differences on important matters with the Legislative Council from the majority of the Legislative Council?—I should be very sorry to see that put down in black and white. Nobody can draft any regulation or anything to meet a case like that. It must be left to the constitutional Governor.

5392. Whether it was put down in writing or not, if that is the understanding or convention upon which this Bill is passed, would you approve of it?—I should approve of that portion of it if it were left to the Governor to say that he thought a Minister ought to resign; I should approve of that. It comes practically to saying this, that the Minister would hold office during the pleasure of the Governor that is recommended by the Governor of India. That I quite agree with.

5393. That is in the Bill?—I had not a copy of the Bill with me last Saturday, and I could not get one till Monday morning, and I have not looked up this point. (A copy of the Bill is handed to the Witness.)

5394. Will you look at Clause 3?—Yes. "Any Minister so appointed shall hold office during his pleasure." That is in the Bill.

5395. That meets with your approval?—I hope it will stay there.

5396. Whether it stays there or not will be a matter for hereafter?—I should like to congratulate you on that.

5397. Therefore, so far as the Bill is concerned, the position of the Minister is what you advocate yourself?—So far as this clause is concerned. I do not know about the Bill—that is rather a large order.

5398. That particular provision is an important provision?—That provision I quite approve of. I think I have said so. I think it is one of the Questions.

5400. Is there any objection to that being fixed by rule?—I had not contemplated anything else.

5401. I am trying to show that you and I are in essential agreement?—I am very glad of it. I hope we shall get into further agreement.

5402. I am trying to put those points to you which I think are essential?—Yes—examination-in-chief.

5403. You therefore approve of the idea that the Indian portion of the Executive Government should have specific departments or subjects assigned to them to be under their control?—Yes. I had not conceived any other system possible.

5404. And as you have said that the Ministers will be amenable to the Legislature—that is to say, they will not continue to hold office if the majority are against them on important matters—I take it that, having regard to the subjects assigned to the Minister, their resignation will depend upon important differences between themselves and the Legislative Council with regard to their own subjects?—Yes; I suppose so.

5405. At any rate, principally with regard to those subjects?—Yes; they would be responsible chiefly for their own subjects, as a Minister is in England.

5406. I would rather not complicate this matter by comparing them with English Ministers, because there is the question of corporate responsibility?—I know.

5407. Therefore, I am trying to take the position of Indian Ministers by itself. Are you aware that that is the scheme of the Bill?—I am sorry, but I have not read the Bill. I did not take the Bill with me and I could not get one till before I started. I wrote for one at once. I could not read it in the train.

5408. If it is in the Bill that the Ministers should be responsible to the Legislature with respect to specific subjects assigned to them, that would meet with your approval?—So far it would. I should like them to be responsible for the whole thing.

5409. You would like the Ministers to be responsible for both their own subjects and——?—Chiefly for their own subjects; but I should like to have, as far as possible, a corporate liability. Whatever you say, I think there will be a corporate liability, and I think there will be an individual liability.

5410. Whether you divide the Executive Government into two, or whether you keep them one, it will be both corporate and individual responsibility?—Of course, if you divide them into two, I do not know what there will be—I cannot imagine.

5411. Because you refuse to contemplate that?—No, I do not; I have been contemplating it as much as I can.

5412. If you have a divided Government, supposing subjects assigned to one portion and other specific subjects assigned to another, both deliberating together, will there be no responsibility, in the sense that you use it, of one portion for the acts of the other?—There will be very great confusion. Practically, the Indians will be able to represent the English Government as responsible for everything that is unpopular and themselves as responsible for the rest.

5413. Are you assuming that everything that is assigned to the Executive Council, or the English portion of the Government—and that will not be entirely English, either—will be unpopular?—Oh, no; not at all. What I am thinking is that the ordinary voter will not think about it; that the extraordinary man—the politically minded man, even—will not have any idea what are reserved and what are transferred subjects.

5414. Do not they have that idea now, because now portfolios are assigned to different members? They know now who is in charge of education?—Yes.

5415. They know who is in charge of the police, do they not?—Do they? Who is in charge of the police in Bengal?

5416. Sir Henry Wheeler, now?—Well, is one of two Englishmen. I do not know enough about the division of work in Bengal to be clear about it.

5417. But there is a system of portfolios assigned to different members now. You know that?—Yes.

5418. Therefore there is nothing objectionable in assigning departments to different Ministers?—No; I cannot conceive working the Government on any other plan.

5419. And, primarily, each member is responsible for his own department?—Yes.

5420. Though as he takes part in the deliberations with regard to all he is responsible for the others also, though not to the same extent?—Yes.

5421. That is the present position?—Yes.

5422. Do you think that it will be very different under the scheme which is embodied in this Bill? Take the report with which you are probably more familiar?—I suppose the report is the same as the Bill in that respect?

5423. Yes?—I have read the report. I have not got the Bill in my mind completely—yes, I think it will be different.

5424. In what respect?—The Ministers will have considerable influence, it is admitted, over reserved subjects, and they will have no responsibility for them. They will be able to do things and will not be responsible for them.

5425. You have already said you would rather not distinguish between influence and power?—Yes.

5426. If they have considerable influence over the reserved department, will they not be held also responsible to some extent for the decisions in those departments?—

ments?—No, you have enabled them to get out of that responsibility by your division, by your diarchy. They have power without responsibility, as I say.

5427. Influence?—Well, influence or power; let us say control—whatever it is. They will have that. They will have power without responsibility. That is what it comes to shortly.

5428. Do I understand you to say that in your view they ought to be responsible for those other subjects, too?—To some extent I think they will be. I do not think you could lay down beforehand what their responsibility will be. It will make itself. You may have all these laws and rules. No one will attend to them.

5429. When you have these enlarged Councils you would give them power, would you not, over some subjects, as you have already said?—No, I would not divide the subjects. They would have a certain quantity of power. That power would tell more on some than on others. On the question of public security and peace, and so on, it would not be great. On a subject like education it would be very great indeed. That would be for the skilful Governor. He would give them power in those directions which he thought would be most likely to develop their aptitude.

5430. I have always understood that the opponents of this scheme say that the kind of skilful Governor which you require under this Bill is a superman that England cannot produce?—The Governor whom you require for a State diarchy has not yet been found, because we have no experience of diarchy.

5431. You yourself are talking of skilful men to distinguish between cases in which the will of the Legislature should be given effect to, and cases in which it should not?—That is in a unitary government.

5432. Is the kind of skill to be different in the other?—The Governor in a State of diarchy seems to me to be in a perfectly impossible position. I find it difficult really to imagine what he will do.

5433. Now with regard to finance, would you give the Legislative Council the same kind of power?—May I cry off finance? If I had had longer time I would have gone into the financial proposals. I have studied them pretty carefully, but I have really not been able to get them up sufficiently to meet you.

Lord Islington.

5434. Reading your note, which is forcefully drafted, one would say that you disapproved both of the announcement and of the scheme that has emanated from that announcement?—Need I say anything about the announcement?

5435. No, I do not think it is necessary for me to ask you more than to answer that point. You have already said that, I think?—Personally I have said that I disapprove of the principle enunciated in the announcement. What was the other part of the question?

5436. And the scheme which has emanated from the announcement?—Yes, the scheme in the Report.

5437. Would you say that, while you disagree with the announcement and the scheme, the present political position of India not only justifies, but demands an appreciable political advance?—Certainly.

5438. And at a very early date?—As soon as possible.

5439. The scheme which you would prefer of all others is the scheme which has been developed by the Indo-British Association?—Yes. I am open to consider a better one.

5440. But that scheme, if I remember aright—I ask you subject to correction—is quite a different scheme to the one proposed by the Local Governments?—It is pretty much like it. What are the differences?

5441. The scheme of the Indo-British Association, broadly, is to take certain areas in Provinces in India and Indianize them?—I am talking of the scheme put forward the other day on the Bill.

5442. Not the first scheme?—No, not the first scheme; I have nothing to say about that. When I say I adopt the scheme of the Association I mean the scheme which was published the other day, of which you have a copy.

5443. I have not that scheme in my mind at the moment. You say it is more or less on the lines of Local Governments?—Yes.

5444. You do not agree with that original scheme as a method of political development, taking certain areas?—After the publication of the present Bill the Association has not put that forward.

5445. Now I will come to the point of the dual system which is really the aspect of the scheme which you have the greatest mistrust of—is it not so?—It is the one I have studied most. I mistrust it all.

5446. As regards the dual scheme, you are very anxious to see if development takes place, whatever Government is presiding over a Province should be a unitary Government?—Yes.

5447. A unitary Government both in point of discussion and in point of decision?—Yes.

5448. And you think that discussion and decision of a unitary Government is quite compatible under Indian conditions with the responsibility to a Legislative Council?—Yes.

5449. You said just now that a Governor would have to be a very skilful man to conduct affairs in future?—The Governor of an Indian Province has always wanted a good deal of skill, I think.

5450. And he will have imposed upon him additional burdens whatever happens now which will require that skill to a great degree?—Yes.

5451. Would you be prepared, with a unitary system of government, to give a very wide discretion to the Governor?—Yes.

5452. Would you be prepared to give him a discretion to the extent of ensuring that those subjects which are to be dealt with by Ministers under Indian administration should obtain their end after full discussion and decision in the Government?—Unless it were under Section 50, or something of that kind. It is in the Report itself that the Governor is not a constitutional Governor.

5453. Not even under the diarchic system?—Under the Montagu-Chelmsford Report he is not a constitutional monarch even in transferred subjects.

5454. If questions of law and order come in he can interpose?—And there may be others.

5455. Would you say that if those members of a Government became accustomed to sitting round a table that in probably 99 cases out of 100 they would come to their conclusions by agreement?—Yes.

5456. I suppose you feel that they would be much more likely to come to those conclusions by agreement if they all sat together than if they sat, as it were, in water-tight compartments by themselves?—Certainly.

5457. But there might be that hundredth case of a somewhat vital question of policy, and there you would give the discretion to the Governor, after full discussion, to give the final decision?—Yes.

5458. Would not such a scheme in broad outline realise all that is wanted and all that is aimed at in a diarchic system?—I think it would. I think it would be the best way of achieving the object we all have in view.

5459. When people say that they will not make the Minister responsible to the Legislative Council, would you agree that they are somewhat forgetful for the moment that the Legislative Council is going to undergo a very radical change in that it is going to have two-thirds of an elected membership?—Yes, I think that is so; and I think we have to remember that responsibility on paper is a very different thing indeed from responsibility in fact.

5460. Let us get to the responsibility in fact quite apart from paper—a Legislative Assembly with a two-thirds majority elected—a unified Government with some transferred subjects being decided upon against the wishes of that Council?—It will not be a subject which will be transferred.

5461. I am taking the extreme case of a unified Government making a decision on a transferred subject which did not meet with the agreement of the Legislative Council?—Of course, when you say a transferred subject you mean a subject which would be transferred under the dual Government?

5462. Yes?—Then my answer is yes.

5463. One of the subjects which Lord Sinha put to you would always be in the hands of an Indian Minister probably?—Yes.

5464. Would

5464. Would you say that a Government composed like that and with a Legislative Council composed like that, in practice the former could continue to resist the latter—that the Government could resist the wishes of the Legislative Council?—Not if those wishes were reasonable; were such to commend themselves, say, to Parliament. If they went quite off the rails I think the Legislative Council would come to grief and lose its power, but if they proceeded on reasonable lines I think it is inevitable that their powers would grow a great deal.

5465. And their decision would prevail?—And their decision would prevail.

5466. You would say to that extent that the Legislative Council, composed as it is, would have a very powerful influence on a unified Government composed as it is under this scheme?—I think it would.

5467. It would have a very potent influence upon a unified Government?—Yes.

5468. Now I will ask you one question about the Secretary of State. You are very apprehensive as regards the powers which are being given to the Secretary of State?—Yes.

5469. What are the particular powers that the Secretary of State is to have over and above what he has enjoyed in the past that you are apprehensive of?—He can limit the powers of Parliament, cannot he? I am speaking from memory.

Sir J. D. Rees.

5470. Clause 23?—"The Secretary of State in Council may, notwithstanding anything in the principal Act, by rule regulate and restrict the exercise of the powers of superintendence, direction and control, vested in the Secretary of State, the Secretary of State in Council, and the Governor-General in Council."

Lord Islington.

5471. The Secretary of State in Council may do this?—Yes; and the Secretary of State, I understand, in this matter represents Parliament.

5472. The Secretary of State represents Parliament in this Bill, as the Secretary of State has been the intermediary between the Government of India and Parliament in the past?—Yes, but I understand the effect of this Clause 23 is to give the Secretary of State power to limit the powers of Parliament

5473. I do not think that is the case. I will not take you into an examination of that. The Secretary of State has to be the agent of Parliament, just as every other Minister is the agent of Parliament over other Departments. Would you say that the power that has hitherto existed in the hands of the Government of India should remain in the hands of the Government of India rather than in the hands of the Secretary of State, or that they should be in the Secretary of State rather than in the hands of the Government of India?—The outside observer does not know much about the relations between the Secretary of State and the Government of India.

5474. You are not prepared to answer questions upon that?—It is a personal question really. Sometimes it is the Viceroy and sometimes it is the Secretary. Go back over the last ten years and think who were Viceroys and who were Secretaries of State. Was Lord Minto in the same position as Lord Curzon?

5475. I do not ask you with regard to the person occupying office, but from the point of view of the machinery of the Government?—The machinery of the Government comes down to individual questions in cases of that kind.

5476. You would not be prepared to say more than that upon it?—No, I would rather not.

Mr. Bennett.

5477. You said from your experience as a judge of the Calcutta High Court that you found that caste entered into every conceivable action. Are you aware whether in the Legislature it would be the same thing—whether caste enters into every conceivable action of the Legislatures in India?—I fancy so. It enters into everything else.

5478. Do you remember any indications of it? Did you hear while you lived in Calcutta that caste entered in any degree into the operations of the Corporation?—Yes.

5479. Do you remember how—in what particular matter?—You are driving me into such personal matters. So-and-So is appointed to such a position because of his caste. Oh, yes, there is no doubt about it.

Major Ormsby-Gore.

5480. You have said that the Indo-British Association's recommendations which you support follow closely the lines of the recommendations of the five dissentiate Local Governments, and I think you added of the Government of Bombay?—Yes.

5481. You refer to the late Government of Bombay, not the present Government of Bombay?—The Government that put forward that Report published in the Blue-book that I have.

5482. We have a minute from the present Governor of Bombay saying that he would prefer what he calls an imperfect scheme passed quickly and now to a reopening of the whole question?—I find that I am not quite up-to-date with my knowledge of publications.

5483. You are thinking of Lord Willingdon's original speech?—I am thinking of the Blue-book called a Letter from the Government of India. It is the letter from the Government of Bombay dated 11th November, 1918, which was published about five days before the second reading of the Bill. It was kept back for nearly a year—nine months.

5484. You say under a diarchy you think the personal position of the Governor will be very difficult?—Yes.

5485. Will not the Governor have in his mind that normally on all the proposed transferred subjects he will take the advice of his Ministers, and that normally on the reserved subjects he will take the advice of his Executive Council?—Yes.

5486. And that he would only depart from that advice on either side of the Government for very exceptional reasons?—Yes.

5487. Do you think that that would be a very difficult position for him?—Very.

5488. Why?—Supposing things overlap.

5489. But do they overlap?—Yes, all subjects overlap; that is brought out very fully by the Government of India. They have gone into it very fully, and they are a much greater authority than I am.

5490. Do you think they do overlap to such an extent that in practice it will be necessary to have something approaching a unitary form of government?—Yes.

5491. That is to say, the two Executive Councils, the official side of the Government and the Ministers will in practice have to work together and deliberate together in the Governor's presence and settle any differences among themselves?—I think they will have to agree together.

5492. That is the point I wanted to get. Now you said the political genius of the Indian people still remains to be developed. Is it not your experience that there is a great deal of political talk and political discussion and political thinking in India?—The amount of political talk is overwhelming; the amount of thinking is not so large.

5493. And you would say that that political talk—I will not go into the question whether there is any thought behind it—is developing on Western lines?—It is copying Western lines. I do not think it is developing at all. I think myself it is sterile.

5495. In fact your point of view is that you would feel inclined to reject anything that an Indian put forward unless it differed from Western examples?—Not at all. It might be distinctively Indian, and also distinctively Western; it might be universal. I do not say that Western methods are necessarily bad for India; they may be in accordance with the genius of India, but at present the genius of India has not had a chance.

5496. Can you help me to get an idea of what you mean by the genius of India?—It is very difficult. It exists I am certain; I have no doubt it exists.

5497. And you think that Indian politicians do not give expression to it?—I think they do not.

5498. That is to say that Indian genius is quite inarticulate at present?—As far as I know, quite. What we hear is an echo of what we think.

5499. You say it is difficult to get Indians to originate anything?—Yes. The remark is a commonplace one.

5500. You mean they have no literature of their own, no art of their own, none of the distinctive things by which we recognise a distinct civilisation?—It is rather a wide question. I think I should be inclined to answer it yes without going into detail.

5501. You said it is so difficult to get them to originate anything. It is a very wide statement. I wanted to know what you had in your mind?—I answered your question, Yes.

5502. What do you think is the test of political capacity—do you think literacy is?—Success.

5503. Success in practice?—Yes.

5504. That is the only test?—Well, yes.

5505. And therefore we cannot possibly tell whether Indians will be successful politically until we have tried them?—No, and I would try them. I say I would put every Indian I could into a place; I would put many Indians into places for which they were not really fit in order to try them; I would keep on trying them. I think they should be tried in every way, and I think they are being tried in a good many.

5506. But you would not put them in positions of responsibility?—Yes, certainly, of course I would. I have sat with my colleagues in positions of very great responsibility; I mean their responsibility was as great as mine certainly.

5507. But acting under the orders of the Government of India? You would not put them in positions of political responsibility without that?—Yes I would; I would make them Under-Secretary; I would make them Secretary of State. I thoroughly approve of that.

5508. With regard to caste, you said your experience of India is limited to Bengal?—Yes.

5509. And that your views on caste that you arrived at first hand were not quite the same as the views you got from books?—I did not say that. I think I said caste was much more stringent in other parts of India than in Bengal. I suppose it would be in the United Provinces and in Madras.

5510. You have heard that the question of caste presents less difficulty in Bengal than in other Provinces?—Well, more difficulty in other Provinces than in Bengal. It presents plenty in Bengal. It is always getting in the way.

5511. Do you think that even in Bengal it will be an obstacle to the working of the Legislative Council?—Yes.

5512. And an obstacle to Ministers in their relations to that Legislative Council?—Yes. What high caste man would like to take orders from a low caste one? None!

5513. So you think in practice it will be impossible to appoint as Minister responsible to an Indian Legislative Council any man who is not of high caste?—No, I do not think it will be impossible; I think it will be possible. Personally I am opposed to caste, and I can say so because I think I may say I have always loyally accepted its existence and conditions. Of course, I am opposed to caste. Every Englishman is. As regards the attitude of the Government of India, do you mean to oppose caste or do you not? If you do you will fail.

5514. You left India in 1914 and you have not been there since?—That is so.

5515. Towards the end of your time in India did you notice that political activities were in any way tending to mitigate the rigour of caste distinctions in social relations and in party politics?—No.

Lord Sydenham.

5516. The announcement of the 20th August gave a promise of the gradual development of self-governing institutions with a view to progressive realisation of responsible government in India. Do you think that that necessarily means that self-governing institutions and responsible government are to begin and go on pari passu?—No, responsible government is the object aimed at.

5517. And might be reached by intermediate stages in which what you call technical responsible government did not exist?—Certainly.

5518. Do you think that that announcement, as I have read it, absolutely demands the Bill as it stands in its present form?—No.

5519. Do you know of any case in which what is technically called responsible government is granted bit by bit?—Of course, that throws one back to the consideration of Colonial Governments, and I do not think I can quite answer the question. I do not remember any such system. In Canada it came straight away, in 1837, what passed for responsible government then. In the case of Jamaica they have always been going backwards and forwards. Nobody has ever known of a diarchic government, of course.

5520. The justification of the diarchy is that it is a convenient mode of giving responsible government in driblets?—Yes.

5521. You say you think diarchy is not workable?—Yes.

5522. Do you think the diarchic form of government contemplated in the Bill gives any real training in responsible government in the Dominions sense?—No.

5523. Is not it a fundamental principle of Cabinet government wherever it has been tried that there should be a shared responsibility, and that a united front should be presented to Parliament?—That is what I have always understood.

5524. And you do not think that the progressive increase of power given to Indians is incompatible with a unitary government?—Oh, no, not at all.

5525. I think you agree that the difficulties of a Governor must be extraordinarily great when his only control over part of his Cabinet resides either in dismissing a Minister or in the exercise of some veto subsequently over what the Minister does?—Yes; it seems to me it puts the Governor in a very difficult position.

5526. Is it not sometimes necessary in India to do things which are not popular among certain classes?—Constantly.

5527. You know well there are defects in the police forces?—Yes.

5528. Due partly to inadequate pay and partly to inadequate supervision. No one knows that better than you do?—That is so.

5529. Do you think that the reforms which may be necessary to remedy those evils, and will cost money, are ever likely to be popular with the elected majority?—No.

5530. Supposing that a popular Minister brings in a Bill of which the Executive strongly disapproves, will not the position of the Executive in that Legislative Assembly be somewhat degrading?—Yes. I think constant difficulties of that kind will occur, because the opposition between Ministers and Councillors will always be a matter of notoriety.

5531. Is the Executive Council in such a State to criticise its own quasi colleagues before the Legislative Council, and to be defeated in the end, or ought they to remain silent and say nothing?—The Government of India wishes them to remain silent. I understand the Report wishes the dissentients to say what they do not think and loyally to support that which they do not believe in.

5532. Do not you really think that the effect of the diarchy must be to bring the British element into dislike and contempt?—Yes, I think it will. There will be a constant and growing opposition against them.

5533. And, possibly, a growing dislike, because they might have to do things which would not be popular with the more vocal classes?—They will, no doubt, have all the unpopular things to do.

5534. Do you think that a Legislative Council based on the great new electorates, which are proposed and composed largely of illiterate and extraordinarily credulous people, can for many years really represent the wishes of the people of India?—No.

5535. As regards the Provinces, I understand that you are strongly in favour of a unitary government, which is proposed by the five Provincial Governors?—Yes.

5536. With

5536. With a unitary government there would be no transferred subjects, of course, but Indians would hold portfolios as they have always done from the first?—Yes.

5537. As regards the Government of India, do you agree with Lord Curzon that nothing should be done to weaken its authority at the present moment?—Certainly.

5538. I think you were a member of the Senate of the Calcutta University?—Yes.

5539. Sir Michael Sadler gave us his opinion that all education should be transferred under the diarchic system. Do you accept that view?—No. I find it difficult to say anything about education. My only connection with it was my membership of the Senate, and the part which I attended to was the education in law; and the law education of the young Bengali was grotesquely bad.

5540. Is not Indian influence in the University of Calcutta—as it was in Bombay—very great already?—In my time I think I may say that there was no other. It is entirely Indian.

5541. Is not the law school which you have said was deplorably bad practically controlled entirely by Indians?—Well, I was on a Board, or something; there were two barristers who were Europeans with me; but we did not exercise much influence.

5542. Do you consider that such very great changes as the handing over of very large powers to the Provincial Governments—that is, the decentralisation part—the grant of an elected majority in their Legislative Councils, the large electorates which are to be set up, and the control of all municipalities and local boards by elected members, would make a most substantial advance in the direction of self-government in India?—It seems to me an advance which is alarming, and one to cause considerable anxiety, because it goes so far; but I think it is an advance which, relying on ourselves and our good intentions, and the good intentions of the Indians, should be made. I think it makes a large call on the patriotism both of the Indians and of ourselves; but I think it should be made—that kind of advance.

5543. You regard those great changes to which I have referred as practically the safe limit of orderly government in India at the present moment?—Yes.

5544. With these large Legislative Councils is it not certain that they will exercise great influence on all Government affairs?—Yes; I suppose so. That is the opinion of the Government of India, and still more the opinion of Sir Sankaran Nair.

5545. Would not the Government be most unlikely to take any measures which were opposed by a large majority in the Council, unless it was thought that those measures were demanded in order to keep order, or unless those measures were opposed by a large amount of outside Indian opinion?—I think that is certainly so. They would not undertake any such measures except in cases of urgent necessity.

5546. You are aware that in some cases the opinion in the Legislative Councils of the elected members is not shared and is opposed by Indians outside?—Yes.

5547. And a Governor, therefore, has generally to consider not only the opinion in the Council, but independent Indian opinion from the outside?—Yes.

5548. Do you think that the responsible government system on the Dominion lines, such as is proposed to be established and as demanded within 15 years, would last in India if the British authority were removed?—No, I do not think it would.

5549. And therefore the system we are setting up is being forced upon India by British authority and would have to be maintained, if it is to last, by British authority?—Anything like a Colonial system would.

5550. A responsible government system?—Yes, I think it would.

Sir J. D. Rees.

5551. You spoke of your 12 years' service in India as being spent in Bengal. Should I be right in limiting that to Calcutta?—Yes.

5552. Have you had any experience of Indian life either in shooting or in travelling or anything else? Have you sat down in the villages anywhere, and have you any first-hand acquaintance with life in Bengal?—I always tried to when I could. I tried to see all I could of the districts and so on.

5553. Have you sat down in the villages for any purpose?—I have not had any duties to do there. I have gone there for my own pleasure.

5554. May I ask have you spoken at first-hand with the natives of Bengal? Are you familiar with any of their languages?—No.

5555. What exactly do you mean—what is the signification of your statement that you found in India that caste entered into everything. I mean, speaking as a judge in Calcutta without experience of village life or country life, subject to those limitations, what is the meaning of your statement that you found caste in everything?—Even at the distance that I sit from village life it was apparent that caste had the greatest possible influence in everything—everything that I came across.

5556. That is in the cases that came before you—you came to that conclusion?—In the business which I saw transacted of various kinds.

5557. What business does the High Court do other than hearing cases and dealing with its own administrative staff?—It superintends its subordinate Courts.

5558. That is judicial business, I take it?—I should have thought that was administrative.

5559. I am only trying to fix your evidence to these particular points, which you would wish to fix it to as being those with which you are most familiar. I am not quite clear from what you said—is this all-pervading influence, which you learn through the records of cases, all bad?—I do not say it is all bad. It is overwhelmingly bad. I suppose it has got good points.

5560. You have said that the great difficulty in connection with caste was that men of high caste were not willing to take orders from men of low caste. Do you adhere to that statement?—Yes.

5561. Have you ever found that the judgment of a judge belonging to a low caste was impaired in any way or became less binding because he belonged to a particular caste?—It was not so well thought of by some people.

5562. Was it enforced?—Of course it was; but one wants judgments to be accepted.

5564. In what way?—The judgment is not so much respected if it comes from a low-caste judge.

5565. Not so much respected by whom?—By the people whom it affects.

5566. But they have to carry it out? Yes, people have to carry out things which they do not respect, and they have to carry out things which they do not accept.

5567. Is it the function of a judge to pass judgment which has to be respected or a judgment which deals with the points at issue?—The judgment is to proceed according to law, but it is much better that a judgment should be generally accepted than that it should excite hostility.

5568. Arising out of that, may I ask you do you lay it down therefore that judges and persons in authority should invariably be persons of the highest caste?—No.

5569. Can you reconcile your position, which seems to be somewhat inconsistent? What would you do if you were in power and could do these things?—I should appoint the best man.

5570. Irrespective of his caste?—I hope so. Influence, of course, would be brought to bear the other way, I know, and what I should do I do not know. What I ought to do is to appoint the best man.

5571. I leave you on the horns of that dilemma?—Excuse me, I accept one horn—I should appoint the best man.

5572. I suggested the difficulty was rather, upon your premises, in deciding who would be the best man. Now I ask you this as a judge for the moment; I am glad to have the opportunity, because you can give an authoritative answer. It was stated here the other day by a witness that it was necessary—he did absolutely say that it was necessary to the legality of a marriage in his caste, he being a non-Brahmin—that that a Brahmin should be present at the wedding. Is there any such obligation for a legal marriage in India?—I should rather like to hear the question argued before me before giving a decision.

5573. But I ask you does the British law in India makes necessary the presence of any person of any religion at a marriage?—Curia advisere vult—I cannot give an offhand opinion.

5574. Then you said just now that the education given in law was extremely bad?—Grotesquely bad, some of it.

5575. May I ask you whether under that system, whatever it is—and I am not competent to criticise it—there have not been turned out all over India a band of extremely capable lawyers?—You will not ask me to criticise members of my own profession, but what I have said is that in some cases the education is grotesquely bad. I do not at all wish to say it all is. If I said it all was I take it back. I say that the great part of it is or was grotesquely bad. I do not say that of all education. Some of it is very good.

5576. Then you do qualify it?—Yes.

5577. Would you say of the people of India, seeing that men have risen from assistant magistrates to be members of the Viceroy's Council, that they generally show an extreme capacity for learning law?—Do not ask me that.

5578. You are familiar with the European community in Calcutta, which is a large and an important commmunty?—Yes.

5579. Would you say that they are all or generally opposed altogether to reforms of the description dealt with in the Bill? Can you speak to that?—I would rather that you asked that of a representative of the Association.

5580. Will you tell me this: What is your opinion of the effect of the Bill, if it becomes law in this form, upon investments in India——upon investments of capital in India? Do you think it would prejudice them?—I should be sorry to give anybody public advice on that matter. I would rather you asked a stockbroker.

Viscount Midleton.] Is that a proper question, Lord Selborne?

Sir J. D. Rees.] The witness has been speaking generally, and not as a judge upon the effects of this Bill. I submit my question was quite relevant to the case.

Chairman.] I think he is quite entitled not to answer it.

Sir J. D. Rees.

5581. (To the Witness.) I should like to ask you this: You have criticised the provisions of this Bill, but you have not referred very much to the safeguards which mask or limit the advances made in the direction of responsibility. Are they, in your opinion, generally satisfactory and effective or not?—I am not quite certain what you are referring to.

5582. There are various safeguards which give the power of veto, let us say?—I am in favour of certain provisions. I am in favour of a veto power.

5583. Do you think the safeguards provided are satisfactory against too rapid an advance?—I am not very familiar with the Bill. I am sorry. I explained I have not had an opportunity of getting up the Bill sufficiently to be cross-examined on it. I have come here at very short notice.

5584. In answer to Question 3 you say, "I do not think that members of Provincial Governments should have as much power of controlling the actions and policy of the Executive as the Houses of Parliament have." Do you mean Provincial Governments or Legislatures there?—Legislatures.

5585. In answer to Question 5 you say, "I do not believe that Councillors and Ministers could loyally defend measures of which it is known that they disapproved." Is not that rather a usual incident? Is it not almost inevitable in political life?—I hope not.

5586. Lord Sydenham asked you a question about the police. He attributed their faults to inferior pay and insufficient supervision, and then asked you——

Lord Sydenham.] I beg your pardon. I did not attribute all their faults. I said there were defects in the police which were due to those two causes.

Sir J. D. Rees.

5587. I do not know that it is exactly and immediately relevant, but you did answer that question?—I have forgotten the question.

5588. He asked you to accept the position that the faults of the police are due?——

Chairman.] I do not think that question was ever asked. It was one of those statements which some of us make.

Sir J. D. Rees.] Then if it were not I do not wish to ask any question about it.

The Witness.] I do not think I have expressed any opinion about the police themselves.

Sir J. D. Rees.

5589. You referred to certain advantages which Brahmins have in pleading cases before the Bench: am I right in supposing that that is what you said?—No.

5590. Can you explain what you said in that behalf exactly. You said something like it?—I think a man would get work because he is a Brahmin. I think it would help him to get work.

5591. To get cases?—Yes.

5592. It would not help him in the conduct of cases before the Bench?—I hope not.

5593. But do you think it would?—Not in my Court, no. Certainly not.

5594. I understood you to say—please correct me if I am wrong—that the Indian political genius was not expressed by the Indian politician at the present time: is that correct?—Yes.

5595. That is so?—Yes.

5596. I mean, that is your statement?—Yes, that is my statement.

5597. Upon that I should like to ask you this: by whom is the political genius of the Indians to be expressed, and who is to judge of the expression? Who is to judge whether it is or is not a proper expression?—I do not know who will express it; I hope somebody will.

5598. But is the suggestion that the expression of Indian political genius is to be a true expression when it is approved by the Indo-British Association or a Judge of the High Court, a European or anybody?—Everybody.

5599. How is it to be judged?—By everybody concerned.

5600. The people themselves are mostly concerned?—Yes.

5601. How do you get at it? How do you decide? If you commit yourself to a statement like that it would be very interesting to know what would be the true expression of Indian opinion, and how you would know when it was true?—By the man attracting Indian support—by the leader attracting and keeping Indian support, which has never yet happened.

5602. Not Mr. Gokhale?—No.

5603. Nor Mr. Banerjea?—Which Mr. Banerjea?

5604. Mr. Sarendranath Banerjea?—No. He has professed every kind of opinion. He has constantly attracted support, but he attracts support by his personality, not by his consistency.

5605. I ventured to suggest to you two of the most prominent Indians?—I consider they are not representative of Indian genius.

5606. Do you know that the provisions of this Bill to which exception is chiefly taken by the extremer section of Indian politicians are the provisions which provide for safeguards in the Bill?—I have not made myself acquainted with the recent expression of opinion of those bodies, because there is no means of doing so. The proceedings before this Committee are not really reported at all. I wish they could be. One cannot get hold of them. I do not know what has been said. I have tried to find out, but I cannot.

5607. I was going to ask you upon that. Upon such knowledge of the Bill as you have—you yourself have expressed some limitations—are you in a position to say that the safeguards existing in it are not sufficient to maintain the essential position of British power in India?

India?—Supposing the contents of the Bill to be substantially those of the Report, my answer is that they are not sufficient. The safeguards provided in the Report, are, I consider, insufficient.

5608. Do you know that their existence is considered by the extremer branch of politicians to condemn the whole scheme as not being sufficiently thorough?—Yes.

5609. You have lived in Calcutta for twelve years. You frequented the Bengal Club, for instance?—Yes.

5610. I take that as being characteristic—just as in England one might speak of the Carlton Club. Taking the opinion of the European community of Calcutta, do you think that amongst them there is or is not coming into existence a feeling that some liberalising of the system of government in India is either desirable or inevitable?—Yes

5611. That feeling is growing?—Yes. It is my opinion. Of course, I may see it where it does not exist; but it is my opinion, and I think it is other people's opinion, too.

5612. It is your opinion?—Yes. I am inclined to say so as much as I can.

5613. At the same time, holding that opinion, are you in a position altogether to accept what is known as the Indo-British Scheme?—Yes.

5614. You can do both?—Of course I can. I should not accept that scheme unless I thought it was of that kind; and, what is more, I should not accept it unless I thought it was much more of that kind than the official scheme.

5615. Am I right in supposing that, while you express a desire that the Indo-British Scheme should be accepted, in the course of cross-examination by Lord Sinha you did say that you accepted and approved that division of functions which goes by the name of diarchy?—No. If I said that, it was Lord Sinha's art, and not my intention. It was not my intention to say that. I do not approve of that division.

5616. You say some liberalism is required. Would you hand over all functions, or what would be your way?—I have already said the scheme of the five heads you may take as the basis of it, and the Bombay Government and the Indo-British Association—they are all very much on the same lines. Of course, the Indo-British Association could not speak until it knew the opinions of the local Governors, consequently it could not speak till a very recent period.

Sir Henry Craik.

5617. You say you disapprove of dual government?—Yes.

5618. You mentioned, as an alternative to that, a unified government. What do you mean by that? Do you mean the negative of diarchy—that the Government should remain in Civil Service hands?—I mean the sort of Government that we are accustomed to.

5619. It is not an alternative you have; but you do not wish to see the introduction of this new and untried system of dualism?—Yes; I wish to proceed along the road on which we are.

5621. But would you have a certain assignment of the different branches of administration between what may be called the popular and the official element?—I would leave it to the Governor to assign certain portfolios to the different members of his Council, some of whom would be ex hypothesi Indians. I would leave it to him.

5622. But you would not assign any branches of the administration to the hands of the popular element?—I think I would not do it by law. I would leave the Governor to distribute the offices as he saw fit, and in that way you might see how Indian ability worked out in various spheres.

5623. Is not that possible at present?—Yes.

5624. Does that involve any change?—Only a very small change; I do not think it does involve a change.

In Bengal, at all events, the numbers of Indians and Europeans are unequal. There are two English and one Indian.

5625. Would it be possible to develop responsibility by both assigning a certain number of subjects and attaching responsibility so that any unpopularity may be borne by the Minister in charge of it?—That will be done if the Governor makes over a certain portfolio to one of his Ministers, who is responsible for doing that business. He is responsible without any enactment that he is to be.

5626. Do you contemplate that in that way the Ministers would be able to act together as a Cabinet as we understand it?—I think they would learn how to act together.

5627. But how are they to learn? Surely it is not learning any advance in politics to be able to surrender principles which you hold strongly, in order simply that you may bring about agreement in the Cabinet? That is not political advancement?—No, certainly not.

5628. When I hear it said that the Cabinet will learn to be of one opinion and to bring forward some policy, how can we accept that, when we are told that there is a fundamental difference between the popular view and the official view? How are you to bridge that over except by one or the other giving up their principles?—I do not see how you can under a system of diarchy.

5629. Under any system—under a unified system?—Under a unified system I should hope to get the Indians and the Europeans agreeing. That is the end to be aimed at—so to select your officials that they would agree.

5630. That means that you either adopt official Members, who will sink the previous opinions, or that you adopt Indian Members who will submit to the official view. If that difficulty exists is not your path towards political responsibility much more clear and certain, if you assign separate functions and separate responsibility, not under a dual system at all, but by assigning certain Provinces of Government to native control and administration, and try them on a limited sphere and then let that sphere be enlarged? Is not that a fundamentally different path, and is it not a better path than this division which is trying to bring about a semblance of unity which will not exist?—I should like a completely unitary system in which one man might be put to one job and another man to another job.

5631. Even although they fundamentally disagree on broad lines of policy?—If course, it would be for the Governor to try to see they do not disagree and yet retain their individuality.

5632. How can the Governor see that they are to agree? He may tell them to do such and such a thing, but he cannot make them agree?—No; he may point out a compromise; he can point out where they should agree.

5633. Supposing they say: "We do not, will not, and cannot agree." Is it not the only way of giving them the real function of government to say, "This is your sphere; make the best of it you can, and we will keep other spheres for ourselves"?—That is dualism, as I understand it, is it not?

5634. No, it is not. Dualism, as I understand it, means the setting up of a government which is to have two branches which are more or less to run on separate courses, but to be responsible each for the doings of the other. Is it not much better to say how far you are prepared to trust the popular or the Indian element, and give them that limit of independent responsibility and administration?—I think I would not like to tie the Governor's hands beforehand. I should like to see him do his best to get his Indians and his Europeans together. I should like to see him succeed in doing it, and then gradually increase the power of the Indians as far as was practicable. Eventually the administration would become entirely Indian.

5635. You perhaps remember the letter of the Government of India which said there were two methods—a vertical and a horizontal division?—Yes.

5636. And that they wished the vertical instead of the horizontal. You would take the horizontal and give them certain large functions of government? Has it not been the case that responsible government in the West has very much developed from local government being being broadened and widened and made more independent?—My knowledge of other countries is not sufficient to enable me to answer that, I am afraid. Arising out of what you have just asked me, you nearly touched the point, but not quite. We talk of representative government, and we used to talk about limited monarchy, and then about representative government, and we have now to talk about responsible government; at different times we speak of government by its characteristic features. A feature which seems to have been overlooked is the existence of party. In England we have always managed to have two parties, and in that way we have been able to make a unitary government on one side or the other. The triumph of English organisation in India would be if we could induce the Indians to form party government on two lines, on leading and sound principles. That is a matter of which there is no notice at all in the Report or elsewhere, but unless the Indians can develop some satisfactory system of party government I think they will fail to establish any representative government.

Lord Brodrick (Viscount Midleton).

5637. In your last answer but one to Sir Henry Craik you sketched the power of the Governor to try and bring both parties together. Surely you would be then giving exactly what you yourself have objected to—power without responsibility. How will you make the Indian Ministers responsible on a variety of subjects on which they may not have seen eye to eye but are not actually in opposition?—You cannot very well. I think the question of responsibility will settle itself.

5638. Can it settle itself from your point of view except on the lines suggested by Sir Henry Craik, transferring some definte subjects to its Ministers?—Permanently to Indian Ministers? Yes, I think it can. The time would come when the majority of the Legislative Council would say to an Indian Minister, "You have no business to be in this Government, because you are doing something we disapprove of."

5639. Will that time come more quickly if all the subjects are mixed up or if they are given definite subjects to administer?—I do not know.

5640. You recognise that on a division of subjects everything is left very hazy as regards responsibility?—I do not think it is very much use attempting to define responsibility. As I say, I think it will all settle itself. Indians will respond to the pressure of opinion in the Legislative Council, or possibly outside it, or they will not. That depends on the Indians and how much they will respond and how much they will not. I do not know. It remains to be seen. It is one of the things we have to find out.

5641. You have criticised the proposals of the Bill a good deal. There is a certain unrest at present. Do you expect less unrest and friction or more unrest and friction if the Bill is passed in its present form?—I expect unrest and friction for an indefinite period. I think the Bill in its present form will promote it.

5642. In an answer to Lord Islington you discussed Clause 23 of the Bill. You were understood to say before that you regarded that clause as dangerous?—Yes.

5643. I think you used the expression "a bad example, a bad precedent to the Indian Legislative Assemblies"?—Yes.

5644. Is that because the Act is liable to be modified by the rules?—Because the whole law may be modified by the rules. The Secretary of State may, by rule, regulate the exercise of the powers vested in the Secretary of State, the Secretary of State in Council and the Governor-General in Council. That goes outside the limits of this Act; it affects its powers under the Government of India Act.

5645. You think if that system were adopted more generally there might be a tendency in Indian Bills to put in a similar provision, namely, that the Government could do by rule what they ought to do by Statute?—Yes.

5646. Is that done to any large extent in Indian legislation at present?—I am not prepared to answer that question, I am afraid. My natural inclination is to turn for an answer to Lord Sinha. I cannot say how far the process of making laws by rule has proceeded in India.

5647. You would not regard that as a democratic movement? It is rather a return to autocracy, is it not?—It seems to me to be democratic. As far as I understand democracy and from what one sees, the Executive in democracy takes more and more power to itself. Democracy is hostile to liberty.

5648. It is really withdrawing power from Parliament and centreing more power in the Ministry?—Yes, that is democracy itself. We are nowadays democratic, and it is what we are doing and it is what is asked should be done. But, however, whether it is democratic or not, I disapprove of it.

5649. In view of these changes, in whatever form they take place, do you regard the maintenance of the supremacy of the British Parliament under the Secretary of State as being important?—Yes.

5651. We have heard a great deal of the educational value of the franchise; do you attach great importance to that or to the development of other forms of education?—I think that there is much in the Report about political education which is defective and rather imaginary. I have to do with education in other places, and I think we constantly find that we suppose we can teach people anything we like, and as we like, forgetting that people have to learn, and we may very well mean to teach them one thing and they will learn quite a different thing. I think these political devices which are intended to make them adepts at responsible government may very likely, and I think certainly will, have quite a different tendency; I do not know what, but a tendency we can none of us foresee.

5652. Do you think the law courts have a great educational value in India?—I hope so.

5653. They attract great interest and large attendance?—Too much interest.

5654. You would like to transfer to politics some of the interest now centred in the law?—Well——

Chairman.

5655. I want to apologise for the shortness of your notice, but your name was given to us weeks ago as being willing to give evidence, and it never occurred to me that you would not be prepared?—I do not wish to complain. I do wish to excuse myself for not being better prepared, but I did not get the questions till Thursday or Friday last, and I had two half-days only in which to consider them and to answer them.

5656. The questions are not everything. Would you furnish us with the last edition of the views of the Indo-British Association?—Certainly.

5657. I do not think the one you have referred to has been circulated?—It has been circulated to every Member of Parliament, I think.

5658. I have had the original one—more than one copy has been sent to me—but not the last one?—I will certainly inquire. I am afraid we have not dated it. We published one about three or four weeks ago as soon as we had had time to consider the Bill and the opinions.

5659. You will put that in?—Yes, I will send a copy.

5660. I think you have made the foundation of your position perfectly clear, but I should like to repeat it in order to make quite sure that I understand it. The view held by too many Englishmen that their particular form of government is suited to all the nations of the earth is a superstition?—Yes.

5661. Unfortunately the leaders of public thought in India have accepted that superstition at its face value?—Yes.

5662. Consequently, from both English and Indian directions the impetus has been towards the development of self-government in India on Western lines?—Yes.

5663. And you regard that as a great misfortune?—It is inevitable; and I do not like saying that what is inevitable is a misfortune; but it gives rise to great difficulty.

5664. You look forward some day that the true genius of India will assert itself, and she will point out for herself that form of government that suits her best?—Yes.

5665. Now what I want to ask you is this: Is the way to that evolution in any way closed by the provisions of the Bill as you see them?—Yes.

5666. Why?—As imposing English ideas on India which will stop the development of Indian ideas.

5667. Can you make a suggestion for leaving the road free where you think it closed?—Yes.

5668. How?—The adoption of the scheme suggested by the Indo-British Association, by the Government of Bombay and by the five heads of Provinces.

5669. Why would that leave the way more free for Indian genius to exert itself than the scheme of the Bill? That is a purely Western conception?—We have to start from a Western conception because there is no other, but that scheme is framed to tie them down to responsible government as we understand it at this moment, or as we did understand it before the war. Things have changed since the beginning of the war. The English Constitution is always changing.

5670. I may be very stupid, but I do not see how this Bill closes the road to India's own evolution any more than the scheme of the five heads of Governments?—We have to accept representative government, have we not, practically? We have to accept it. The Indo-British scheme offers a path which is at all events smoother, less liable to excite improper party feeling and faction, and therefore more likely to lead the Indian to think chiefly of the good administration of his country—the good and unselfish administration of his country.

5671. The scheme of the five Governments and of the Indo-British Association is a scheme for leading Indians to representative government by the road of a unitary Executive?—Yes.

5672. And the scheme of this Bill is to lead to the same goal by the road of a dual Executive?—Yes.

5673. Why does duality close and union open the road for Indian thought?—Because duality gives an opportunity for the rise of faction and the artificial creation of discontent much more than the other. It is a scheme which nobody has ever tried. It has obvious difficulties; it no doubt has a good many unforeseen difficulties.

5674. Those are all objections to the scheme, but they are not an answer to my questions?—Anything which is an obstacle to smooth progress is a difficulty in the way of the realisation of Indian genius.

5675. We must leave it at that, but I cannot pretend to think that you have answered my question?—The smoother the road the more satisfactory the progress. I think you will admit that.

5676. Yes. Of course, it is merely a question of opinion as to which is the smoother road?—Yes.

5678. Surely not. A preamble, whether good or bad, only affects the Bill to which it is a preamble?—Yes.

5679. It does not affect any future Bill that the Indian people may evolve for themselves?—The preamble provides very convenient, and I think, justifiable arguments for and against certain courses. You have admitted the principle yourself, and now you refuse to enforce it.

5680. I understand entirely your view, that the form of this Bill gives an unfortunate bias towards a certain form of government?—Yes.

5681. But you cannot point to any clause of the Bill which would prevent India, if she wished it, departing from that form of government in the future?—I can point to a clause which would make it more difficult.

5682. Which?—The clause embodying diarchy.

5683. You think that makes it more difficult?—Yes.

Chairman.] We are very much obliged to you.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THE EARL OF SELBORNE IN THE CHAIR.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THE Lord CARMICHAEL, G.C.S.I., G.C.I.E., K.C.M.G. (A Member of the House of Lords), is Examined; as follows:—

Chairman.

5684. I think you were in turn Governor of the State of Victoria in the Commonwealth of Australia, and the Presidencies of Madras and Bengal in the Empire of India?—I was.

5685. You are familiar, of course, with the Montagu-Chelmsford Report and of the Provisions of the Draft Bill which we are considering?—I have read them.

Chairman—continued.

5686. You have been good enough to furnish us with answers to certain questions we sent you, which of course we have all read?—Yes.

The questions and answers are as follows:—

Prefatory note by Witness.—I have prepared answers to the questions which were sent to me. I have not made the answers at all full, for I do not think think members of the Committee can wish to have their time taken up to no real purpose.

My experience of India is very limited. Until towards the end of 1911 I knew very little about India—not more than any ordinary man living at that time must have known, reading newspapers and magazines. I went to Madras as Governor, and was in that Province, except when for some days I was at Delhi for the Durbar, for nearly six months. A Governor necessarily sees things from a different and perhaps more restricted point of view than that from which other people may see them, and unless he is a man of exceptional talents—which I am not—he must often fail to observe the true relations of things; subject to that qualification, I hope I learned as much during those months in Madras as most commonplace men would have done.

On 1st April, 1912, I went as Governor to Bengal, and remained in that Presidency, except for a few short visits to the Viceroy, and once for a few days to Behar, and for a week to the U.P. until the end of March, 1917, when I left India after staying two nights at Bombay.

I think I did learn a good deal while in Bengal about some aspects of Indian administration, and as to the ideas which actuated people, both Europeans and Indians, and I am inclined to think that a good deal of what I learned is of use to me in forming a judgment about other parts of India besides Bengal, though I freely admit that I quite possibly exaggerate this.

To come to the questions:—

1. Do you accept the proposition that it is desirable to bring about the progressive realisation of responsible government in India? and, if so, how do you define the expression "responsible government"? And do you generally accept the proposition contained in the Preamble?—I would have accepted the proposition even before I left India. My prejudices, no doubt, incline me to do so, but I saw nothing, either in Madras or Bengal, to make me think that responsible government would be impossible or harmful in India. "British India, as an integral part of the Empire," would, I believe, benefit by its realisation. I do not attempt to define the expression "responsible government." To do so at all exhaustively would take up much time; but perhaps I ought to say that I do not see how there can be said to be responsible government under a scheme at all like that contemplated by the Viceroy and the Secretary of State, unless the executive, in whatever way it may be constituted, is subordinate to the legislative council. I, therefore, think its realisation can only be "progressive," in the sense in which, I presume, the word is used in the question. I think, too, that the words in the preamble "as an integral part of the Empire" imply that the authority of the British Parliament must be clearly recognised as supreme by the Governments in India, however seldom they may expect to see that authority asserted. Even if I did not feel that it was in itself desirable, I think that developments since I left India have made it absolutely necessary in the interests of the whole British Empire to initiate, as soon as possible, some scheme of reform which does not depart far from the scheme prepared by the Viceroy and the Secretary of State, and published by the authority of the British Cabinet. I, therefore, not only do generally accept the proposition contained in the preamble, but trust that the Bill may go through with the essential features which the Secretary of State proposes in it.

2. Do you think that the realisation of responsible government in the provinces involves the establishment in provincial legislatures of a substantial elected majority (Clause 6)?—Certainly, I think it does.

3. Do you think that the non-official members of the provincial legislatures should possess power to control the actions and policy of the executive? Do you think they possess such power at present?—Yes. They did not appear to me to possess such power in Madras; perhaps I was not sufficiently observant to see it if they did—but even if they did possess it, it can only have been in a very rudimentary form. In

Chairman—continued.

Bengal they had rather more of such power than they themselves realised (especially the Indian members). They could, however, only exercise it in an indirect manner. I often wished that the non-official members—both Indian and European—had more of this power, and had it in a way which would have been clear to themselves. If they had had it I feel sure there would have been more contentment of a kind which no one responsible for government in the presidency would have felt any desire to disturb; and there would certainly have been a better understanding of each other by both English and Indians. I think, too, it would have lessened the feeling of dislike of officials by Indians, and the want of appreciation of them by Europeans, which it seems to me far too often deprives the honest work of officials of the good success which it deserves.

4. Do you think that there are certain matters or functions of Government in the Provinces in which at present the Provincial Executive must remain responsible to the Secretary of State and Parliament, and must therefore be in a position to enforce its wishes?—Yes. There are, certainly, such matters at present, and I believe there always will be such unless Provincial Governments are deprived of powers which I think they are better qualified to possess than any other Governments are, at any rate, for a long time.

5. If you accept the propositions stated under questions 1 to 4, do you think that the dual form of government embodied in the Bill is the best means of securing them? If not, what are your objections to that feature of the Bill, and by what other means would you attempt to secure the objects in view?—I daresay that some other form could be devised quite as good, if not better, but it will, to my mind, be very unwise to try and adopt any other unless—which I do not gather is the case—the peoples of India who have, I hope, just now much real respect for the office of Viceroy, and considerable, though vague, respect for that of Secretary of State, desire some other system to be adopted, and these two high officers are willing to accept it.

6. If you have any other method to suggest, does it (i.) provide possibilities of advance by stages, and facilitate the "progressive realisation of responsible government," and, if it does, in what way (Clause 2, 3, etc.)? and (ii.), does it afford means of judgment (a) to the electors and (b) to the Statutory Commission which is to examine and report on progress, of the success or failure in results of the control exercised by the legislature and those who represent it in the Executive?—In view of my last answer this needs no reply from me.

7, 8, 9, 10. If you consider a dual form of government acceptable in principle, are there any points of detail the modification of which you regard as necessary? If so, what are those points, and what modifications would you suggest? 8. In particular, do you think: (i.) that Ministers should hold office "during pleasure," i.e., should be liable to removal if they are unable to support the action decided upon in their department by the Governor, or if they fail to retain the confidence of the legislature? (Clause 3 (1)). (ii.) That the Governor should have power to disregard the opinion of his Ministers if he considers that action in accordance with that opinion is inconsistent with the due discharge of his responsibilities? (Clause 3 (3)). (iii.) That the Executive Council should in all Provinces normally consist of one official European and one non-official Indian? (Clause 4). (iv.) That the Governor should have power to dissolve his Legislative Council? (Clause 7 (4))? 9. Referring back to Questions 2, 3, and 4, if your answers to the first and third of these are in the affirmative, and if you think that the legislatures should be given greater powers of control and influence than they possess at present, do you regard the limitations imposed generally by Clause 9 of the Bill upon their financial and legislative powers as (i.) suitable, or as (ii.) unnecessarily severe, or as (iii.) inadequate to safeguard the responsibilities which the Government owes in the last resort to Parliament (Clause 9)? 10. In particular: (i.) Do you think that the legislature

lature should have power with whatever limitations to vote supplies (Clause 9 (2))? (ii.) Do you accept the plan of Grand Committees as the means of giving to the Government the power to secure essential legislation in the event of their failure to carry their propositions in the Council? If so, have you any modifications of detail to suggest? If not, what other method would you suggest to secure the object in view?—These four questions may, perhaps, be conveniently grouped together; and the best answer which I can give briefly to them is to say that I thoroughly endorse the views set forth by Professor Berriedale Keith under the heading "B Provincial Subjects" on pp. 44-47 in the Report of the Commission to inquire into the Home Administration of Indian Affairs. Of all the documents connected with the Bill which I have read, Professor Berriedale Keith's is that with which I, personally, am most in agreement. I know that it cannot appeal to people who have only Indian experience—whether they are Indians or Europeans—as it does to me. I think this arises in great part from what seems to me one of Professor Keith's merits. He, more I think than anyone else, has kept in mind that the Empire as a whole is really the most important asset for both Indians and Englishmen alike; and he lays stress on things which are not now much heeded in India, but which will, I feel sure, be thought important some day. Sir Sankaran Nair, I am glad to notice, has, better than most others, recognised these matters. But since, as I hope I have already made clear, I think the most-needed thing is to depart no further than we can help from Indian public opinion—such as it is (and I believe that one can fairly say there is Indian public opinion, though it is not so large in volume nor so determined as it will very soon be). I am prepared not to expect that any of Professor Keith's points, which would jeopardise the passing of the Bill should be insisted on. In this view, it will be seen that I differ from Professor Keith, who is not an opportunist.

11. Do you accept the position adopted in the Bill (Part II.), that the time has not yet come to give the Legislative Assembly a similar measure of control over the Central Government as that given to Provincial Legislative Councils over Provincial Governments?—Personally, I believe that similar control, though probably in a less degree, might with advantage be established; but I believe this would be to go further than the Indians, most likely to speak wisely, think necessary; so I have no objection to the position adopted in the Bill.

12, 13, 14, 15. Do you agree that it is advisable none the less to provide for a substantial elective majority in the Indian Legislature (Clause 16)? 13. Do you accept the plan of a bicameral legislature as arising out of this, as constituting both a satisfactory machine for the ordinary purposes of legislation and as affording the means to the Governor-General in Council to secure legislation which he regards as essential (Clauses 14, 15 and 16)? 14. Do you accept the provisions of the Bill as to the course of legislation in the Indian Legislature (Clause 20 (3) and (4))? Or do you regard them as unnecessarily restrictive on the popular will, or as an inadequate means of ensuring to the Governor-General in Council the discharge of his responsibilities? 15. Do you accept the changes made by the Bill (Clause 21) in the constitution of the Governor-General's Executive Council? If not, what are your reasons, and what modifications would you suggest?—I agree to question 12. But with regard to questions 11 to 15 I do not feel qualified to speak. I have no experience except as a Governor, and that did not directly teach me anything about the Indian Legislature. While I was in India there seemed to be no likelihood of the Governor-General's Council, or the Indian Legislature, being altered, and so I never studied them in consultation with my officers or with non-officials whose views on them would be worth considering. My feeling is that in regard to them, too, Professor Keith's advice is likely to be sound. What I think ought to be kept most in mind is that nothing which weakens, and as little as possible which even seems to weaken, the prestige of the Viceroy should be done. I am, I hope, as careful as anyone with experience can be for the position of a Provincial Governor, but I know that the prestige of the Viceroy is barely less important than that of the King-Emperor, and I cannot help feeling that a risk of lessening this has, probably unavoidably and perhaps even wisely and deliberately, been incurred when the change of capital was made. My experience in Australia, as well as in Calcutta, makes me feel more anxious perhaps than others are to keep this risk as small as possible.

16. Do you think that the development of Provincial autonomy on the one hand and of self-government in the Provinces on the other involves any modification of the provisions of sections 2, 33, and 45 of the Government of India Act (Clause 23)?—The modifications suggested in Clause 23 are probably necessary in the view of men far better qualified than I am to judge. I do not think my views, which could only be purely academic, can be of any use even as tentative suggestions to the Committee.

17. Do you agree that the gradual realisation of responsible government involves periodical examination of progress by independent authority, and that the provisions of Clause 28 of the Bill are well designed to afford such examination?—I think there ought to be examinations from time to time; but great care should be taken not to take away responsibility from the British Parliament. It seems to me that in that responsibility we have the surest guarantee that progress will be real.

18. Are there any matters which it is proposed in the Bill to deal with by rule which you would suggest should be provided for in the Bill?—I can make no suggestion founded on personal conviction, so refrain from making any.

19. Have you any observations to offer on the reports of Lord Southborough's Committees and of the Committee on the Home Administration of Indian Affairs?—No. The Committee have better means than I have of judging as to the reports of Lord Southborough's Committees which got the evidence on which alone sound conclusions can be based; as I have said before, in my judgment, for what it is worth, Professor Keith's Minority Report seems to me to put forward very sound advice. I prefer it to the Report of the Committee from which he differed.

I have now answered as well as I can the questions which were sent to me.

There are one or two points to which I would like to refer. My experence, as a Governor, of three different Indians as members of my Executive Council convinced me of the great value of an Indian on my Council who could have access, and as a fact did whenever he wished have access, to all papers and files equally with the official European members.

This value showed itself in two ways; (a) The administration had the benefit of the criticism by an Indian of Indian administration; (b) It made it surer than it might otherwise have been that the non-Indian members would consider the matter they dealt with from an Indian point of view, and would take care to meet the possible criticism of their Indian colleague by giving their reasons for action in the way most likely to convince him that their proposed course was the best under the existing circumstances.

I know, from personal experience, how often trouble and suspicion arise if there is any idea that the Indian members of Council are not allowed to see Executive Council files. It may possibly at times be necessary for the Governor to forbid his doing so, and the Governor ought, I think, to have it in his power to do so at his own discretion; but I don't think a Governor—at least, not one of ordinary intellectual calibre—would be wise in forbidding if he can at all help it.

This consideration has, I fancy, some bearing on the question of the separation of Ministerial and Executive government in the provinces. My own belief is that Minister and Executive Councillors alike will be great losers if they are deprived of each other's advice, as, apparently, the Government of India propose they should be.

I may

I may be wrong, of course, but I feel convinced that success will be far more likely if the two "Governments" in a province work together, and if Ministers and Councillors both have the same facilities as Executive Councillors now have to criticise the entire administration, and ordinarily deliberate as one body.

I never knew any instance of my Indian member interfering with his colleagues in a way which could be called meddlesome, though I know some persons without experience have thought it likely he might.

I would like also to express the hope that it may be made possible for a Governor to have at times a non-official European Minister or Councillor. What I should have liked in Bengal was an Executive Council of four members, not more than two of whom might at any time be officials, and that not fewer than two of whom might be Indians. I know it would be even harder at present to find good, non-official Europeans willing to serve than it is to find good non-official Indians; but this may change.

Co-operation between different races in India—including Europeans—is most desirable. I much regret the hostile attitude so often taken up by Indians towards the Civil Service; though I must admit I have heard as harsh and much less excusable criticism of the I.C.S. from Europeans who belong to other Services as I ever heard from Indians. The non-official Englishman could do much to alter this attitude. That is one thing in which a Governor, who is not a member of the I.C.S., has a pull over any I.C.S. man. I have a very high opinion of the I.C.S. as a whole, but I feel sure that members of that Service would, just now, be handicapped as men much less experienced and much less clever, who do not belong to it, would not be if acting as head of a province, such as Bengal; and I am inclined to think the handicap may extend to other provinces. I felt this in India, and I feel it even more in London, when I talk to Englishmen who have spent their lives in India, though not in the Civil Service.

5687. Would you wish to make any statement in supplement of those answers?—There are several things I could say.

5688. Say exactly what is in your mind, and we will ask any questions which occur to us?—Perhaps I ought to say a little more strongly than I did in the answers, that I feel that whatever may be the most perfect scheme theoretically, and I daresay I should have drawn up one which I should have thought better—perhaps nobody else would—but whatever schemes are proposed it seems to me very dangerous to go far away from the one which has been proposed by the Viceroy and the Secretary of State. I would like to dwell on that, because I think the fact that those two gentlemen have put forward a scheme, and that that scheme has been put forward without the British Cabinet objecting to its being put forward, at any rate has created a situation which is of very great importance and which has this element of danger in it, that if you depart very far from that scheme I think there is a risk, which would be a very serious one, of people in India saying that you have flouted the Secretary of State and the Viceroy, especially saying that you have flouted the Viceroy. I think that would be a most dangerous impression to be allowed to grow up in India, and to tell you the truth there is one point I have not stated, but it seems to me it is all the worse because Lord Curzon is in the present administration. I know people who have very advanced views. One particular gentleman I am thinking of wrote to me and said: "Here is a scheme put forward which surprises me"—and he thought probably would surprise myself — "by the Viceroy and the Secretary of State, the two people that we Indians have always been told we ought to think the greatest men in the world and those whose will ought to prevail; and not only that, but it is put forward and apparently blessed by a Government which contains Lord Curzon himself, who, more than any man, I have hitherto thought, and persons who are not as advanced as I am have thought, was an authority on what must be done or ought to be done in India." His view was that if you go far from that it would be unfortunate, though, mind you, it was not the line on which he would have gone. He and I had discussed these things in India, and so I know what he thought. He said, "What are we to think? Is England going to throw over the Viceroy? Is England going to throw over the Secretary of State? and is England, above all, going to throw over Lord Curzon?" I think that would be a very unfortunate position for the administration to find itself in in India. That is the great argument with me for not altering the Bill more than can be helped.

Another point I would like to say—I do not know that I put it in my evidence—is that I think the less we have rules of what might be said to be of a cast-iron nature the better. I cannot conceive that this scheme is perfect, even if it is much more perfect than I think it is; I cannot conceive that any scheme would be perfect. It is such a change that within a few years, very likely long before ten years are over, we will want to have modifications—everybody will, Indians and Englishmen equally—and I think the less we do to hamper it the better. Just as an example of that, I may say that I have read what has been said about the Joint Purse and the Separate Purse. I appreciate the points put by Sir James Meston; they are points which I do feel very much, but for all that I should like to see a Joint Purse because I think nothing would give a more cast-iron tendency than to give a separate Purse. I think you would be probably going a long way to check any improvements which we may all feel are needed very soon.

I should like to say on education, personally I hope they will not separate the administration of elementary education from that of higher education. I know what can be said against giving higher education to the Ministers whose power is based on the Legislative Council, but I think that has to be done. I do think that to separate them would be a very unfortunate thing in the interests of education in India. I had perhaps more experience than anyone else that I know of of one aspect, which has a bearing—it is not, of course, the point, but it has a bearing upon this: I was in Madras, where the University was under the Local Government as far as it is under any Government, and I was in Bengal, where it was not—where it was under the Government of India—and I feel perfectly certain that it was a most unfortunate thing for Bengal that that was so. If the University is under one Government, then for goodness sake let all the rest of education be under that Government too. If they are under one Government I do not know that it will always be easy to do the right thing; there are difficulties, of course, financial and other, but I certainly do not think that education gains from a separation, and I think it would gain even less if you separated it and had elementary education under the Ministers, whose power is based on the Legislative Council, and the higher education under the control of the officials. There are things to be said in favour of each, but on purely political grounds I would like to see it under the Ministers. I was struck by what Sir Claud Hill said about that, and I quite endorse it. I do not know that there is anything else I have to say. I quite see that the position of the Governor—perhaps I am entitled to say this——

5689. I think that is a most important point. With your experience, will you tell us how you see the position of the Governor under the proposed scheme?—I think it would be a much more difficult position, I admit, and I think he would have to exercise his own responsibility more than he does at present. He would not rely as much on his advisers, because after all the Governor has very great powers at the present time if necessary, and I think he would have to exercise his powers more in future than he does at present. I am not at all enamoured of the system as proposed of the Grand Committee; I am inclined to think that, if not at once, very soon, Indians will begin to think they see through it. That would be my own attitude to it. It is rather taking a responsibility off the Governor and putting it on other people, who are not perhaps as well fitted to bear the responsibility as the Governor is. I do think that in India—and mind you I have been a Governor in Australia also—though you may say the things are perfectly different—I do think that in India, just because the Indians have not had so much responsibility themselves, they are prepared prepared to see a Governor doing what they do not like and to think that very likely he is right to an extent which certainly the Australians would not be.

5690. I should like to follow that out a little. By the scheme the Governor remains personally responsible to Parliament for what are known as the reserved subjects?—Yes.

5691. And because he is personally responsible he is given the power, on his own motion, to replace into the Budget any sum which he considers essential for the efficiency of the reserved services?—Yes.

5692. Similarly, when it comes to legislation that he considers to be essential for the fulfilment of his responsibilities, machinery is provided which is known as the process of certification. If a Governor certifies that a certain measure is necessary for the fulfilment of his responsibility—I am not pretending to quote the exact words, but I am putting the sense—he has the power to certify and to carry the consideration of that matter from the Legislative Council to the Grand Committee. For the moment, only examining that particular plan, do you consider that the Grand Committee, as proposed to be composed, gives him the security which, ex hypothesi, is necessary for him in the fulfilment of his responsibility?—I do not think it does. I can conceive measures in which the Governor would not get his own way in the Grand Committee. If there was an Act, such as has been spoken of as the Rowlatt Act, the Governor may have his officials, but he is not the least certain of the nominated members. It seems to me it is just on the most dangerous occasions when the Governor would be in his weakest position there. Do not you think so? It is not for me to ask you.

5693. Do I understand you to mean that as the scheme stands in the Report, you would not, as Governor, feel yourself sufficiently equipped for the fulfilment, in every case, of the responsibility which Parliament continues to lay upon you?—No; I do not think so.

5694. Have you any suggestion to make to the Committee, from your experience as Governor, of a better plan for enabling you to fulfil your responsibility?—I should leave it entirely to the Governor—let him do it off his own bat, so to speak.

5695. Subject to the control of the Secretary of State?—Yes; I believe it would be a sounder method. I know some people might say that I personally, if I had been Governor, would have been intimidated by Lord Sinha, or by other Bengalis, when they come and spoke to me. I do not think I should have been. I should have listened to all they said, and should have argued with them, and if I had disagreed with them I do not think I should have been afraid in the least to do what they did not approve of, and I do not think they would have been unduly angry with me if I had. I do think that perhaps it is more necessary to be careful whom you appoint as Governor.

5696. You would lay great stress on that, that the utmost care should be exercised by His Majesty's Government (because really it is a responsibility, not only of the Secretary of State, but of the Prime Minister too) to give such advice to His Majesty that only the most fit persons were appointed as Governors?—I certainly think so. I am not claiming that I am the one they would appoint, but I do think so. I certainly think they ought to be very careful in the appointment.

5697. Having exercised that care in the appointment, would you hold the Governor responsible, and let him be judged by his conduct, always under the control of the Secretary of State?—I should. It may not be a very pleasant position for him, but I think it is one in which he must take the responsibility, and I think you would always find men who would.

5698. The real responsibility rests with the Governor. But I understand you to say that the plan of the scheme is to conceal that responsibility, not to give him full power to exercise it?—That is the way it looks to me. I do not think we should conceal the responsibility.

5699. This bears on the same point. In paragraph 236 of the Joint Report, under the heading of "Control of Business," it says this: "Bearing in mind the facts that the Legislative Councils will in future be larger bodies, and will contain a certain number of members unversed in discussion, we feel the importance of maintaining such standards of business as will prevent any lowering of the Council's repute. The conduct of business in a large deliberative body is a task that calls for experience which cannot be looked for at the outset in an elected member. We consider, therefore, that the Governor should remain the President of the Legislative Council; but inasmuch as it is not desirable that he should always preside, he should retain the power to appoint a vice-president. He should not be formally limited in his selection, but we suggest that for some time to come it will be expedient that the vice-president should be chosen from the official members." The scheme there is that the Governor should himself be President of the Legislative Council, but with power to appoint a vice-president sometimes to take his place, and that that vice-president should also be an official. What do you think of that?—I know the sort of arguments which would be used in its favour, but they do not appeal to me; and personally I would much rather that the Governor did not preside too often in his Council. I, of course, presided in my Council myself, both in Madras and Bengal. I do not think that in Madras I ever was absent when there was a sitting, when I was in the city. In Bengal I sometimes was, and of set purpose. The Vice-President was a member of my Council, and an official, and I think he did it very well. But I have, on one occasion at any rate, deliberately absented myself from a Council in order that the Indian Member of Council might be in the chair. He was an official in the sense that he was a member of my Council, but was not a member of the I.C.S.

5700. Considering the new and the increased responsibility which is going to be put upon the Governor, do you think he ought to be President of the Council at all?—Personally I think not. I think it would be better if he was not.

5701. Do you think any official ought to be?—I would rather it was a non-official myself. I think it would eventually, at any rate, be very much better that it should be, and I would risk it at the beginning. At this moment I am only thinking of Bengal. I believe you would find men in Bengal who would be perfectly competent to do it.

5702. Admitting the truth that experience in acting as Speaker cannot be looked for at the outset in an elected member, would you still give the council the power to choose its own Speaker?—I would. I do not know that that is found in a Governor when he first goes there.

5703. He has probably sat in one House of Parliament or the other?—I suppose he has. Had Sir Arthur Lawley ever sat in Parliament when he went to Madras?

5704. He had presided over the council in the Transvaal?—Yes. You have me there, but he had never sat here. But I never looked upon it as a necessary thing that the Governor should have sat in one House or the other. That point was never put to me, and I never knew that that was the idea. I certainly have met men who have told me—they may have been speaking incorrectly—that they had been offered Governorships, who certainly had not been in either House of Parliament.

5705. Do you wish to say anything about communal representation in Madras, or about the position of the Indian Civil Service under the scheme?—Communal representation in Madras is not a thing which I ever heard discussed when I was in India. I have heard a good deal about it since I came back. I was rather surprised to find that there was so much strong feeling about it. I met my friend, I think I have a right to call him my friend, who is now dead, Dr. Nair, and he talked to me a good deal about it, and I was impressed with a very great deal that he said. I knew Dr. Nair in former days. He and I have been on political Committees in this country a long time ago, and he was one of the first Indians who came to see me when I went to Madras. We often talked of matters, but he never talked to me in a way which led me to think he would lay so much stress upon it, when he was in Madras. Probably no one had thought of that then, and there was no particular reason why he should. I talked to him here, and I confess I was a little puzzled. I was not without hope that Dr. Nair felt that perhaps the time would come when even those who are keenest for it now would not be anxious to have it, but I never thought the matter out, and I have really nothing to say about it. I saw no traces of the idea that it was absolutely necessary in Madras. I daresay at the beginning it would be a little difficult for the non-Brahmin communities, perhaps, to find candidates as easily as it would be for the Brahmins, though I cannot quite see why they should not when I look back in Madras. I had various friends who, I do not think, were Brahmins, and who certainly seemed to have a good deal of following among Madrasses, both Brahmin and non-Brahmin, who really thought about politics, and who, I should think, would be the persons who would have most weight in determining what way an election was going. Dr. Nair himself was not a Brahmin, Sir Sankaran Nair was not a Brahmin. I should have thought he would not have a difficulty in getting into the Legislative council—and I can remember others. I think people in this district find rather a difficulty in realising what the feeling of a Brahmin is, and the feeling towards Brahmins. I am not an ethnologist and do not pretend to be learned, but it always seems to me that there is a good deal of what is racial in caste, more than a great many people think. I am rather inclined to think that the feeling of the Bramhins, at any rate those who are friends of mine, and who, I think, were some of the best educated among them, about Brahmins is very much my own feeling about Scotsmen. I do not say that Scotsmen are any better than Englishmen or Irishmen. We do inter-marry, perhaps more than the Brahmins do. I am an Irishman on the wife's side myself. But the Scotsmen does not think there is anything wrong when a Scotsman becomes Prime Minister, or when there is an excess of Scotch representation in the Cabinet, as there sometimes is; and I am glad to say that I have never found that my English friends seemed to think there is any very great danger in it. They may try to get an Englishman in rather than a Scotsman, and if they can, well, let them. I think that is rather the feeling that the Brahmin has. He is not sorry if a Brahmin comes up. If he does he thinks it is due to some superior quality, perhaps, in his race. Perhaps he is not as modest as Scotsmen are, and therefore would not put it in that way. But he cannot complain if a person who is not a Brahmin comes up. But then, of course, my experience was greater in Bengal than anywhere else, and I am sure there was no feeling against non-Brahmins in Bengal. When I look at my own Legislative Council in Madras I remember a non-Brahmin who was listened to certainly, and as Governor it seemed to me that his fellow-members listened to him as much as to any Brahmin. That was Mr. Kesava Pillai. So that I do not feel that so strongly. But I do know there was a distinct difference between them. I do think the non-caste Indians, perhaps, were treated there as they were all over India some time ago by the Brahmins. But from what I heard I am inclined to think that the caste non-Brahmins in Madras were just as much aloof from, and just as likely to disregard the feelings of, the non-caste people as anyone.

Lord Sinha.

5706. The Panchamas, as they call them?—Yes. I do not expect that a non-caste Madrasee has any greater love for a Panchama than a Madras Brahmin has. In fact, when I look back I think about one charity—I suppose you may call it a charity—which rather interested me in Madras for providing wells for Panchamas where they could drink the water. It naturally appealed to me to think there could be people in my Presidency who must not draw water from wells where others were able to draw it. Certainly the Indians who spoke to me most strongly about this, and urged that there was an evil in that state, and hoped that I would do what I could to mitigate it, were Brahmins.

Mr. Bennett.

5707. From your knowledge of the Madras Presidency, would you say that non-Brahmins could protect their interests adequately by taking their places in general electoral communities?—I must begin by telling you my knowledge of the Madras Presidency is very limited—only six months—and before I had been in any other part of India, and while I was really learning from other people, and I was never told that they could not. I should have thought that they did from the fact that there were such people as Sir Sankaran Nair or Dr. Nair or Mr. Kesava Pillai and others whom I could mention that certainly did not make me think they could not.

5708. You have seen abundant evidence of capacity for taking their part in public life in those communities, have you not?—Sir Sankaran Nair is a member of the Government of India: he must be a person who is capable. Dr. Nair, I thought, was a person who was capable.

Major Ormsby-Gore.

5709. You talk of the attitude of popular opinion in India towards the Governors. Did I understand you to say that you think that the Indian people are more ready to take an ordinance—because that is what it comes to—from the Governor than they would take it from a Grand Committee in which the official element predominated?—I think they would. I do not think it is because of any feeling against the officials, but they believe, and I should think with a certain amount of rightness, that any order of that sort does come from the Governor; and personally I think it ought to come from the Governor. If a Governor is worth his salt it would not be what he disapproved of entirely, and I think, therefore, he ought to have the responsibiliy clearly, and it would be a good thing if the people clearly recognised that it came from him. I say there was no ill-feeling towards the officials—there may be something of that, too—but they do think the Governor comes with a fresh and open mind.

5710. Then, in that case, you are speaking only of the Governors who are appointed by the Crown from England?—Yes; they are the only Governors I know of.

5711. But in the future all the eight Provinces are to have Governors?—I do not quite know what is going to be. I hope they will. Personally, I think they all ought to be appointed from here. I think you will throw away a very good chance of doing good if they are not.

5712. Do you think the attitude to a Governor exercising these powers which you advocate, would be different if he came from a British Parliament than if he were an Indian Civil Servant?—I am perfectly certain it would—perfectly certain of it.

5713. Assuming this plan of ordinance, that is to say, of the Governor taking the responsibility, I think you said he should do it with the assent of the Secretary of State—that when he took this action on his own authority and responsibiilty that should carry with him the assent of the Secretary of State?—I think he should.

Chairman.

5714. I think you said, "subject to the control of the Secretary of State"?—Yes.

Major Ormsby-Gore.

5715. I want to know what you mean by that control—do you mean previous sanction?—Not necessarily. You must leave him discretion to act very quickly; but there is a telegraph and he can telegraph if he thinks fit. But let him act, and recall him if he does not do what the Secretary of State approves.

5716. Would you allow a Governor to have direct communication with the Secretary of State?—I would.

5717. The proposal is that in every case the Governor should go through the Government in India?—Yes.

5718. And you think that is a bad plan?—Yes.

5719. In your statement you have referred a good deal to the Report of the Crewe Committee, and particularly to Professor Berriedale Keith's Minute of Dissent?—I referred generally to it. I read it.

5720. You say Professor Berriedale Keith's Minute of Dissent is framed on Colonial Office lines?—I think it probably is. He was at the Colonial Office, and had a great deal of experience.

5721. He wants to make the relation between the Secretary of State and India something almost exactly the same as the relation between the Secretary of State for the Colonies and the Dominions?—I have never been a Secretary of State, and there are many things which you do not know if you have not been. Nor have I been a Colonial Office official. I expect it is getting nearer to those lines. I suppose it is whatever Professor Berriedale Keith thinks is the best line, and I agree with him as far as I am capable of judging.

5722. Would you like to give any view on the Council of India here? Do you think the Council of India should be retained or abolished?—I have never gone into the matter at all.

5723. Have you any views you would like to submit on the financial relations of the Provinces to the Government of India?—No; because I never went into that. I want to see them as free from the control of the Government of India as possible.

5724. And you want to see them more free than they are at present from control in matters of finance?—Yes; I think so—at any rate, able to act more quickly. At present something is desired, and it may be years before it can be done. You may be congratulated in Whitehall for at last having determined to do something which your Provinces have wished for for many years. I should like that delay to be shortened.

5725. With regard to the Franchise, do you think that the recommendations of the Southborough Committee in regard to the Franchise are sufficiently wide to secure an effective vote from the Indian villages in the rural districts?—I have not gone in detail into that. The Southborough Committee have, and have had evidence which I have not seen. Therefore, I think they are more likely to be right than I should be where I differ from them; and I am inclined to think that on certain points on which I possibly would have differed from them, at any rate at first, they might have convinced me. I was struck by reading the Government of Bengal's note about it. I was Governor of Bengal, and we did talk of that sort of thing a bit while I was there. Their proposals are not exactly those that they would have put forward at the time I was there, but this scheme had not been thought of.

5726. There is no point in that connection that you wish to press on the Committee?—No. I quite believe points will come up a few years hence. I would rather wait till they arise.

Lord Islington.

5727. If you were Governor, do you feel that you could work the dual system, as proposed by the Joint Committee?—I would try.

5728. Do you think your efforts would be successful?—Yes, I think so; it is difficult, but I think we have to have it. There are lots of things which seem difficult, but if you try them you can do them, and I think you could do it. I do not see why you should not.

5729. I see in your note you are very much in favour of a free united discussion between the two branches of the Government?—I am, very.

5730. You would carry that through for both transferred and reserved subjects?—Yes, I would.

5731. Would you think if that became the practice that you could mitigate some of the evils of duality?—I think you would. It seems to me the only way in which you will.

5732. Then I gather from your replies to the Chairman that you would give the final authority almost exclusively to the Governor?—I would.

5733. And you would get rid of all this machinery which is suggested, by which an attempt is made to obtain his will and to carry out his wish?—I think so. I think the more clearly he feels his own responsibility the better.

5734. You do not think that by imposing that responsibility on him, as he would have to discharge somewhat unpopular tasks from time to time, it would make his position difficult?—His position would be difficult.

5735. But you do not think it would be any more so?—No, and I think it would help things forward if the Indian people realised the difficulty of his position. I think the very fact that they knew the Governor was in that personal position would go a long way to stop needless friction.

5736. Would you say from your experience as a Governor that if free discussion is given as between both parties to the questions at issue, a very large amount of difference of opinion will be got rid of?—I think so, especially if the Governor can command his own temper.

5737. And that of his colleagues?—Yes—well, interfere at the right moment.

5738. Just one other question. In your note, as Major Ormsby-Gore has already put to you, you refer constantly to Professor Keith's Report in the India Office Committee?—Yes.

5739. Am I right in inferring from what you say that you would prefer to see some of the authority, which at present the Government of India possesses over a local government, transferred to the Secretary of State?—Yes, I would myself.

5740. Could you specify at all some of the powers which you would like to see transferred?—No, I would rather not, because I have not gone into it fully.

5741. I will not press you on this point if you would not like to answer it, but could you tell us at all what influences you in coming to that opinion from your past experience?—Well, a Governor may take a different view from that of the Viceroy—that is quite natural. If he is to be put under the Viceroy, well and good, I would have no objection to it at all. If you are going to alter the status of the Governor, and have the Governor an official, who is entirely under the Viceroy, let him be so; but if he is independent of the Viceroy, he may write to the Secretary of State about points, especially he may write private letters.

5742. Professor Keith suggests a good deal more than writing?—Yes.

5743. It means that on certain important decisions the confirming authority will be here instead of in Simla?—Yes, personally I should be glad if it was. I think India is such a big place from the Viceroy's point of view. I never was a Viceroy, but I think a Viceroy would be in a better position if it was so.

5744. Would you desire to see, if that were carried out, a reform in the India Office?—I have never gone into how it should be done, but I presume there would have to be a reform in the India Office.

5745. You have not gone into it?—No.

5746. You are not prepared to say whether there should be a council, or an advisory committee, of the Secretary of State?—No.

5747. One question as to finance. Have you any views to give us with regard to the proposals for Provincial finance, as to whether it should be a joint or a separate purse?—I said before you came into the room that I think there ought to be a joint purse. I can see objections to it, but I think there ought to be a joint purse.

Lord Sinha.

5748. I understand that in this dual form of government, your idea is that all matters should be jointly deliberated upon by both sections of the Government, the decisions with regard to reserved departments being arrived at by the Executive Council, and the decisions with regard to transferred departments being arrived at by the Ministers?—I think that would have to be so, on the lines of the Report.

5749. You place great importance on both sections discussing all matters with each other?—Yes, I will not say every little detail, but any matter on which there is likely to be any difference of opinion.

5750. You would not be afraid, yourself, of the Ministers having too great influence, by reason of such discussion with regard to reserved departments?—The Ministry having too great an influence? No, I do not think it would.

5751. On the contrary, you consider that to be beneficial, if I read your answers correctly?—I think they would then have a beneficial influence. A Governor always is influenced in these things; he cannot help it. I cannot conceive any Governor not thinking at all times: "Now, how will that or this affect Indian opinion?" He is not going to be an ordinary man if he does not talk to his Indian Ministers sometimes about things which are not in their portfolios. He may go into his Council primed up, so to speak, with information which he has got from his Indian members, and when he talks to them there, he thinks it is prejudice if they take the other line. Now, if that is discussed between them, he soon finds out, or fairly soon finds out, what is wrong. I have known that happen.

5752. And as a matter of fact, in your time in Bengal, I think the rule was that the Indian member of the Executive Council should have all papers in all departments open to him?—Yes, that he should be treated exactly as the non-Indian members were.

5753. Did you consider that to be of benefit to the other departments concerned?—I think it was of benefit all round.

5754. You have had experience of Indian members of the Executive Council, both in Bombay and Madras. You have had to deal with a larger number, probably, than other Governors?—I cannot say that. I think two in Madras and one in Bengal.

5755. None of them were men who had training in administration before they joined the Executive Council?—No.

5756. Did that render them unwilling to be influenced by, or to be advised by, the permanent heads of the departments over which they presided?—I should say certainly not. I think the danger is rather the other way.

5757. Did you find them always willing to listen to civilian secretaries so far as they offered advice or suggestions?—So far as I know I think they did listen. I think they are more willing to listen to their secretary than an official is. I do not see how they can help it.

5758. Did you find any spirit of hostility or antagonism on the part of an Indian member of the Council to the permanent heads of departments like secretaries or directors of public instruction?—No, I never heard of it.

5759. And you found no friction, by reason of the Indian member of the Council presiding over the department having to do with the English members of the Civil Service or the higher service serving in that department?—No, no real friction. I have heard complaints that he took a little longer to make up his mind than an Englishman would, because he did not know some facts, and I have also had it stated to me that it was a little difficu't to explain the thing to him.

5760. Because of his previous want of knowledge?—Yes. And, of course, after all, officials in India, to my mind, have too much to do, and they have not time to——

Chairman.

5761. To think?—I hope they have time to think, but not as much time as I should like. But they find it difficult to have time to explain to a Governor, because he has not had previous experience.

Lord Sinha.

5762. Do you think, when an Indian is a Minister instead of a member of the Executive Council, there would be a great difference in that respect?—I should not think so. I should think he would want to be a success, and if he is a man who is fairly intelligent at any rate, he will know that his best chance of making a success of his job is to listen to those who can give him good advice.

5763. And to benefit from the experience of officials?—Yes. I think Indians would be very apt to do that. As I say, there is a little danger in it.

5764. So far as Bengal is concerned, did you find that there was any very great reverence for Brahmins?—I never found it 5765. Or that the fact of a man not being a Brahmin stood in the way of his advancement, either in official life or in professional life?—Well, did you ever find it stand in your way?

5766. I put it to you, because others have said so?—I have never heard it even suggested and I never heard anybody say that you or many others that I could mention had had any difficulty. Take the big landlords, like Cassim Bazar or Digha Patia, I have heard some of them say that a lawyer had too much power; but a lawyer may be a Brahmin or a non-Brahmin. I know two big landlords told me they were going to make their sons go to the Bar, so that they would be able to hold their own.

5767. That has nothing to do with the question as between Brahmins and non-Brahmins?—No, they were non-Brahmins, but it was not because they were non-Brahmins that they felt that difficulty.

5768. Did you ever hear of any social difficulties in the way of non-Brahmins who had risen high, either as barristers, or pleaders, or judges, or high officials—did you ever hear there was any social difficulty in their way?—I never heard it, but of course it might exist, and they did not tell me of it.

5769. As regards education, am I right in understanding your evidence to be that it is your view that education, primary and secondary, as well as higher education, ought to be treated as one unit, and to be placed under the transferred departments in charge of Ministers?—I think they ought to be treated as one unit, I must say. They are so wrapped up together, and especially where people have so much to do as they have in India, I think they should be kept together, and I think on the whole they should be under the transferred departments.

5770. They should go to the Ministers?—Yes.

Lord Brodrick (Viscount Midleton).

5771. With regard to the position of the Secretary of State, I do not quite clearly understand. You do not propose that the Secretary of State for India should stand to India in the same relation as the Secretary of State for the Colonies stands to the Colonies?—No, I do not think he should, but I have not thought the thing out thoroughly.

5772. Speaking generally, the Secretary of State and Parliament have been considered to have a considerable position in India as guarantees for good government and good appointments?—Yes.

5773. With regard to the position of a Governor, I take it from your evidence that you desire that he should be as much apart from politics as he can be?—I think he should be.

5774. Do you consider that, in the case of the Provinces the interposition of a Grand Committee, and in the case of the Government of India the inter-position of the Council of State, in cases in which ultimately the Governor may have to act himself, is of great value? Do you consider that a sort of buffer state between the Assembly and him is of value?—I do not think it of great value. I think in very many cases it does not matter very much one way or the other, and in the cases where there is strong feeling I think it is a pity to have anything which seems to lessen the responsibility of the Governor. What I have always felt in India is, who is responsible? I am thinking of small matters which would never come to you probably when you were Secretary of State, but there are often little things happen in your Province—necessarily so. Something is done which is not quite what ought to have been done. It is far too often excused as being the fault of someone who did not understand you, or of somebody above you, who told you?

5775. Do you think the increase of opportunities of discussion on subjects on which it is obvious that the Governor will ultimately have to act, is of value?—Yes, I think it is.

5776. Even though ultimately it is clear the Governor will have to act?—Yes, I think so.

Chairman.

5777. You are speaking of discussion in Council?—Yes.

5778. Not in the Grand Committee?—No. You are right. It has just struck me that I ought to explain this.

Lord Brodrick (Viscount Midleton).

5779. I want to put it quite clearly. Take a case in which it is clear in the Legislative Council originally from the opposition of all the official members that ultimately the Governor will have to act, is there any great advantage in them re-discussing the whole question before the Grand Committee?—No, I do not think there is.

Mr. Montagu.

5780. You began by saying that it was very dangerous to depart too far from a scheme which had been agreed between the Secretary of State and the Viceroy?—Yes.

5781. Do not you approve of the publication of a constitutional reform of this kind for criticism?—Oh, yes, I do, certainly, but I think in India the impression has been formed—it may be wrong—that both the Viceroy and the Secretary of State want this. The Viceroy and the Secretary of State are the two people, especially the Viceroy, whom Indians have been taught as they think by us to revere. If anybody's word is to be accepted, simply because it is the word of a man, it is their word; and I think it cannot be discussed, especially it cannot be departed from very far, without Indians thinking that those two gentlemen are not after all such powers as they have always believed they were.

5782. Even if their scheme is put forward for opinion?—I think so.

Chairman.

5783. Surely you are speaking of the principle, not of the details?—Yes, of the principle, not of every detail, oh dear no. I was thinking at the moment really of the diarchy which, it seems to me, underlies your report.

Mr. Montagu.

5784. Now I want to ask you several questions about this Grand Committee point, which strikes me as being a very important one?—I quite believe it is, but I have not studied it very carefully; I never thought of it before, till your scheme came out.

5785. I think in answer to some questions you suggested that rather than have the process of Grand Committee, the Governor should do it himself. That means an ordinance?—Yes, I presume it would be.

5786. Would you publish that ordinance after discussion in the Legislative Council, or without discussion in the Legislative Council?—After. There may be occasions on which you would have to do it without discussion in some emergency.

5787. That gives the Governor absolute power, if he wishes, to give his own will the force of law?—It does.

5788. He has not got that power at the moment, has he?—No; if he has, it is to a limited extent. I think he has. He can do some things. I never tried.

5789. But he cannot pass a law except through the Council?—No.

5790. And in Bengal, am I not right in saying that he could, at any rate in theory, be beaten in his Legislative Council?—Yes, he could.

5791. I am not talking about the Governor-General, but I am talking about a Province only. In your opinion do you think it wise to give the Governor, under this reform scheme, greater power than he had before?—Yes, I think you will have to. I think it is the only way you can get out of bad friction occasionally. I do not think he will exercise that power. The more seldom he exercises it the better probably, but I think he ought to have it. I differ from anybody else whose opinion I have reead.

5792. Forgive me for pressing this, because it is so important. What exactly is the reason why the Governor should be more autocratic in the future than he has been in the past?—Because this is a transition period I think, at present, at any rate. Eventually the power will lie more with the people. I am hardly bold enough to think you will go the whole hog——

5793. Is it transitional from autocracy to democracy to go further in the direction of autocracy?—Not theoretically.

5794. But it might be in practice?—It might be.

5795. I am not now talking of administration, but only of legislation: Do you think that in a Province it is wise or necessary to give to the Governor an absolute right to pass a law, which not even six out of the non-official members of his Legislative Council will support?—Yes, I think it is, because if he is a man who would do it wrongly, he ought not to be there.

Chairman.

5796. He ought to be recalled?—Yes.

Mr. Montagu.

5797. And you think there are occasions upon which he ought to pass a law in a Province that no non-official member will support?—I think it is quite possible.

5798. The last question on that subject, I want to ask you this: You said that Indians will see through the Grand Committee procedure. What did you mean exactly by that?—They would never believe that the Grand Committee was anything but a body which was going to carry out the will of the Governor. They know the officials would, or they believe they would; and they would also think that the nominated non-officials would. They think so in the existing councils, and they would think so still more in the Grand Committee, I think; and I think they would be right.

5799. Is that consistent with your other argument? You say the Grand Committee does not give you sufficiently autocratic powers, and you want to pass an ordinance?—It is perfectly consistent. There are many things in which we can take either of two different lines. I think there are two lines. You might go entirely on the democratic line.

5800. Your objection to the Grand Committee is, that there might be occasions when a Governor could not get through the Grand Committee the legislation which he wants?—That is not my only objection.

5801. That was one objection?—Yes, but my greatest objection is that he would get things through the Grand Committee, which it would be very much better he should get on his own authority.

5802. At one moment you tell us that he might not be able to get, through his Grand Committee, legislation that he ought to have, and at the other moment you say that Indians would see in the Grand Committee, only machinery for registering the will of the Governor?—The Indians would only see that, I quite believe that. That is the only aspect in which they would look at it. It is not the only aspect.

5803. I am still rather puzzled?—They look upon the existing legislative councils, on the official bloc, as only to secure the will of the Governor. I do not think it necessarily does at all. I think it sometimes goes against the Governor's own prejudices, so to speak.

5804. With regard to the Council, you suggested that there should be a non-official elected President?—Yes. I never thought it out very carefully, but I do not see why there should not be.

5805. Elected by the Council?—Yes.

5806. Would you devise any machinery by which the Governor could address his Legislative Council if he wished to make a speech to them?—Yes, I should like to have that.

5807. How would you do that?—I have never thought it out, but I do not think that would be at all a difficult thing to do. As far as I am concerned I should very seldom want to make a speech, but if I had wanted to make a speech when I was Governor, I think the Council would have liked to hear it. I think that could be done.

5808. In answer to Lord Islington, you felt that it would be right that the control of the Provinces should be more directly in the hands of the Secretary of State in Council than in the hands of the Viceroy?—I believe it would be.

5809. Is it not necessary that the Viceroy should at least be informed of what is going on in a Province?—Certainly. I do not mind who is informed. Certainly, the Viceroy ought to be informed.

5810. You would suggest that there ought to be direct communication between the Governors and the Secretary of State, and copies of the correspondence given to the Viceroy. That is the sort of thing?—Yes; I think the closer the Governors are in touch with the Viceroy the better. Nothing will help things on better than that they should be.

Sir Henry Craik.

5811. I think you said that it would be better to swallow the scheme as a whole. You did not, of course, intend in saying that to withdraw the discretion from Parliament?—Oh, no.

5812. How far do you think that that discretion might be exercised without the injurious effects which you foresee?—I have not thought that out, I confess. I think people in India could answer that better than I can. It is purely policy. I do not think Parliament wants wants to do anything which would create a very difficult position in India, and I think Parliament ought to realise that there will be a difficult position in India if it departs very far from the scheme.

5813. You said you would not mind some alterations of detail?—Of course, it is not my scheme, and as I said if I were a member of Parliament I could develop another scheme——

5814. Do not you think that you yourself, in your criticisms and dissensions from the scheme, have led us on certain lines which are not entirely to be described as details?—Yes, certainly I have.

5815. First of all, you do not agree with the machinery of the Grand Committee?—That is so.

5816. Secondly, you want greater power placed in the hands of the Governor. Thirdly, you want the nominated President of the Legislative Council to be done away with, and an elected one put in his place. Fourthly, you wish that the Governors should have direct access to the Secretary of State, although you are good enough to allow that the Viceroy should be allowed the privilege of seeing the correspondence, but not affecting it?—If he see it I think he can affect it.

5817. But it might all be settled?—It might.

5818. These four points are rather more than matters of detail?—Quite; but I am giving you my personal view.

Chairman.] They are not principles.

Sir Henry Craik.

5819. I question that?—I do not think that matters, because I am giving them to you as my personal opinions. I do not know what other people think, and it may be possible that those are all points which could be modified without much danger. That you will learn from persons who are familiar with India.

5820. With regard to the impossibility of separating the two branches of education, has it not been very largely the idea with regard to Universities, as it is at home, to leave them as far as possible to a free expansion?—I would leave them as free as possible.

5821. Do not these two administrations differ? The one tends to leave Universities to go on their own course as far as possible, and develop on their own lines. Is that what you want in regard to primary education?—I suppose I ought not to ask a question, but my feeling is that the official Government would not leave the Universities free enough.

5822. Would it not be rather startling to us at home here if any Minister proposed to take the whole of the University education and join it with primary education?—Yes, I think it would be. It would shock me.

5823. Why should not India object to that just as much?—India would object to it, but, I think, not quite as much; what I think India objects to is that the University—at least what I object to is that the University—should be put under an official government who are thinking of many other things, I am afraid. I may be wrong, but my opinion is that the treatment of Universities in India is not always based on a desire for the good of the University.

5824. If it were made a transferred subject, and handed over to the charge of a Minister who was also in charge of primary education, do you think he would be likely to leave the Universities greater freedom?—I believe he would.

5825. Do you think the same thing would happen in England?—No, I do not.

5826. Why should it differ?—Because we in England have considered these matters very much more, and the Minister who is in charge of primary education here probably has all sorts of theories about primary education and about the Universities. I do not think in India they have.

5827. You think that the Indian mind would be so large that, although a Minister here is not capable of doing it, a Minister there might embrace the whole?—I think the Indian has a higher regard, perhaps a more superstitious regard, for the University than our officials have.

5828. There is another point which arises out of your own notes. You say you regret the hostile attitude so often taken up by Indians towards the Civil Service?—I do.

5829. You yourself do recognise, I presume, very fully the help and assistance which you have received?—Yes, I do; I cannot speak too highly of it.

5830. And you say that you have found as hearty and less excusable criticism from the Civil Service of the powers belonging to others?—Yes.

5831. And, I presume, the mercantile community?—Yes. They may not mean them, but I have heard it. I think it is a thousand pities. It is one of the things I regret very much. English people like myself——

Chairman.

5832. English?—Well, Scotch, English, Irish, European are not careful enough what we say to each other before Indians. Over and over again Indians, when talking about the Civil Service, have quoted to me things which Mr. So-and-so said.

Sir Henry Craik.

5833. If I may venture to say so, I have found myself very much the same experience, and have been roused to great indignation?—I have been much struck by it since I came back to London.

5834. I found it both in India and here. But I want to ask you this: Supposing you were asked in which section of the English community there exists the greatest interest in the Indians, and the greatest desire to raise them, and do anything that may benefit them, where would you say it existed?—Taken all round I would say the Service. Of course I could find you individuals.

5835. As a general rule it is far more developed in the Indian Civil Service than it is either amongst the military or the commercial classes?—Certainly I think it is. I think the others may have an interest, but it is only in a section of the Indian people. But I do not think the Indians know that.

5836. So far as you have seen, are you prepared to agree that if they were convinced, and so far as they were convinced, that this plan was for the good of Indians, it would have the strong support of the great mass of the Civil Service?—I believe that, certainly.

Sir J. D. Rees.

5837. When you were Governor in Madras you made great efforts to get into personal communication with people of all classes, did you not?—I think so.

5838. Are you aware you have been credited with that?—Well, I have been credited with some things which were not the case; but I did try to get in touch.

5839. Did they meet you more than half-way?—Certainly.

5840. Do you think you got at public Hindoo and Mohammedan opinion to some extent?—Well, of course, one can never speak for certain, but I think I got at it to some extent.

5841. You made some statements regarding the position of the Governor, and you said how much the people in India prefer a Governor with Parliamentary experience?—I say they prefer a Governor—I do not know necessarily with Parliamentary experience. I think they like somebody who has come out from this country.

5842. Somebody from public life?—I think so.

5843. Is not that feeling extremely strong?—It seemed to me that it was—unduly strong, I thought But I think they had it.

5844. Do you think it is the case that they not only accept, but welcome, a comparatively young and inexperienced man if he has had some public life experience?—Well, I do not think I ever heard of a Governor whom they did not welcome.

5845. Do not they attach very great importance to getting a man from that particular kind of plane? For instance, in the case of civil servant who retired and was reincarnated in public life, let us say, would they ever regard him as purged of original sin—a pukka Parliamentarian of the same kind as a man who started in Parliamentary life?—It would be a long time before they did, and I doubt if they ever would. Certainly they would be handicapped. But there may be exceptional cases. I have heard men mentioned to me.

5846. At the present time, seeing what the duties to be imposed upon the Governor are, in addition to those he has previously had to perform, is it not enough to tax tax the strength and resources of quite a young man?—I think it is. I wish I had been younger when I went to India, or more active.

5847. Something was said about the correspondence with the Secretary of State, and the Government of India saw no necessity for giving all Governors—that is, in future, Lieutenant-Governors—the right of corresponding directly with the Secretary of State on matters in regard to which the Presidency Governors enjoy this traditional privilege I should like to ask you whether, in point of fact, that privilege is not almost worthless, and that correspondence does not extend merely to matters of trifling importance, under custom?—I do not know how far I should answer.

5848. If it is not desirable to answer it, do not?—I was going to say if Mr. Montagu would pull me up.

5849. I will put it in another way. Speaking as an ex-Presidency Governor, is there any written or unwritten rule that all matters of importance should be transacted through the Government of India, and not directly with the Secretary of State?—No. Most of them, certainly, are through the Government of India; but there certainly are some matters which were of importance—they may not have been of very great importance, but were of importance.

5850. Do you think it is important that traditional privilege should be preserved and extended to all Governors?—I think so. I can conceive doing it the other way, but if it is not extended to the others, it should be taken away from the Presidency Governors.

5851. Was not some change in the position of the Presidency Governor long overdue? Was not the position of a Presidency Governor such that unless he is a man of exceptional individuality, he would most likely appear to be overborne by his civilian colleagues?—I have often heard people say so.

5852. Will not the position be greatly improved in that respect under this scheme?—People might think he was freer; I do not know that he really would be. I think the general impression would be so.

5853. Do you think the general impression would be right?—I think it is six of one and half-a-dozen of the other. It depends rather on the individual Governor.

5854. You say in your memorandum: "I do not attempt to define the expression 'responsible government'; to do so at all exhaustively would take up much time; but perhaps I ought to say that I do not see how there can be said to be 'responsible government' under a scheme at all like that contemplated by the Viceroy and the Secretary of State, unless the executive in whatever way it may be constituted is subordinate to the Legislative Council." Do you mean to some extent subordinate or wholly subordinate?—I do not see how there can be said to be responsible government under such a scheme unless the Executive is subordinate to the Legislative Council.

5855. Complete subordination?—Yes, subject to the control of Parliament.

5856. Is it the case that formerly Bengal was regarded as an uneasy, and Madras as an easy, throne?—I used to be told so.

5857. Is it the case whether or not Bengal has become easier, that Madras has become less easy?—I cannot say that from personal experience. When I was talking to Lord Willingdon the other day, I gathered that from what he had heard before he went out there he did not think Madras was as easy as it used to be. Bengal, I hope, is easier. It certainly became easier, to my mind, while I was there, but that was perhaps because I was getting more accustomed to it.

5858. Do you think, if that is so, that the change in Madras is due to the fact that there is a strong feeling there, amongst the articulate Indians, that they want to have a part in the Government, and want to liberalise its character?—I do not know whether the change is due to that, but I fancy the feeling exists, and I suppose it has grown. It has grown everywhere, I think.

5859. With your experience of Madras, do you think they are less anxious there to liberalise their administration and to participate in it, than they are in other parts of India—Bengal, for instance?—Do you mean the Madrasees are?

5860. Do you think they are less anxious than they are in other parts of India?—I do not know now, and as I say, I was only in Madras when I first went there. My feeling is that the Madrasee wants it quite as much as the Bengali. They did not put it in quite as strong language.

5861. Would you say there is rather a passion for education in Madras, almost Scotch or Welsh, rather English in its intensity?—I think there was a passion for education in Madras.

5862. That is not compatible with remaining behind?—I should not have thought so.

5863. Since you have left Madras you have, no doubt, been interested in its attitude towards this scheme, but if it is permissible, Lord Selborne, and relevant, as I think it is, I should like to ask Lord Carmichael whether he agrees in the attitude of Lord Pentland and his Government, the attitude of criticism and not of voluntary adoption of this scheme in the Bill? Can you answer that or not?

Chairman.] Lord Carmichael can tell us his own opinion of the scheme in the Bill, and anyone can make what contrast he likes.

The Witness.] I can hardly criticise it.

Sir J. D. Rees.

5864. I will not ask it. Would the adoption of Lord Pentland's Government's proposals, which in this behalf, have been accepted by the Government of India, as regards communal representation, mark off Madras rather conspicuously from the rest of India?—Madras people are rather proud of being different from the rest of India.

Chairman.] I do not think it is correct to say that the Government of India have accepted all the opinions of the Madras Government.

Sir J. D. Rees.] I did not say so.

The Witness.] I was going on to say that both before I went to Madras, and after I left Madras, I was always being told that Madras was a benighted Presidency. Perhaps I should continue to be told so with more reason if they did not treat this question differently.

Sir J. D. Rees.] I said the Government of India adopted the recommendation of the Madras Government in respect of communal representation. They do practically, do they not?

Chairman.] No.

Sir J. D. Rees.

5865. I thought they did. Then I am wrong. (To the Witness.) You remember the States of Travancore and Cochin?—I never visited either.

5866. But they were in political relations with your Government?—Yes.

5867. Do you think it is a good thing that they should be placed in political relations with the Government of India, as recommended by the report?—I have never really considered that matter. My own feeling is that they are better with the Government which is near them—the Local Government.

5868. Considering that Travancore is the fourth native state in India, if you take the population and revenue combined——

Chairman.] That does not come into the Bill.

Sir J. D. Rees.] No; but so many things have been touched upon which are in the Report, and not in the Bill.

Chairman.] I hope we will only deal with matters in the Report which affect the Bill.

Sir J. D. Rees.

5869. For instance, I want to ask Lord Carmichael a question arising immediately out of his evidence, but I confess it is not in the Bill. (To the Witness.) You spoke of the position of the Civil Service in India?—Yes

5870. And of the unduly and undesirably harsh judgments passed upon it by Indians in some quarters, and by Europeans in some quarters. As regards the judgment by Indians, do you think they are due to any extent, and if so, to what extent, to the fact that the Indian Civil Servants are not sufficiently competent scholars scholars in the vernacular to hold conversations at first hand freely with the natives of the country?—I cannot say from personal experience whether they can hold such conversations. Some of them can. I know some cannot; they have told me so; and I do not see how they can. It certainly is unfortunate that they cannot. It must be a handicap, but I do not know that that is what it is due to. The Indian, who is a native of India, does not know enough about the Civil Servant. He cannot. The Civil Servant is far too busy, I think, if he is doing his duty. I will give you what seems to be one example. There was a question in Bengal, when I was there, about dividing certain administrative units, in which Indian opinion was different from the opinion of the Civil Service as a rule, and certainly was different from my opinion. Various individual Civil Servants expressed one view strongly; others expressed another view not so strongly, but it was more the Indians' point of view, and the Indians naturally used to quote the opinion of the Civil Servant whose view was most like their own, opposed to the view which I certainly most fully adopted, that these units were too big, and that the Indian Civil Servant in them, owing to the size of those units, could not do his work properly. I could not help feeling that if the Indians who expressed the view had known more about Civil Servants, and known what I, at any rate, think they ought to try to do, they would have agreed with the men who said that the units were too big. And from what I could see of the individual men who expressed the views, I think they must have been rather ignorant. It is not their fault; it is the fault of the system. They have not time to get into touch with each other, as I should like to see them get into touch. I think I said in the evidence that I wrote that one use of the Governor from home is that he can help to modify the dislike, if I may use the word, of the Civil Servant by the Indian. I say that because I know many Indians who said to me, and I have had letters from them since I left India, saying that I was the first person who pointed out to them that there was more to be said for the civilian than they thought. I was the first person to point out to them certain facts which the natives of India—I am using "native" in the sense of people born and living in India, whether of Indian or European blood—probably think they know, but do not know; they have never been before them.

Mr. Spoor.

5871. I would like to ask a question on the point that you raised in opening this morning. The Secretary of State and Sir Henry Craik have already asked one or two questions about it, and that is your reference to the extreme danger of any vital departure from the scheme. I take it you mean by that, danger in the direction of weakening the proposals that the scheme put forward, which are in a measure embodied in the Bill?—Yes.

5872. Assuming that there is a change in another direction, if the Bill went a little further, should we get a more desirable result in the other direction?—I think there would be less danger certainly, provided the Viceroy and the Secretary of State both wanted to go further in that direction.

5873. Assume that this Committee decided to strengthen this Bill, and to give a wider electorate than Lord Southborough's Committee suggested, to give perhaps a full transference of functions as suggested by the Functions Committee, to give perhaps a measure of responsibility in the Central Government, would steps like that not only reduce the danger to which you refer, but be a positive benefit to the position of Britain in India?—It seems to me there are two different points in your question. As far as the danger I referred to is concerned, it would certainly lessen the danger.

5874. If the Bill is strengthened?—Yes, because you would not then have the hostility of those who want to see it rather greater, but I would not do it unless I knew that both the Viceroy and the Secretary of State were willing to do it.

5875. I was on the question of Indian public opinion, and what Indian public opinion is really expecting?—

I think Indian public opinion now must be expecting, at any rate, all that was in the Report.

5876. In your memorandum you say: "Even if I did not feel that it was in itself desirable, I think developments since I left India make it absolutely necessary in the interests of the whole British Empire to initiate as soon as possible some scheme of reform." And so on, as to the developments since you left. Do you refer to the disturbances which have taken place in India, or public opinion?—No, I was referring mainly to Mr. Montagu's visit to India, and to the publication of that Report by the Viceroy, and the discussion on it based on that Report. I did not refer to the disturbances at all.

5877. You refer to the growth of interest throughout India on the whole question of self-government?—Certainly there is that growth; that has something to do with it.

5878. We have had a lot of evidence here that probably you may have read indicating a very extraordinary development in that direction?—I am sure there is a great development.

5879. You believe yourself that that is a general development, quite a spontaneous one? I mean it is not something engineered by two or three individuals and affecting only a few people?—As far as Madras is concerned I cannot say. As far as Bengal is concerned I must say that I think that nobody could be there without being struck by the growth of that development during the five years I was there unless I underrated it very much when I went there. I may have done that. I will take one thing which I think people do not seem to realise sufficiently. I have been told in India, and told out of India, that the ordinary ryot—the ordinary agricultural labourer—takes no particular interest in politics. I have said so to myself. I often rode about in Bengal and walked about in parts, where I dare say a great many of the people did not know I was the Governor. Over and over again I came across men reading the newspaper to a large number of Indians. Very often, when they saw me, they hid the newspaper and were attending to other business.

5880. That is extremely interesting?—It was not always easy for me, because I did not speak their languages as I should have liked to have spoken them, and so it was not always easy for me to find out what they were reading. If they had been a number of colliers in a constituency that I used to sit for in Midlothian, and I found them reading a newspaper, I would have asked them what they were reading, whether it was football, or what. Generally, all I could do was to find out what newspaper it was they were having read to them. It must have been politics. It may have been good politics or bad politics, but men do not sit down to a man reading the newspaper if they have not some slight interest, and I believe there is far more interest than I used to think there was. I believe there was more of that interest in the last year I was in Bengal than there was—I am not going to say in the first year I was there, because in the first year I may not have known it, but in the second year, when I began to realise there was such interest, and when I used to talk to people who are very much abused very often—police officers. I certainly gathered that they thought so.

5881. Generally, as the result of that observation that you made during the recent years, you believe that will continue to grow? You think the people will become increasingly interested in this question, and therefore you ask for elasticity in this scheme?—I cannot help thinking they must.

5882. And that is really why you ask for elasticity in this scheme, so that it will be possible to adapt it to changing conditions and to political growth?—Yes; I am very anxious that there should be elasticity for that reason and other reasons.

5883. I have a question now which relates to the statement as to the hostile attitude of Indians towards the Civil Service, as contrasted with the criticism of the I.C.S. from Europeans. You say that you have heard as harsh criticism from Europeans, and much less excusable. I would like to ask you, had the Indians good grounds for their criticisms?—No. I did not mean it in that way. I meant that harsh criticism criticism must come, I think, a great deal from ignorance, and I think it is least excusable that there should be that ignorance on the part of Europeans. There is sometimes ground for criticisms. I have often said it to them, "Criticise the Governor as much as you like; there may be very good grounds for the criticism."

5884. We have had evidence of the existence of a certain amount of misunderstanding between Indians and the I.C.S., which may be due to a variety of causes. I have heard it suggested that it is partly due to the exclusive attitude adopted by some I.C.S. people. I know it is said to be a characteristic of the British people. But do you believe it obtains rather dangerously in India?—I would not go so far as to say that, but I do think there is an element of danger in it. I wish there was less of it.

Lord Sydenham.

5885. I daresay you know the Legislative Council in Bombay had an Indian majority of 12, and a non-official majority of 22 in a Ministry of 46, but in Bengal I understand your Council had a bare elected majority?—Yes.

5886. In a Council like that it is grossly inaccurate to speak of an official bloc, is it not?—I never talk of an official bloc myself. It does not exist.

5887. Did you ever issue a whip, either to your officials or to your nominated members?—No, never.

5888. Did you expect every nominated member to vote exactly in accordance with his conscience?—Well, I remember more than one case in which it was suggested to me that I might ask the nominated members to support the Government, and I discussed it with my Executive Council, and we came to the conclusion that we would leave it entirely to them. No nominated members asked me if I would like that they should vote with me. I remember one particular case in which two men came and told me that they would be quite willing to go out if I would rather that they did. I told them certainly I would like them to vote as they thought right. I think they appreciated that, and I believe that is the line that every Governor should take.

5889. You said you thought the Council in Bengal did not thoroughly realise their power, and that is what has often struck me very much. Do you think the reason is that these public deliberative assemblies are somewhat new to India, and, therefore, time is required, and perhaps a good many years, before they are thoroughly acclimatised?—Yes, I think time is required. I do not think they do thoroughly realise their power.

5890. Have not these Councils got some advantages which are not possessed by Parliament here?—I think they have.

5891. Is not every Bill in Bengal published in advance for public examination and criticism?—I fancy every one is. Certainly, I should expect it is.

5892. It is not possible in an Indian Province that a Bill should be received in the morning and Second Reading asked for in the afternoon, as has happened in the House of Lords?—Certainly not.

5893. Has not every private member a right to move a resolution?—Yes.

5894. Which must be debated?—Yes. I think the Governor can refuse, but a member can certainly move a resolution otherwise.

5895. Is it not an exceedingly rare thing for a Governor to refuse the introduction of a resolution?—Very rare.

5896. He would only do it if it were opposed to the public interest, as he thought?—Yes, I think I may say that on one occasion I refused one on a somewhat odd ground. I should say that it was in the public interest that I refused it, but what appealed to me most at the moment was that I thought it might make the mover and those who supported him look rather foolish. I knew what the result would be.

5897. That is very rare?—Yes.

5898. Do private members of the House of Commons enjoy such extreme facilities as that?—No.

5899. Has not the real disability of these Councils in the past arisen from the fact that their field of action was so rigidly circumscribed by the extraordinarily centralised system we have allowed to grow up in India?—Yes.

5900. And also you found, as I did, an extraordinary amount of interference with their Bills by the Government of India?—Yes.

5901. So that those two points have been really the great disabilities under which these Morley-Minto Councils have laboured?—They have been very great disabilities.

5902. If the large decentralisation now contemplated is carried out greatly increased powers will automatically accrue to those Councils?—Yes

5903. Therefore their position and powers will be greatly increased?—Yes

5904. Have you seen the proposals of the Franchise Committee and do you approve of them?—I have just read them but not very carefully. I have not gone into the evidence.

5905. You have seen the criticism as regards the practical difficulty of polling 70,000 people?—Yes, I have.

5906. Do you agree with that criticism?—I was struck by finding that the Government of Bengal thought they could poll their people. I saw, for instance, that Bakerganj was quoted. I do not know whether I gathered it from what I read there, or from what a Bengal official told me in a letter, that the local Government think that that difficulty has been exaggerated. I should say it had been, from what I remember. But I do feel the difficulty. I think the local Government is the body that could pronounce on that.

5907. In your time, you say, there was no movement towards communal representation in Madras?—Not that I know of. There may have been.

5908. Was not the whole situation very greatly changed when the new proposals were made public?—Of course it was.

5909. You would not definitely tell us that you consider that any alarm on the part of non-Brahmins is quite unjustified?—No; I do not know. I am surprised it is as great as it is—and that I did not know more about it if it is justified, and I expect there is a good deal of justification.

5910. You found your Indian Member of Council was a great help and support to you?—Yes, I felt so.

5911. Your Government in those days always faced the Legislative Council as a united body?—Yes.

5912. From your Indian Member you got support on the Council?—Yes.

5913. His support was often of extreme value?—Yes

5914. Under the proposals of the Bill, what is the position of a Government if one part of it is opposed to the other in the Legislative Council?—I see that difficulty well.

5915. How do you get over it?—It is very difficult, I admit that. I mean, I may say without hesitation, that diarchy does not seem to me perfect by any means. I wish there was not diarchy; but it has been suggested and accepted by so many people.

5916. Do you think it is a practical measure that two sections of a Government should confront the Legislative Council with opposite views, one opposing the other?—I think it is very difficult indeed.

5917. Is it thinkable?—Yes, because you have put it to me. But I think it is very difficult to see how it is going to work out. I think it will make a great deal of difficulty for the Governor.

5918. You said in your Answers that your desire is that there should be two officials in your Executive Council, and that there shall not be less than two Indians?—That was my view. Perhaps I did not put it very rightly, but that was the line I was always advocating.

5919. You think that a Council of four would meet your requirements?—I do not know that they would now. I think if I had been given a Council of four, of which two at least were Indians, and certainly not more than two were officials, it would have gone a long way; we could have got a great deal more done.

5920. You think it is necessary that the Governor should have sufficient expert advice, especially when he comes out fresh from England?—Yes; he wants expert advice.

5921. I did not quite understand what you thought of the Grand Committee. The Grand Committee, as we understand it, is one on which it is engineered that the Government shall have a majority of one in order to enable the Executive Council to pass a Bill. Do you not think that that very precarious majority must put a premium on political intrigue?—I do not like it altogether, and one of the reasons why I do not like it is that I think it will help to increase the risk of political intrigue.

5922. In fact, would you go so far as to say that a majority of one is not really a safe majority?—I do not think a majority of one is a safe majority.

5923. But if you have not a safe majority, what is the use of a Grand Committee?—I think it is no use for this purpose.

5924. Would it not be much better if, say, two-thirds of the elected members of Council rejected a Bill, frankly to drop it and throw the responsibility on the Council for rejecting it?—I think generally it would be better to drop it, but it might be a Bill which was absolutely essential.

5925. In what sense essential?—Perhaps nothing is essential, but it might be one which the Governor thought was absolutely essential. You have been a Governor, like myself, and you can conceive that there might be some agitation, and some inhabitants of your Presidency, English or Indian, might think that the way in which you or I felt we must treat with the matter for the safety of the Province was wrong. I referred a little while ago to the Rowlatt Acts. I am not going to say whether they were necessary or not, but I take it all the non-officials were against them, were they not?

5926. Indian officials?—I cannot be sure. I did not go into the figures accurately. But I can imagine that I might have thought that the only way to deal with a situation was by passing some Bill which none of my non-officials would be willing to pass.

5927. But in a Provincial Council you are not likely to wish to pass Rowlatt Bills?—I do not think I should have been anxious. I may say here, because in this I differ from many people, that I believe that sort of thing could be dealt with in the Provincial Council with a greater hope of success than in the Government of India.

5928. On the whole, you think it would be best, if the Government cannot persuade, say, two-thirds of the elected members of Council to pass a Bill, to let it drop?—On the whole, certainly. I should say ninety-nine times out of a hundred, and perhaps nine hundred and ninety-nine times out of a thousand.

5929. I see you strongly support direct communication between Provincial Governors and the Secretary of State?—Yes.

5930. Do you think, if that is not permitted, a great deal of the decentralisation which is proposed will be in practice nullified?—I think so. I think one of the dangers is this. It leads to too much being done, so to speak, by private letters.

5931. Do you think it is really possible to forecast the result of this Bill, when such an immense number of important points are left to be determined by Rules?—I think it is impossible to forecast them.

5932. As there is no experience of a diarchy system in any Government in the world, must not any opinion given on that subject really be in the nature of a guess?—Yes.

5933. And must not that apply also to the Bill unless we know the Rules which are to be made under it?—Yes, I think so. I think we ought to know the Rules which are to be made under it.

Chairman.] We are very much obliged to you.

(The Witness is directed to withdraw.)

(After a short adjournment.)

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE EDWIN S. MONTAGU IN THE CHAIR.

SIR ALEXANDER CARDEW, K.C.S.I., called in; and Examined, as follows:—

Mr. Montagu.

5934. Sir Alexander, I think I ought to express Lord Selborne's apologies to you for his inability to be present this afternoon, and also the regrets of the Committee that you were called, I think, earlier than was convenient to you. The Chairman feels, however, that you will probably be in a position to give the Committee the information which it requires from an official witness from Madras. I understand that you were a member of the Executive Council of Madras until quite recently?—Yes, I was for five years, from about 10th April, 1914, until about a corresponding date in 1919.

5935. Would you care to say anything in amplification of the statement which you have handed in in reply to questions which have been sent to you?—It is rather difficult to make a general statement. I have not been conversant with this matter for some months, and I am afraid I have not followed the discussions which have occurred since I left India, and I have hardly had time to read the papers which I obtained from the India Office. So that, so far as recent developments of the discussion are concerned, I feel hardly in the position to make any lengthy general statement.

The questions and answers referred to are as follows:—

1. Do you accept the proposition that it is desirable to bring about the progressive realisation of responsible government in India? and, if so, how do you define the expression "responsible government"? And do you, generally, accept the proposition contained in the Preamble?—I am unable to accept the proposition as stated in Question 1 for two reasons. In the first place I cannot accept it because it seems to be something different from the declaration of the 20th August, 1917, which spoke of "the gradual development of self-governing institutions with a view to the progressive realisation of responsible government." The first portion of this sentence has been omitted from the proposition as stated in Question 1, with the result that the gradual character which the development should possess is obscured or obliterated. I accept the declaration of the 20th August, 1917, but I do not accept the proposition that responsible government is to be introduced except gradually. In the second place I cannot accept the proposition in Question 1 because it is apparently intended to lead up to the acceptance of the draft Bill, and I am unable to ascertain from that Bill how far it is in accordance with the declaration of the 20th August, 1917, and how far it is intended to depart from that declaration. The draft Bill consists largely of a power to frame rules; but it is not accompanied by a draft of the rules proposed to be framed under it, and it is therefore impossible to learn from it whether the stage which the Bill represents can reasonably be described as a gradual development of self-governing institutions. It would not, for instance, be, in my opinion, a reasonable interpretation of the declaration of the 20th August to confer at once 95 per cent. of full responsible government and to reserve only 5 per cent. for grant at a later stage, and I should prefer not to accept a proposition which, while apparently resembling the declaration of 20th August, 1917, differs in certain terms from it until I am unable to ascertain that the Bill proposed to be founded on that proposition is really in accordance with the declaration and not in contravention of it.

2. Do you think that the realisation of responsible government in the Provinces involves the establishment in Provincial Legislatures of a substantial elected majority (Clause 6)?—I agree that the establishment in Provincial Legislatures of a substantial elected majority is essential to the full realisation of responsible government; but as the policy of His Majesty's

Mr. Montagu—continued.

Majesty's Government, as declared on the 20th August, 1917, appears to have been contemplated, not the immediate introduction of full responsible government but the gradual development of self-governing institutions with a view to the progressive realisation of responsible government which is to be achieved only by successive stages. I do not think that the creation of substantial elected majorities in the Provincial Legislatures is an immediate consequence of the acceptance of the policy laid down in the declaration of the 20th August, 1917.

3. Do you think that the non-official members of the Provincial Legislatures should possess power to control the actions and policy of the Executive? Do you think they possess such power at present?—I do not think that the non-official members of the Provincial Legislatures should possess power to control the actions and policy of the Executive, if the terms of this question are to be accepted as general and complete. They do not possess such power at present, and the grant of such power would seem to me to be equivalent to the grant of full responsible government which, according to the declaration of the 20th August, 1917, was to be granted by gradual development of self-governing institutions and by successive stages.

4. Do you think that there are certain matters or functions of Government in the Provinces in which at present the Provincial Executive must remain responsible to the Secretary of State and Parliament, and must, therefore, be in a position to enforce its wishes?—I accept this proposition, though a definition of the words "certain matters" is required in order to make the meaning of the proposition clear.

5. If you accept the propositions stated under Questions 1 to 4, do you think that the dual form of government embodied in the Bill is the best means of securing them? If not, what are your objections to that feature of the Bill, and by what other means would you attempt to secure the objects in view?—As regards the dual form of government embodied in the Bill, it is impossible to form an accurate judgment as to the scope and effect of the measure unless a draft of the rules proposed to be made under the Bill is available. The Bill consists largely of a power to make rules, and it seems to me to be essential that the draft Bill and the draft rules shall be considered together.

6. If you have any other method to suggest, does it (i.) provide possibilities of advances by stages and facilitate the "progressive realisation of responsible government"; and, if it does, in what way? (Clause 2, 3, etc.) And (ii.), does it afford means of judgment (a) to the electors and (b) to the Statutory Commission which is to examine and report on progress, of the success or failure in results of the control exercised by the Legislature and those who represent it in the Executive?—The suggestion which I support for giving effect to the policy laid down in the declaration of 20th August, 1917, is that contained in the Letter No. 59, dated 17th January, 1918, from the Government of Madras to the Government of India. That Letter has apparently not been laid before the Committee, as the scheme of Sub-Provincial Councils which it advocates was noticed and rejected in paragraphs 245 and 246 of the Joint Report, though the scheme there mentioned emanated from a different source and therefore probably differed in some features. I believe that the Madras Government's scheme, which would have made over complete branches of the administration to Sub-Provincial Councils based, where possible, on linguistic divisions, while reserving legislation and the power of the purse to a unified Provincial Government, would have possessed many advantages over the system of dualism contemplated in the Bill.

7, 8. If you consider a dual form of government acceptable in principle, are there any points of detail the modifications of which you regard as necessary? If so, what are those points, and what modifications would you suggest? In particular, do you think (i.) that Ministers should hold office "during pleasure"? — i.e., should be liable to removal if they are unable to support the action decided upon in their department by the Governor, or if they fail to retain the confidence of the Legislature? (Clause 3 (1)). (ii.) That the Governor should have power to disregard the opinion of his Ministers if he considers that action in accordance with that opinion is inconsistent with the due discharge of his responsibilities? (Clause 3 (3)). (iii.) That the Executive Council should in all Provinces normally consist of one official European and one non-official Indian? (Clause 4.) (iv.) That the Governor should have power to dissolve his Legislative Council? (Clause 7 (4))?—Having thus endeavoured to make it clear that I am unable to accept the propositions laid down in Questions 1 to 3, because they seem to me to go beyond the declaration of the 20th August, 1917, and that I am unable to approve the scheme of government which is embodied in the Bill without knowing what the Rules proposed to be made thereunder will contain, I propose to refer to such points of detail as can be ascertained from the draft Bill and as seem to me most to require modification, as follows:—(1) Referring to Question 8 (1) it appears to me that if the Governor is not invested with power to dismiss a Minister of whose conduct he disapproves, as at present provided in Clause 3 (1) of the Bill, the practical effect will be that the Minister will have power to dismiss the Governor, for one of the two must go if a deadlock is to be avoided. (2) In Clause 3 (1) of the Bill it appears to me to be desirable, in the interests of the Governor, if for no other reason, to fix in the Bill both the maximum number of Ministers and their rate of pay in order that the Governor may not be exposed to pressure to create fresh ministerial appointments, and that he may not be required to deal with inflated demands for salary. (3) Referring to Question 8 (ii), in the absence of the Rules proposed to be made under Clause 1 (i) (d) of the Bill and of the draft of His Majesty's instructions, it is impossible to judge what the respective position of the Governor and Minister will be in regard to transferred subjects or on whom responsibility is to rest. If it is desired, as suggested in Question 6, to afford to the electors and to the Statutory Commission of 1930 the means of judging of the success or failure of the scheme, then the Governor should not, I think, have the power to disregard the opinion of his Ministers and to require action to be taken against their advice. If, however, the interests of the country, and not of the experiment are to be considered, then I think the Governor should have the power to prevent irreparable mistakes by requiring action to be taken contrary to their opinions. (4) It seems to be proposed, from Question 8 (iii), that the Executive Council should in all Provinces normally include only one official. If so, I think the proposal is to be deprecated. Having just completed five years as member of a Provincial Government, I can speak with knowledge as to the overwhelming burden of work at present, and as to the need for more men to do it. As the number of Ministers intended to be appointed under the Bill is unfixed and as the departments proposed to be transferred to Ministers are not determined, it is impossible to judge what work will remain with the Council after the transfer. But the fact that the Ministers will be without experience cannot be ignored. The Joint Report itself speaks of "the immense burden of government in India being transferred to comparatively inexperienced hands," but even this hardly brings out adequately the fact that the future Minister may be entirely without training either in administration or in business. A Minister may be, and indeed probably will often be, a High Court vakil who has never even served on a local Council and has never had to manage any establishment beyond his own clerk and assistant. Experience in the last ten years has proved that such men are at a great disadvantage, and will need all the assistance they can get from the trained officials who are to deliberate jointly with them. The less thoughtful and more prejudiced section of Indian opinion may object to the retention of more than one official in the Government, but in the interests of the country, as well as of what the Government of India calls "this vast experiment in constitutional change," it is in my opinion very necessary, for the present at least, to keep two members of Council who will be officials of experience and to delete the first five lines of Clause 4 of the Bill. (5) Referring to Question 8 (iv.), the necessity for providing some power to dissolve the Legislative Council is presumably not questioned. Each Minister will apparently be separately appointed and will be separately responsible for his own Department, so that individual Ministers could not be invested with power to dissolve, and the Bill does not contain any provision for the appointment of a Prime Minister. Moreover, each Minister holds office at the pleasure of the Governor, and it hardly seems appropriate that the power of dissolution should vest in a Minister occupying such a position. In the result the power to dissolve must, it seems to me, be conferred on the Governor and no one else.

9, 10. Referring back to Questions 2, 3 and 4, if your answers to the first and third of these are in the affirmative, and if you think that the Legislatures should be given greater powers of control and influence than they possess at present, do you regard the limitations imposed, generally, by Clause 9 of the Bill upon their financial and legislative powers as (i.) suitable, or as (ii.) unnecessarily severe, or as (iii.) inadequate to safeguard the responsibilities which the Government owes in the last resort to Parliament (Clause 9). In particular, (i.) do you think that the Legislature should have power with whatever limitations to vote Supplies (Clause 9 (2))? (ii.) Do you accept the plan of Grand Committees as the means of giving to the Government the power to secure essential legislation in the event of their failure to carry their propositions in the Council? If so, have you any modifications of detail to suggest? If not, what other method would you suggest to secure the object in view?—As my answers to Questions 2 and 4 are not in the affirmative, it is perhaps hardly necessary for me to answer these inquiries, but I would venture to suggest (1) that to invest the Legislature with absolute power over the Budget for transferred subjects may prove, if the subjects to be transferred are numerous or important, to constitute so sudden and extreme a step in advance as to be in conflict with the declaration of the 20th August, 1917; (2) that the device of a Grand Committee will probably be found in practice to fail to give the Government the power, as desired, to secure essential legislation.

11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16. Do you accept the position adopted in the Bill (Part II.) that the time has not yet come to give the Legislative Assembly a similar measure of control over the Central Government as that given to Provincial Legislative Councils over Provincial Governments? Do you agree that it is advisable, none the less, to provide for a substantial elective majority in the Indian Legislature (Clause 16)? Do you accept the plan of a bicameral Legislature as arising out of this, as constituting both a satisfactory machine for the ordinary purposes of legislation and as affording the means to the Governor-General in Council to secure legislation which he regards as essential (Clauses 14, 15, and 16)? Do you accept the provisions of the Bill as to the course of legislation in the Indian Legislature (Clause 20 (3) and (4))? Or do you regard them as unnecessarily restrictive on the popular will, or as an inadequate means of ensuring to the Governor-General in Council the discharge of his responsibilities? Do you accept the changes made by the Bill (Clause 21) in the constitution of the Governor-General's Executive Council? If not, what are your reasons, and what modifications would you suggest? Do you think that the development of Provincial autonomy, on the one hand, and of self-government in the Provinces on the other, involves any modification of the provisions of Sections 2, 33, and 45 of the Government of India Act (Clause 23?—All these questions affect the Government of India, with which I am but little acquainted.

17. Do you agree that the gradual realisation of responsible government involves periodical examination of progress by independent authority, and that the provisions of Clause 28 of the Bill are well designed to afford such examination?—I am not sure whether this attempt to tie the hands of future Governments and to prevent an inquiry from being held at an earlier or later date than 10 years is legitimate.

18. Are there any matters which it is proposed in the Bill to deal with by rule which you would suggest should be provided for in the Bill?—The number of members of the Executive Council is fixed by definite provision in Clause 4 of the Bill, while the number of Ministers is not fixed in any way. I think both should be fixed in the Bill. Again, the number of members of the various Legislative Councils is fixed by definite provision in the Bill (Clause 6 and Schedule 1), but the franchise by which they are to be elected and other matters connected with their nomination or election are left to be dealt with by rules. I think that Schedule 1 should be omitted, and the question it covers left to be dealt with by rules under the Act, as is the case under the existing law.

Sir J. D. Rees.

5936. May I ask you with reference to your Memorandum. You say that the proposition stated in Question 1 you cannot accept, because it seems to be something different from the Declaration of the 20th August, 1917, which spoke of a gradual development. Do you not gather that if the British Government has to set the pace it also has to decide what is gradual and what is not? Are not they the same thing?—The British Government, no doubt, has to decide the pace.

5937. Would not that cover your objection here? Can you retain it in the face of that?—I thought that the Declaration of the 20th August declared that the progress would be gradual.

5938. Would you call this present change precipitate?—Very—decidedly.

5939. You say: "I am unable to ascertain that the Bill proposed to be founded on the proposition is really in accordance with the Declaration of 20th August." But you have the Bill?—I have the Bill.

5940. The Bill, I presume, is a draftsman's job; it is drafted on the Report, is it not?—The Bill gives power to make rules to a great extent. The rules I have not yet seen, and I do not know whether they are before the Committee.

5941. I ask you, as one familiar with the subject: No rules can ever be legal unless they are within the purview of the Bill. Rules cannot get outside the sections—they must be within the sections of the Bill?—No doubt, but the section gives a very wide discretion as to the form the rules are to take.

5942. In answer to Question 5, you say: "As regards the dual form of Government embodied in the Bill, it is impossible to form an accurate judgment as to the scope and effect of the measure, unless a draft of the rules proposed to be made under the Bill is available"; did you have the Report of the Franchise and Functions Committee?—I did not understand that they were referred to in the Bill.

5943. I do not say that they are, but is it not inferable that they are to be the basis—the text?—Without reference to the Government of India's criticisms thereon?

5944. That, I could not tell you?—I do not know myself, of course.

5945. You say, in answer to Questions 9 and 10: "As my answers to Questions 2 and 4," in which you say, "I accept this proposition," which leaves me in some doubt as to what these answers mean?—Yes, I should have left out "4" in that answer to 9, and said: "As my answers to Questions 2 and 3," I think; 4 is merely the question of decentralisation, I understand; as far as I understand the question, it is a matter which refers only to decentralisation or to responsibility, and I should have left out 4 in the answer to 9.

5946. Upon number 2—I take the same answers to questions 9 and 10—you say: "I would venture to suggest that to invest the Legislature with absolute power over the Budget for transferred subjects, may constitute constitute too sudden and extreme a step," and you object to it, but may I ask if you hold that the Legislature is invested with absolute power over the Budget for the transferred subjects?—Under the Bill?

5947. Yes. Absolute power, I take it, cannot be compatible with the right of re-entry or veto, can it?—If you will forgive me while I look at the Bill.

Mr. Montagu.

5948. It is Clause 9, I think?—That seems to be a point based on the word "absolute," and apart from the power to dissolve, I do not see any power to deal with the decisions of the Legislative Council relating to transferred subjects.

Sir J. D. Rees.

5949. You do not understand that to be given?—I do not see any power to deal with votes of the Legislative Council which relate to transferred subjects on the Budget.

5950. Is it not practically in the power of the Governor to deal with that, supposing he is willing to exercise his power? He has power, has he not, under the Bill?—By dismissing the Minister.

5951. Without doing that, I understand; I may be wrong, but if you will give me your answer I do not propose to go through the Bill now?—I am unable to find any power beyond that dealing with the Minister under the provisions which exist dealing with that matter. I should say to you and to the Chairman that I only had a few hours in which to consider these matters.

5952. I would like to ask you, arising out of evidence given by others here, have you seen any evidence in Madras of a determination on the part of the Civil Service to wreck the scheme?—No.

5953. Or of wholesale retirement on proportionate pension?—Not wholesale, I think; some will retire, no doubt.

5954. You have written a Memorandum, which has formed the subject of frequent questions and answers, which is attached to the other Blue Book—do you remember it—about caste?—Yes.

5955. At what time did you observe a strong anti-high caste or anti-Brahmin movement commencing—two years ago?—My own personal observation really only dates from the time when Mrs. Besant started her Home Rule propaganda. It is a matter of the last four years or something of that sort.

5956. In your early days, did you serve in the districts?—To some extent—not very lengthy.

5957. In those days, when you lived in the districts and met the villagers, did you see anything of it?—I should say that there was always a great deal of jealousy of the Brahmins on the part of the non-Brahmins, but it did not crystallise into anything like a political movement at that date.

5958. A jealousy of their getting the appointments?—Yes.

5959. Or of their position as leaders of the Hindoo people?—I should say of their getting the large share they possess of Government patronage and appointments.

5960. Are not the Hindoos a remarkably tolerant people, religiously speaking?—I think so. I think toleration is a mark of all polytheistic religions, and of the Hindoo temperament.

5961. I propose to ask a question or two when you are by yourself subsequently, if the Chairman allows, upon this subject; now I leave that for the moment and ask whether there were not friendly feelings between the Indian and the English merchants in Madras, and are there not still?—I think so; I think there was and is friendly feeling.

5962. Has the support of these reforms by the more articulate portion of the people in Madras led to any sort of antagonism between them and the others? Has it developed an antagonistic sort of feeling which did not exist before?—Probably, on the Indian side to some extent, yes; I think we have seen evidences of it. For instance, the Hindoo newspaper has clearly shown antagonistic feeling to British capital and enterprise, but I should think the English merchant does not feel anything of the kind.

5963. Do you think that the fact that the larger proportion of the revenue levied in Madras is spent in other Provinces has any connection with that? It was suggested here that that amounted to the negation of self-government. I understand, but I do not know if I do understand it clearly. What do you think of that? Is Madras very unjustly treated in connection with financial matters?—I am afraid it is. I must say that I think clearly that the financial arrangements proposed in the Report, which are based upon schemes put forward by the financial department of the Government of India, do serious injustice to Madras, and will be keenly resented by the popular leaders in Madras. It is an iniquitous proposal to saddle Madras with such a large share.

5964. Do you realise that it is stated in the Report that it will be a temporary arrangement, to be redressed as soon as possible?—Yes. If it were to take the shape of a loan from Madras without interest, to be repaid when the rearrangement is carried out, I have no doubt that the Madras people, who are essentially a reasonable people, would not object; but if it is to be a permanent subvention from Madras to other wealthy Provinces—much wealthier Provinces, such as Bombay and Bengal—it will cause extremely strong feeling.

5965. Will not this scheme be the means of redressing a difficulty which existed and which you feel has existed during your service?—I do not know whether it will provide means of redressing it.

5966. It has existed for a long time, has it not?—It has; but the difficulties of discovering the true financial position before it was worked out for the Provinces by the financial department of the Government of India were really insuperable. The Government could not find out how far they were being taxed for the benefit of other Provinces. A clear statement showing how many lakhs of rupees are taken from each Province was never available, and when the Madras Government made representations saying, "We think that we ought to have more help or more profitable revenues made over to us," they were always met by the reply that other Provinces had their grievances, and that the thing had to be taken as a whole, and we could not get the detailed information.

5967. May I take you to the letter of the 10th December, 1918, in which I notice the Government of Madras said that dualism has not been welcomed by any of the political parties among the Indians. Do you adhere to that personally?—I do not know where it is to be found.

5968. It is the letter of the 10th December, 1918, to the Government of India, on page 166 of Command Paper 123. The part of the letter to which I am referring is at the top of page 167. It is the letter of your own Government?—Yes, I think that statement is correct. I do not know that any political party amongst the Indians has welcomed this scheme of dualism.

5969. As an individual, do you think you can say that no party in Madras is in favour of the scheme of this Bill?—That is not the wording; the wording is that this part of the proposal has not been welcomed by any political party.

5970. Dualism has been accepted as an essential ingredient in the scheme of reform?—It is essential, because it seemed to be the only way reform could be got through, and a political party which advocates a very large measure of reform would rather take it plus dualism than have no reforms at all and reject dualism, but I do not think the representatives of the most advanced section want dualism. They would like to have entire self-government immediately.

5971. I take it that you think this letter is an extreme statement of the case?—No, I am inclined to think that that statement is substantially correct. That is my impression.

5972. Take page 175 of the Blue Book you have there; at the bottom of the page there is another letter from the Governmennt of Madras which says: "Although under the various Provincial settlements the Provincial Governments are nominally given the control of certain heads of revenue, the fact is that under the restrictions laid down by the Government of India and the Secretary of State, the powers of the the Local Government in regard to the expenditure of these revenues are so restricted as to deprive them of all real independence." I am not contesting that at all, but upon that I ask whether the position of the Local Government in that important matter of finance will not be immensely improved if those proposals become law?—My impression is that that is at present entirely unascertainable from the papers. I imagine that there will be a large measure of decentralisation, but I am not aware that anything definite has been settled yet which enables one to assert definitely that there will be larger powers. I presume larger powers must be given, but the degree of control of the India Office remains, I think, unsettled. I am not, perhaps, fully conversant with the subject, but I do not know that the control which the India Office is to exercise in future has been defined. For instance, if you take those illustrations that are given in that paragraph, no scheme which exceeds 50,000 rupees can be sanctioned by the Local Government without the previous sanction of the Secretary of State. I am not aware of any declaration which will prove clearly that that limit will be increased. The Madras Government proposed either to remove the limit altogether or to increase it tenfold.

5973. I was not talking about that particular string on the page you are now referring to, but I was asking you whether, on the whole, the position of Madras and other Provincial Governments will not be financially far more independent if this scheme is adopted than it is now. It cannot be much worse, according to your own showing, because you say that there is no independence at all. Will it not be much better?—I can only say, as a pious hope, that I hope so.

5974. Will you take the Blue Book, Command Paper 141, which contains your Memorandum, to which we have so often been referred?—I am sorry, I have not got it. (The Blue Book is laid before the Witness.)

5975. Without waiting for it, there is a reference here: "In view of the large volume of illiteracy, it would be vain to hope that any general electorate could be framed." I should like to ask whether you think the average ryot in Madras is not a sensible person, and very capable of voting for the person he thinks most likely to serve his interests in the election?—I should think the answer to that should be emphatically no, because you couple the question as to his being a sensible person with the power to vote for the person most likely to serve his interests.

5976. I said "the person he thinks most likely"?—He is a fairly shrewd fellow on his crops and agriculture, but I should doubt his having much capacity of judging between one candidate and another. I should doubt it extremely.

5977. Do you think that the representation of European commerce that is proposed under the scheme is sufficient?—They are to have five votes in 120. It hardly seems adequate to me, five in 120.

5978. I should like to ask a few questions, if I may, on your note on page 124 of Command Paper 141. You say that you accept the policy of the declaration of the 20th August, 1917, and then you say that you desire to see a gradual advance towards democracy, but having examined the question in this Memorandum you come to the conclusion that India is unfitted for any democratic advance. Am I mistaken in gathering that?—I think that under present conditions any large introduction of democratic principles would be premature.

5979. I put it to you that if the religious belief of the people which you analyse and explain is such as you describe, would you postpone any democratic advance until they had entirely abandoned the Hindu religion?—Religion, it seems to me, is susceptible of modification without abandonment. No doubt the fact that caste has its centre and basis in religion raises a great difficulty in the way of the advance of democratic feeling. I would not postpone all progress until the religion of the people has been changed. I think that gradually political ideas will tend to dissever religion from this basis on which caste at present rests.

5980. Do you foresee any time in your mind now or can you say how long a time it would be before any advance of this character could be carried out, because I do not follow it from your memorandum?—

I really would not like to commit myself to a date at which such an advance as this would be in accordance with the best interests of the people.

5981. I did not ask you for a date?—I should like to wait and see the progress of the next ten years. It is only during the last ten years that we have had the present Constitution; it has not been worked out, and education has really made very small impression on the masses of the people. The difficulties, it seems to me, of such a scheme as this at present, if the interests of the people are to be considered, are insuperable.

5982. You say in your Memorandum: "A man born a Brahmin cannot be other than a Brahmin, and a man born a Pariah can never be other than a Pariah. Equality of opportunity is impossible under such conditions." May not the Pariah live to employ the Brahmin as a cook? Is there anything in the system to prevent a Pariah becoming rich and important and employing the Brahmin as his servant?—I should say there was the greatest possible difficulty in such a position, but I would suggest your putting that question to a Brahmin.

5983. I will not put it to you, Sir Alexander, if you do not desire to answer?—I am not in a position to say whether a Brahmin can become the servant of a Pariah; it would be with great difficulty, I take it.

5984. You refer to the undisputed superiority in intellect of the Brahmin as being one of the most remarkable features of the situation in Southern India. Do you not think that is a good ground for having the majority of the appointments and having the greatest voice in the government of the people, to have an undisputed superiority in intellect?—It is the ground why the Brahmin has the greatest share in the appointments.

5985. Is it a proper ground, I ask, if I may?—I really think it is not a proper ground to give one small section of the people a right of governing the whole mass of the population.

5986. I should like to ask you another question. You say, not as of your own knowledge, but quoting the Imperial Gazetteer, that the Pariah pollutes at a distance of 64 feet, and so on. May I ask if you have had any experience of that yourself in British India?—On the West Coast I think it is undoubtedly so still.

5987. In the Malabar district, or the native states?—In the Malabar district. You see people running away into the paddy fields as the high-caste people come along the road.

5988. Are you aware that what you quote, presumably with acceptance, is only quoted in the Imperial Gazetteer from a report from the native state of Cochin?—There is no doubt, of course, that in Cochin it is very much more definite.

5989. I asked whether you were, in referring to it in your Memorandum, aware of the fact I have just stated. You are the representative here of the Madras Presidency and a member of the Madras Executive?—No, I was not aware of that fact.

5990. Have you ever seen it yourself in British India?—Yes, I have. Last August I paid a visit to Kollengode, and I was struck there by the way in which the people bolted off the road as the Raja came along the road.

5991. Is that because he drives furiously?—No.

5992. You refer next to the Pariah as being commonly excluded from the schools used by the higher castes, and you instanced Pachaiyappas College, Madras. Is it not the case that that is a private endowment, and cannot the founders of endowed schools make any rules they like as to the class of people to enjoy them?—That is no doubt held under a trust deed.

5993. Is it not a private endowment?—Certainly.

5994. Is it characteristic of the Madras schools that there should be a school in which the Pariah is not admitted?—Yes. I made mention of the four chief high schools in Madras, I think, if you will give me the paragraph number.

5995. You do go on to say, "It is stated that there is not a single Pariah boy in the four chief Hindoo educational institutions in Madras City," but do you suggest from that that they are not allowed to go there by any special rules or by the Government?—

They are not allowed by the management. They would not take a Pariah boy in for the simple reason that no one else would go if they did.

5996. Is it not because the school would empty if a Pariah boy went?—Yes.

5997. What is it that does that? Is it public opinion or not?—It is entirely the feeling of the higher castes, who will not mix with the Pariah.

5998. I put it to you whether the statement in your Memorandum would not rather give the impression that in the Province of Madras, in British territory, there was some such regulation?—I hope not. The Madras Government sent out a circular last December or January asking for information as to whether Pariah boys were admitted into the schools of the various local bodies in the Presidency, and if the Committee want the information it is to be found in the replies to that reference. I think the replies largely show that the Pariah boys were not admitted to Board schools.

5999. Is it not the fact that this absence of the lower castes from those schools is due to the others exercising a sort of passive resistance if they do go there, and it is not the fault of the British administration?—It is due, no doubt, to the social system of the country.

6000. You refer to the Pariahs being fined for entering a temple, and I want to ask you whether that is not in pursuance of the ordinary law of trespass, by which strangers are not admitted to places without the leave of the owners?—I think certainly not. At the Tanjore Temple I have myself seen a notice written up, "No Pariahs admitted." I am told that in the same district at some other temple it is written up, "Pariahs and Europeans not admitted." In the Note which I have sent to the Right Honourable the Secretary of State I quoted the High Court, Justice Sadasiva Ayyar, who, in the Indian Law Reports, 40 Madras, page 561, says, in a recent judgment, "Most Hindoo public temples do not allow entrance of members of the depressed classes, and they" (the temples) "do not, in my opinion, fall out of the category of public places in that connection." That was the point, whether they were public places.

6001. In the case of those temples from which Pariahs or other equally low classes are excluded, would not an Englishman have been equally excluded, and would not you, as a member of the Madras Government, have been excluded in a like manner?—No, I entered the Tanjore Temple.

6002. That was by special favour; but would not an ordinary Englishman be excluded?—The ordinary globe trotter invariably enters the Tanjore Temple, and there is no exclusion of the European, even though he goes in with his boots on.

6003. You say the emigration from the south of India to the Straits Settlements and Ceylon is to escape the state of servitude in the south; but is it not to enjoy the better conditions offered across the water? I am taking this from your Memorandum, which has been repeatedly in evidence?—No doubt it is to enjoy better conditions, which include escape from the servile position that they occupy in their own villages. It is to escape from those conditions, which are certainly of a very miserable character.

6004. As compared with?—As compared with that of the landowning class, Brahmin or non-Brahmin, The Madras Government appointed a special officer about a year ago to try to put these unfortunate Pariahs in a better position by acquiring their house sites and making them over to them so that they might own their own huts and not be under a chronic threat of eviction if they did anything unpalatable to their employers. That step is in gradual progress, but it created a great deal of opposition, both among non-Brahmin and Brahmin landowners.

6005. You do not think they go away to better themselves?—I do think they do go away to better themselves.

6006. Why do you put it on to the other classes if they are so ill-treated in the Madras Presidency?—One means of bettering themselves is to escape from the servile position they are in.

6007. If they are in a servile position now, would not the Madras Government, of which you were a member, be, to some extent, to blame?—It is difficult to see how you can prevent people from submitting to these conditions, but I agree that to some extent the Madras Government are to blame. As long ago as 1892 the then Collector of Chingleput in a very lengthy Memorandum on the position of the Pariah, brought to notice the position of those depressed people in Chingleput, and I do not think adequate steps were taken then to rectify it. I agree that sufficient steps were not taken then, and the conditions remain very bad.

6008. The Collector was Mr. Tremenheere?—Yes, in 1892.

6009. I should like to ask, are you satisfied that the Government, of which you were a member, expressed the feelings of the articulate portion, at any rate, of the Madras Presidency in adopting a non possumus attitude as regards the reforms to which this Bill gives expression?—Your question is, does the Madras Government's attitude represent that of the articulate classes in the Madras Presidency?

6010. Are you satisfied that you were expressing their views in taking that line?—No.

6011. You are not satisfied?—No; I do not think they did.

6012. Are you satisfied, then, that the Madras Government should be in the position of not being satisfied with regard to such a point?—The Madras Government expressed its own views—not those of the articulate classes.

6013. With regard to a matter like this, which, of course, is a great popular movement, I will not ask you whether you approve of it or not, but with regard to a great popular movement, would the Madras Government be right in standing entirely against it without making the sort of reservation or admission which you have just made and which I do not find in their letters on the subject?—I do not know. I cannot recall that the Madras Government was asked to express the opinion of the politically minded classes; it was asked for its own opinion and gave it.

Lord Sydenham.

6014. I understand you regard this scheme as it stands as not implicitly demanded by the terms of the announcement?—Yes; I certainly do not construe the announcement as implying necessarily this scheme. I notice that the five Lieutenant-Governors said the same thing, that the scheme went a great deal further than the announcement suggested. I do not know whether that is to be found somewhere in the papers, but that is very much my view.

6015. In your opinion the scheme does not so much mark a gradual movement towards responsible government as a somewhat revolutionary change?—I am afraid that the answer must be, yes, to that; I think it is a revolution.

6016. I think you were in India at the inception of the Morley-Minto Reforms in 1909?—Yes. I was on leave at the time, but I remember something about it.

6017. Is it not correct to say that the reception was almost universally favourable?—I believe so—I think it was, but I happened to be absent from India during those six months.

6018. Is there any organised body in India which accepts whole-heartedly the system embodied in this Bill?—I am afraid I cannot answer that—I can only speak for Madras, and I do not even know whether in Madras there is anybody who accepts it whole-heartedly.

6019. You have not come across any body of opinion which accepts this scheme whole-heartedly in Madras?—The position is fairly plain. The extreme party would like to go further, and the non-Brahmin party object to the want of protection which they think they see in the Bill. The submerged classes are entirely inarticulate and do not know what the Bill means, and in fact they do not know anything about the Bill. It may be that there is no party which accepts it whole-heartedly, but I really would not like to make an assertion on that point.

6020. At least you would say that you had never discovered any enthusiasm for the Bill, as it stands, anywhere?—I do not feel any enthusiasm for it, and I should prefer to keep to my own opinions.

6021. You had some troubles in Madras last year: were they spontaneous on the part of people with grievances, grievances, or were they engineered from outside?—What troubles do you refer to particularly?

6022. I do not know; you had considerable troubles in Madras last year—you had troubles in Madras itself?—The reference is possibly to the grain rioting which occurred as an epidemic all through the Madras Presidency in July and August of last year. That was entirely an economic matter. The people were very much irritated at the prices being put up against them, and they broke out into the looting of shops, because they thought that the Government was too feeble to prevent it. I think it was economic in origin.

6023. Was it not the fact (I have seen a Memorandum by your Government stating this) that the Madras Government have been subject to very violent attacks which had the effect of weakening its authority in the eyes of the people?—Yes, to weaken what you might call its prestige in the eyes of the people.

6024. You have seen the Franchise Committee's Report: do you agree with it generally as regards Madras?—No, I do not agree with it.

6025. The Madras Government is said to be backward, because it has not accepted proportionately so large an electorate as other Provinces have; do you think the electorate that has been laid down is as large as the Madras Government can manage?—Our objection, when I was a member of the Government, was largely to the enormous mass of illiteracy the electorate would include, and illiteracy is a tremendous drawback, not only in that people are not themselves able to judge of a question put before them, but also there is the difficulty and danger of personation and fraud of all kinds. Those are the points which will make an illiterate constituency so difficult.

6026. As the most of those voters will be illiterate, do you expect difficulty in managing these electorates?—Yes. I drew, or the Madras Government drew attention to the experience in Pondicherry, and the experience there has been, I believe, of the most serious character. There they found that a European official watched one of the polling booths; I have forgotten how many they polled; but I think they polled 800 or 1,100, and only nine men went in and out. There was a great deal of evidence in that connection to show that——

6027. Do you think the Madras Government can count upon applying sufficient supervision to prevent fraudulent returns being made at these Parliamentary elections?—I think it would be a difficult matter to deal with and to prevent fraud—it must be very difficult. The voters are about half-a-million, I think.

6028. More—540,000; it must be difficult, must it not?—It must be difficult.

6029. The Joint Report says that 70 per cent. of the seats in general constituencies were occupied by lawyers; do you expect the same result under the new Franchise arrangement?—I am afraid so; I do not know any class that will be able to compete with the lawyers. That is the difficulty in Madras. I only speak of Madras, and of no other place. There is no commercial class. There is no large business community. There is only this educated class of lawyers; they are the only people that are known, and I doubt very much whether the local landowner, who is generally very little educated, will have any chance against the local Vakil. I am afraid there is very little chance; I wish I could give a different answer.

6030. Is it not the case that it sometimes happens that lawyers are not well suited to be the guardians of the interests of the rural population?—The lawyer as a rule is a town man; he necessarily is not very well suited to be the guardian of agricultural interests, although, I ought to add, that he does generally own land, and owning land, he is interested in agrarian questions.

6031. Is it not his interest sometimes to get land from the original owners?—I doubt that.

6032. Speaking broadly, do you think in those new Councils the rural taxpayers will have their interests adequately represented?—I am inclined to fear they will not have their real interests adequately represented.

6033. You seem to have made a study of the low and depressed classes in Madras, and you say that in the villages the rigidity of caste remains little changed?—That, I think, is an undoubted fact.

6034. Of course, you know well that the Government would order Panchamas to be admitted to every school in the Presidency, only they could not do so in defiance of public opinion?—It would empty the schools.

6035. That is not in any way the fault of the Government; we should all have done it long ago, but we could not do it?—It is undoubted that the Government certainly would not have permitted exclusion if they thought they could have avoided it.

6036. Do you consider that Communal Representation is necessary to safeguard the non-Brahmin interests in the Madras Presidency?—Yes, I think so, because the influence of the Brahmin is so extraordinarily powerful; it is difficult to bring it home to anyone who is not conversant with India, but the Brahmin holds all the cards; he is in possession of all the major appointments. Anybody who is admitted to an office must either toe the line and get on with the Brahmin, or be subjected to the collective hostility of the whole caste. The Brahmin also holds all the cards outside Government service; 70 per cent. of the graduates are Brahmins, and 74 per cent. of the lawyers are Brahmins. If you are a landlord and you own a piece of land, and you have a dispute, you must have a Brahmin Vakil to conduct your case. I think that the power of the Brahmin caste in the south is really so great and the non-Brahmins are such poor creatures, that they will never manage to stand up against them without some form of communal representation.

6037. They are only poor creatures in the sense that they have no moral courage; they have been accustomed to this form of depression, and cannot shake it off?—It is a very difficult position to be in to be a non-Brahmin, I think; probably, if I was a non-Brahmin, I should submit too, rather than face the disagreeables of fighting against the very powerful organisation all round me. It is a very difficult position to be a non-Brahmin on that account, although they are numerically so very superior.

6038. In any case, the Brahmin would have a very considerable advantage when it comes to a General Election?—An enormous advantage.

6039. For the benefit of the non-Brahmins, your Government proposed, did it not, or preferred that there should be a limitation of Brahmin seats; that was your remedy?—Yes, very regretfully, but we did propose it.

6040. Do you consider that it would be possible to work the diarchical system in Madras?—I do not know.

6041. Your Government, with the other four Governments, wishes to make a unitary Government throughout the Provinces?—Yes, I think everyone is agreed, including the authors of the Report, that the diarchic system involves very great difficulty. Nobody doubts it, I think, and if you could avoid it, I think it should be avoided.

6042. That led you to the unitary system that the five Governments have been unanimous upon?—Yes.

6043. May I take it that the Madras Government feels that reforms of many kinds are necessary, but it objects to the system which is embodied in the Bill?—The Madras Government has not seen the Bill, or had not when I was a member of it. I quite realise the difficulties of the position—for instance the difficulty of finding any scheme which involves progress without going too far. The Madras scheme was put forward in that letter I have referred to in my answer, and I think that scheme would not have satisfied the political classes, but I think it really would have been the best in the interests of the whole population. That shows that the Madras Government would like to see progress; they do not want to absolutely stand still.

6044. The Madras Government does want to see progress, and does regard reforms as necessary, but objects to the form in which the Bill is drawn?—I think that is right.

6045. One last question: Do you think that the passing of this Bill as it stands will produce tranquillity in India?—No, I am afraid it will not; it will only be regarded as a stepping-stone to further agitation.

6046. The probability is that it will not?—It will not, I think.

Sir Henry Craik.

6047. In the sixth paragraph of your Memorandum, which you laid before us, you refer to the letter of the 17th

17th January, 1918, from the Government of Madras to the Government of India, and to the scheme therein mentioned. Can you give me an idea (it is really for my own information) explaining as shortly and as generally as you can what you consider to be the distinct features of that scheme put forward by the Government of Madras in that letter?—I have not seen that letter for a year or two. Unfortunately, I was unable to get a copy of it in the India Office. But the general idea, I think, was that the control of the legislation, which is one of the great cruxes of the whole matter, and of the Budget, should be retained by the Central Reformed Provincial Government, but that this dual arrangement——

6048. What do you mean by this Central Reformed Provincial Government?—I mean by that the Provincial Government.

6049. You introduced the word "Central"?—Yes, it is central in the sense of being central in the Presidency; but the dual arrangement which is adopted in the Joint Report, instead of being applied to the Central Provincial Government, should be applied to sub-Provincial Councils. For instnce, in the Telugu country it would have its own Council, and to that Council certain branches of the Administration should be entirely made over in the same way as the Report proposes, and the Act proposes that certain subjects should be transferred.

6050. The essential object of that scheme was the sub-division of Provinces, and within these smaller sub-divisions giving considerable independent administrative power?—Yes, that was so.

6051. That was the feature?—Yes.

6052. The alternative was a dual system of government; but in these smaller districts there would have been considerable independence, which might have grown and expanded without this difficulty of a possible divergence of aim between the members of a dual government?—Yes, it would have enabled local men to come to the front more; the lawyers would not have been so important. You would have had smaller constituencies, and the local men would have been known in their own locality.

6053. And you would have had administration in smaller areas, which you think might well have been entrusted to popular agencies?—That was the idea we started from.

6054. Did that find considerable support elsewhere besides in the Government of Madras?—I believe that there was some support in Calcutta, but we proceeded entirely on our own views. My colleague, the Honourable Mr. Rajagopala Achariyar, wrote the most admirable note as an addendum to the letter, which brought out much better than I could have brought out the merits of the scheme.

6055. To a certain extent it had certain points of resemblance to the scheme put forward by the Joint Conference at Calcutta of Europeans and Indians?—I believe so.

6056. That obtained considerable support amongst Indians as well as Europeans?—Yes.

6057. Amongst others Mr. Surendranath Banerjea signed that?—Did he? That is beyond my own knowledge. I quite accept it that he did.

6058. Could you tell me if there were any points of divergence between the Calcutta Conference scheme and that put forward by your Government?—I do not know.

6059. That scheme put forward by the Joint meeting at Calcutta of Europeans and Indians was dealt with in the Joint Report, I think?—It was.

6060. It is dealt with in paragraphs 245 and 246 of the Joint Report?—Yes.

6061. Although I understand the authors of the Joint Report found considerable difficulties with regard to that scheme, they saw at the same time very considerable advantages in it?—Yes.

6062. Do you think the sub-division of these Provinces would lead to considerable difficulties and objections?—Not in Madras. They would have made a demand for a separate Province. It would have been welcomed to a great extent by the Telugu country as giving them a semi-independent existence.

6063. Do you agree with this passage in the Joint Report: "In spite of the evidence which has reached us of the existence in parts of India of distinct areas or communities which are anxious to secede from the larger administrative units of which they now form part, we feel sure that any general scheme of geographical partition would evoke such strong opposition as would be fatal to the whole plan"?—I can only speak for Madras.

6064. You do not think it would?—I do not think it would in Madras, because it so happens that the Telegu people are very anxious to have a separate position.

6065. Has your attention been called to the concluding words of the same paragraph of the Joint Report which anticipates possible objection, and they go on: "But we are bound to indicate our own clear opinion that wherever such redistributions are necessary and can be effected by process of consent the attempt to do so should be made; and therefore we desire that it should be recognised as one of the earliest duties incumbent upon all the reformed Provincial Governments to test Provincial opinion upon schemes directed to this end. In Orisso and Berar, at all events, it seems to us that the possibility of instituting sub-provinces need not be excluded from consideration at a very early date." Now you agree with that, that such sub-division would be very desirable?—Whether as a separate problem or a problem of reform?

6066. No; I understand this points to the fact that whether the reform comes or not, this separation would be desirable in many respects, and I understood you rather to agree with that?—I think I ought to say a word there. I do not think the Madras Government anticipated an entire separation, we will say, of the Telugu Province from the Tamil Provinces.

6067. A sub-division?—A sub-division means the creation of some form of organised government subject to the Provincial Government?

6068. Yes?—That would be very costly, unless it is to gain something—the mere creation of a fresh Sub-Provincial Government. The idea here was to provide legislative——.

6069. I do not think you have quite followed my point. I understood, from your own description of it, that the scheme you put forward on the part of the Madras Government approached in certain leading features to that put forward by the Joint Committee of Indians and Europeans at Calcutta, and that an essential feature of both was a sub-division of Provinces which would be accompanied by administrative responsibility delegated to the popular element?—It was not intended that Madras should sub-divide the Province so as to make two Provinces. It was intended to create Sub-Provincial Councils which would be subordinate to the main Council at Madras.

6070. What was your object? I thought you gave it just now; what was the object of your scheme? What were the features of your scheme?—The object of the scheme was to enable certain branches of administration to be made over to popular control within these Sub-Provincial Councils.

6071. Certainly; then that involved a division into Sub-Provincial Councils?—Yes.

6072. Then surely you follow the next step I ask: As that involved a division in Sub-Provincial Councils, it had a very strong family likeness to the scheme put forward by the joint meeting of Indians and Europeans at Calcutta?—Yes.

6073. That is right?—I think it had a family likeness, yes.

6074. The argument put forward in paragraphs 245 and 246 of the Joint Report, favouring to a certain extent certain features in that scheme of the Joint Committee at Calcutta would also apply to your scheme?—Yes, quite so.

6075. And, therefore, we may take it that even from the point of view of the Joint Report there were certain commendable features, both in the Calcutta scheme and in your scheme?—Yes.

Lord Brodrick (Viscount Midleton).

6076. Before I returned to the room I do not know whether your attention was invited to the statement in your reply to questions, "It would not in my opinion be a reasonable interpretation of the declaration of the 20th of August to confer at once 95 per cent. of full responsible government and to reserve only 5 per cent. for grant at a later stage." You do not suggest that that is done by this Bill, do you?—No, I give that as an illustration of what would be an unreasonable interpretation.

6077. I gather, speaking generally, that you consider it is proposed to transfer too large a percentage?—I am afraid so, but the rules are not framed yet.

6078. Would you tell the Committee in a few words how the finance of Madras is managed at this moment? You have no Finance Minister of Madras as distinguished from other Ministers?—No; the Financial Member, or the member in charge of finance, has got other Departments. I had finance in addition to portions of the Revenue Department, for instance—the Land Revenue Department, which includes Land Revenue and Land Administration generally.

6079. That under the present conditions has worked very well, no doubt, but supposing the scheme of the Bill were carried and that you had Ministers and Executive Councils, each drawing, either from the same purse or from different revenues, would you not require some Finance Minister who had no other Portfolio and who could co-ordinate their demands and be impartial?—I have long thought that there should be a Finance Member for nothing else, because every Finance Member has got his own additional Departments, which are invariably spending departments. Naturally, he finds the money for his own Departments before he finds it for other Departments. It is as if the Treasury had charge of the War Office or some other Department.

6080. Would you say that a great number of questions on which there might be differences of opinion in the future, if this scheme were adopted, might turn on finance?—Yes, of course; they are bound to.

6081. I gather from your evidence, so far as I have heard it, that you think there is great danger of the Governor being overtaxed under these new conditions?—I think it is absolutely certain that he will be overwhelmed; he is the deux ex machina, who is called in to do everything; it is the weakest point of all that he has to do just everything, and unless he is a man of super-human power I think he will be snowed under. That is my personal opinion.

6082. If a large number of questions are going to turn on finance, is it not desirable that somebody other than the Governor should have the task of bringing the different Ministers together, and arguing a question out, and that he should remain rather as an umpire?—Much better, I think.

6083. Even apart from this great change, do you think a Finance Minister of some sort not in charge of a Department would be valuable?—I think so; I am quite of that view.

Mr. Montagu.

6084. What would be your view of the pronouncement of the 20th of August? You now accept it, but did you welcome it or think it was a mistake?—I thought at the time it would have been wiser not to have made the pronouncement when we were in the middle of the war.

6085. You referred in your evidence to the Brahmin organisation; is there such a thing as a Brahmin organisation?—Could you give me the context?

6086. I may have misunderstood you, but when you were talking to Lord Sydenham about the non-Brahmins being what you called poor creatures. You then explained what you meant, and you said that if you were a non-Brahmin surrounded by Brahmin organisations you would probably do the same?—It is very difficult, of course, to convey what I mean. Brahmins at present hold 70 per cent. of all the qualifications which admit to Government offices and the learned professions of all kinds; they are at the top everywhere. They have the command of funds which enable them to educate their children and give them a good start, and the clever ones among them can rise and take the leading posts. With the non-Brahmin, on the other hand, it is a very difficult thing to get entry, and when he has entered he is likely to knock himself against the Brahmin feeling or combination. Perhaps "organisation" was a misleading word.

Mr. Montagu—continued.

6087. Have you heard the result of the Madras election?—No, I should be interested to hear it.

6088. Would you be surprised to learn that the non-Brahmins have gained more seats than the Brahmins?—Really! I should be surprised. Is that so?

6089. I suppose it is what you would call Brahmin non-Brahmins who have had that success?—No, I am quite open to conviction. I do not know what has happened. I only saw that one seat had fallen to a Brahmin on the West Coast. I have no part in the matter.

6090. I did not mean that you had a part in the matter; but there has been described to us a person who has been called a Brahmin non-Brahmin?—I do not know who has said that.

6091. Under your sub-provincial scheme you would have, I gather, a Minister in each of your sub-provinces charged with such subjects as local self-government?—Yes.

6092. But you would have a Central Madras Provincial Government, with power over that sub-provincial area on other subjects?—On other subjects, yes. That is the idea.

6093. But the two Governments, situated in different places, would issue orders to the Civil Service, and never meet?—They would not be sitting in the same place; they might meet, no doubt.

6094. You would have your diarchy?—Yes.

6095. Would not there be more friction if they never saw one another rather than less?—I think so; but, of course, both are experiments.

6096. In answer to Lord Sydenham I think you said that you thought this Bill did too much; it was revolutionary; and you also were afraid that it would not produce a pacific peaceful India. Would you have a better chance of producing a peaceful India if you did less?—No.

Lord Sinha.

6097. The rajah you mentioned is a non-Brahmin, is he not?—Yes.

6098. Therefore the people bolting at his approcah is not quite tantamount to bolting at the approach of a Brahmin. You gave that instance of people bolting when the rajah was on the scene. That was not a case of Brahmin ascendency. It was a case of rajah ascendency?—He is a Nayar, a caste which possesses a special position in Western India.

6099. He is almost as exclusive as the Brahmin?—Just so. I think all the ladies of the family are married to Brahmins.

6100. I think you put in your Memorandum that the Brahmins as well as the caste of non-Brahmin Hindoos are both equally exclusive so far as the Panchamas are concerned?—Yes.

6101. And if there is a charge of oppression it may be levelled against both equally?—Quite; that is my opinion.

6102. As regards the non-Brahmin castes, they are themselves mutually exclusive and antagonistic. You would not call them a homogeneous community, all those 150 odd castes?—It is a difficult question to answer, not belonging to the communities, but my impression is that they are much less antagonistic to one another than they are to Brahmins.

6103. I am just endeavouring to get from your Minute the passage which I had in my mind with regard to this. It is at page 125 of the Parliamentary Paper. The Minute commences on page 124, but I am referring to paragraph 7: "Next to the Brahmin sed longo intervallo comes the great group of Hindoo castes, some higher, some lower, generally grouped together as non-Brahmins, but all equally exclusive, and largely antagonistic to one another"?—That is true.

6104. You believe that to be a correct representation of the facts?—I think so.

6105. "It is notorious that if a member of one of these castes attains to a position of influence he fills the offices in his gift with his fellow-caste men." That is not confined to Brahmins?—No, it is not; it is part of the whole system.

6106. Do you think you could group together all these equally exclusive and largely antagonistic castes as one community for the purpose of elections?—Well, I admit the difficulty; but the people concerned will not be satisfied unless it is done, and if you are going going to give this new scheme a fair trial I think it is better to start it with a contented non-Brahmin community than with a discontented one. I admit the difficulties of grouping Chettys and Pillais all together, but all these communities themselves claim it. They ask for it, and from that point of view it seems better to give your scheme a chance.

6107. There is a division of opinion amongst them, too, is not there?—Yes, but I doubt its being very real.

6108. At any rate, I do not suppose they would like the Panchamas to be classed with them?—No.

6109. Because we had a non-Brahmin gentleman claiming that Panchamas were being treated as sons to themselves. They are like sons, he said. That is not the kind of treatment you find in Madras, do you?—No, quite untrue of Madras, and I do think that unless some steps are taken in this Bill to protect the outcasts—greater steps than are embodied in the Bill—it will be a very grave reproach against the Bill and against the Government that passes it.

6110. By that you mean the Panchamas?—The Panchamas—seven, eight or nine millions in Madras.

6111. So far as they are concerned I suppose it is almost impossible to give them direct representation by their class, is it not?—It is very difficult; two seats in 120 is absolutely inadequate.

6112. You mean the number?—Yes.

6113. But so far as representation is concerned, I suppose for some little time the representation will have to be through missionaries or social service workers and people of that class, if they are taking any intelligent interest in the working of the Council?—To a great extent, yes, but I think a certain number of Panchamas could be found, and I really would appeal very strongly on behalf of those people that this Committee will see that their interests are protected to some extent.

6114. You would have their representation, I take it, by nomination?—I think so; I am afraid there are no other means possible.

6115. I want to draw your attention to the document to which Sir Henry Craik referred as well as your own document, which I am afraid you did not have before you, the letter of 1918. If Sir Henry Craik will pardon my saying so, I think he has put to you facts which are rather misleading. I can only get the substance of it from the Report itself. You have got the Joint Report before you?—I have had it. (The document is handed to the witness.)

6116. Will you please look at paragraphs 242 and 243?—Yes.

6117. Taking paragraph 243 first: "In their less pretentious form of expression these ideas are embodied in a scheme which has been placed before us for the establishment of divisional councils"?—Yes.

6118. "These bodies would have jurisdiction over a revenue division, and would deal with all questions of local self-government and certain other matters delegated to them, such as excise, agricultural farms, provincial roads, and some branches of education. They would have definite revenues of their own, and also power to increase their income by local taxation" and so on. That is the substance of the sub-provincial scheme which you referred to, is it not?—The words "revenue division" are not clear to me; I do not know what it means exactly.

6119. Apart from the area?—Yes; otherwise it is the idea of the scheme.

6120. Please run your eyes over the whole paragraph: "As regards the matters made over to the divisional councils the provincial council would retain certain powers of legislation, taxation and of sanctioning rules; but as regards all other subjects, its powers would be only those of deliberation and criticism unless the Government referred a particular question to it for decision." That is the substance of the Madras scheme?—That was, I think, very much the substance of the Madras scheme.

6121. That involved a diarchy, did it not?—Yes.

6122. Division of functions?—Yes.

6123. Plus division of areas—a sub-division of the whole Province into different and smaller areas?—Smaller areas.

6124. Is so far as there are difficulties in a diarchy, they would be multiplied by the time that there were

Sub-Provinces; the difficulties would be multiplied by reason of the sub-division, would they not?—But they would also diminish.

6125. By reason of the diminution of the area?—Yes.

6126. Quite. But the difficulty said to be inherent to diarchy would be quite as inherent to the system advocated or recommended by the Madras Government?—I doubt it.

6127. Certain functions are reserved to the Sub-Provincial Council; certain others in the area are reserved to the Central or Provincial Government?—Just as certain powers are reserved now to the Provincial Government of Madras and other powers in the same area are reserved to the Government of India; the clash is not greater.

6128. I would rather not take in the Government of India here. I will take only the Sub-Province and the Provincial Government of Madras. In the Sub-Province there will be two authorities. As regards certain functions, it is the Sub-Provincial Council and the Minister presiding over those Councils?—Yes.

6129. Or a president, or whatever we call him?—Yes.

6130. With regard to the same area, there would be the Central or Provincial Government, having its authority in all other subjects?—Yes.

6131. That has certain functions transferred to the Sub-Provincial Council, and certain functions reserved to the Madras Provincial Government; that is diarchy. Therefore, it is not diarchy as a principle that the Madras Government objected to or objects to now?—I think, speaking for myself, that it would have been a very, very different position. As I said a moment ago, the Government of India now has certain functions and power over the whole of the Provincial areas; similarly that may be said to involve diarchy from your analogy. The Government of India and the Provincial Government both have powers over the same area; that may be described as diarchy.

Mr. Montagu.

6132. May I put to you that what you mean to say to Lord Sinha is that the relations between a Provincial Government and a Sub-Provincial Government would be similar to, and just as amicable, as the relations between a Provincial Government and the Government of India?—Yes, that is the idea that I meant to convey.

6133. That is to say, your idea is that wherever there is popular control, there must be the relation of superior and inferior. It is only that which would distinguish the Sub-Provincial Council and the Provincial scheme from the present scheme. Under Mr. Montagu's scheme the two Governments are co-ordinate; neither of them is subordinate to the other; under your scheme there is diarchy, but one portion of the Government is subordinate to the other; that is the only difference. And that would enable the Declaration of the 20th August, 1917, to be complied with, but that is a matter of opinion, if I may venture to say so?—Yes.

6134. I am only trying to picture to myself, and if possible to present that picture to the Committee, what your scheme, which you still advocate, involves; and that is why I put to you that, according to your scheme—or, rather, the Madras Government scheme—in that letter it is an essential part to divide the functions of government between the Provincial Government and the Sub-Provincial Government. But it is equally essential that the Sub-Provincial Government should be subordinate to the Provincial Government. There is the division, but a division as between a superior and an inferior. Am I correct?—I think that is correct. I think that is not an unfair statement of the effect. It would reserve legislation and the Budget to the Provincial Government.

6135. And the Sub-Provincial Council would have nothing whatsoever to do with either legislation or finance?—That probably is rather an over-statement of the position.

6136. Will you look at the paragraph?—I am not tied to the paragraph. It seems to me conceivable that the Sub-Provincial Government would have limited powers of legislation within the sphere of its influence, and that it would have powers of finance within the sphere of its influence. I think that was certainly contemplated. Unfortunately, I have not got the Madras scheme.

6137. However, you think paragraph 243 substantially represents that scheme. Then there is another matter to which Sir Henry Craik drew your attention; but I rather think Sir Henry Craik did not himself read it quite correctly.

Sir Henry Craik.] We must not argue it just now, but I cannot quite accept that.

Mr. Montagu.] There is promise of an interesting debate here.

Lord Sinha.

6138. Inasmuch as Sir Henry Craik has referred to this paper, I feel bound to refer to it myself, because I think Sir Alexander rather too readily accepted Sir Henry's statement as regards the effect of that letter. You were told that Surendranath Banerjea accepted the scheme which is set out there. You remember Sir Henry Craik pointing that out to you?—Yes, I do not know whether it is correct.

6139. If you will look at page 207, at the end of Appendix III., which is before the signatures, you see it is stated: "With regard to the details of the scheme outlined above we think that it is desirable that everyone should reserve full liberty of judgment. Our agreement relates only to the following specific points," and then twelve specific points are set out. So that Surendranath Banerjea, when he signed that, agreed only to the twelve specific points, and reserves full liberty with regard to the rest of the statements in that address. You rather took it for granted that this was the same as the Madras Sub-Provincial scheme.

Sir Henry Craik.] I only asked if that was so.

Lord Sinha.] He, not having either of the documents before him, rather readily assented to that.

Sir Henry Craik.] I did not know the Madras scheme, because I had never seen it.

Lord Sinha.] As a matter of fact, it differs toto cœlo.

Sir Henry Craik.] I do not wish to argue, but just look at the beginning of paragraph 245. That is what led me to identify the two.

Lord Sinha.] That is the substance of the joint address.

Sir Henry Craik.] That is what led me to identify the Madras scheme with the other scheme, and to think that there must be a similarity between them.

Lord Sinha.] But these, you see, are separate Governments, having no relationship of subordination, at any rate, one with the other.

Sir Henry Craik.] Oh, yes.

Lord Sinha.] If you will look at paragraph 242 and also paragraph 245, I think you will agree with me that neither of those schemes has any similarity to the Madras scheme. It is only because I wanted to rectify what I considered was probably inaccurate.

Sir Henry Craik.] My inference was drawn from paragraph 6 of Sir Alexander Cardew.

Lord Sinha.] The Sub-Provincial Council; but he had not developed that at all.

Sir Henry Craik.] He said at the beginning of page 3 that the scheme of Provincial Councils was noticed and rejected in paragraphs 245 and 246. As these deal with the joint European and Indian meeting, I thought they must be identical.

The Witness.] I am very sorry if I misled you; I may have misled you.

Mr. Montagu.] He goes on to say that the scheme there mentioned emanated from a different source, and therefore probably differed in some features.

Sir Henry Craik.] In some features, but I thought there seemed to be general agreement.

Lord Sinha.] In fact, my information is that Surendranath Banerjea did not sign even this document at all.

Sir Henry Craik.] Did not he?. His name is there.

Lord Sinha.

6140. I do not find his name here. He was asked to sign, and he did not sign. Sir Henry Craik, I think, was misled by another name here, No. 37, S. N. Banerjee, who I know is a young gentleman belonging to the Bar, and not Mr. Surendranath Banerjea. (To the Witness.) However, as I say, the schemes are different. I only drew attention to them because when the Committee considers it they will have to consider that. Coming back to your answers, if I may for a minute, do you make any difference between progressive and gradual, because I find that the Preamble of the Bill which you object to begins by saying: "With the view to the progressive realisation." Of course, it is not my language, but if, as I understand it, "progressive" necessarily means "gradual," I do not suppose you would quarrel with that?—Would you look at the question here referred to—not the Bill—"Do you accept the proposition that it is desirable to bring about the progressive realisation of responsible government in India?"

6141. That is taken from the Preamble, of course?—If they had followed the terms of the Declaration I should have supposed that it was intended to mean the same thing, but there is a difference in terms, and I do not know what the effect of that difference may be or what the intention of the difference was.

6142. I take it you understand by "progressive" the same as I do, namely, "gradual"?—I would like to see the terms of the Declaration adhered to.

6143. That is a matter of drafting, if you will pardon my saying so; the question is what is the substance of it? Do you not agree that "progressive" means "gradual"?—I do not think it does. I am not dealing with the drafting of the Bill; I am dealing with the question which was put to me.

6144. Very well. One of your complaints is that the rules which are to be framed under the Act when it is passed were not before you, and therefore you are not prepared to give any opinion on the Bill?—A difficulty, not a complaint.

6145. But you have read what are suggested as being the rules both in the Franchise Committee's Report, in the Functions Committee's Report, and the Government of India Despatches upon them?—I have read those documents.

6146. Assuming that the rules are more or less on the lines of those documents, have you not got materials enough to be able to come to some kind of judgment upon the Bill and the rules to be framed under it? I put it to you for this reason: having regard to those Reports, is there any justification for saying if 95 per cent. of functions are transferred now and 5 per cent. only reserved, that would be progressive and gradual realisation of self-government? Having regard to the documents that I drew your attention to, would you say that the division is 95 per cent. and 5 per cent., or anything like that?

Mr. Montagu.

6147. I think Sir Alexander has already explained that he only used those figures 95 per cent. and 5 per cent. as an illustration?—Quite.

Lord Sinha.

6148. I am putting it to him as to whether there is any foundation for any of the exaggerated statements of that kind, having regard to what the rules are proposed to be; they are extremely moderate?—There, I am afraid, I am unable to agree with Lord Sinha.

6149. You mean that if the rules are framed on the lines either of the Reports of the two Committees, or as modified by the Government of India or suggested to be modified, even then they would be extravagant?—I think they would be excessive, yes.

6150. Am I right in understanding that you are against substantial elected majorities in the Provincial Councils?—Yes.

6151. You say that you cannot answer one of the questions, Question 4: "Do you think that there are certain matters or functions of the Government in the Provinces in which at present the Provincial Executive must remain responsible to the Secretary of State and to Parliament, and must therefore be in a position to enforce its wishes?" Your answer to that, I think, is that, not knowing what is going to be reserved, you cannot answer?—I have not got my answers, but I think I said I accept this proposition, though the exact meaning of the words "certain matters or functions" might need further definition.

6152. I suppose what you would like would be to keep as many matters as possible under the control of the Secretary of State, that is, of the Local Government, subject to the control of the Secretary of State?—The question I was asked was: "Do you think there are certain matters in which at present the Provincial Executive must remain responsible to the Secretary of State, and must therefore be in a position to enforce its wishes?" To that I replied yes; but I think as to the number of those certain matters there may be a difference of opinion.

6153. That is to say, the volume or number of matters there may be a difference of opinion upon?—Yes. I am asked a certain number of questions, and I have to safeguard myself to some extent in my replies.

6154. You referred, I think, to the scheme of the five heads of Local Government; not in your answers?—No. I read it for the first time in these papers.

6155. I am not going into the particulars of that, so unless you want to you need not trouble to refer. You have, I believe, read also what is called the Bombay Government scheme—Lord Willingdon's despatch?—I did read it some months ago.

6156. Then you have your own scheme—the Madras Government scheme of Sub-Provincial Councils—and you have got the Bill and the scheme of the Report embodied in the Bill. To which of them, if you had to consider all those as alternatives, would you give the preference now after all the discussions that have passed?—Personally I still think that the Sub-Provincial Councils' scheme is the best. Though it might not give satisfaction to the political classes, I think it would be the best in the interests of the country. I think it would enable practical experience in government to be obtained in an easier way.

6157. As between the others have you any preference?—No.

6158. It is all the same?—I have not really considered the others from that point of view.

6159. The Bill, the scheme of the Lieutenant-Governor, or the Bombay one, you have no preference?—I have been away from these matters for many months, and I have not followed it. I have only had a few hours to look at these papers.

6160. I think you already said to the Secretary of State—at least, so I understood—that you considered democracy, or a democratic form of government, in India was, so far as you can contemplate, impossible?—I have said that in my note, I think—that at present the democracy is foreign to the underlying ideas of India.

6161. By reason of the doctrine of Karma and the institution of caste. I think you point out that those beliefs and institutions have existed, probably, for thousands of years, and I suppose it will take some other thousands of years before these disappear, if they ever do?—Do you think so?

6162. Well, I am asking you?—Oh, no, I do not adopt that statement at all.

6163. Quite. That is why I am asking you. Do you think that those beliefs and those institutions are disappearing?—Weakening, undoubtedly.

6164. Considerably?—I think considerably in the educated classes. You have got, shall we say, 10 per cent. of educated. Multiply your percentage, and you will weaken all that right through.

6165. Supposing they were the only people in the country, then there would be no difficulty?—No difficulty, I think; no.

6166. In having a democratic form of government?—To a great extent, yes.

6167. To the extent that that class increases the difficulty would decrease?—It will decrease, yes.

6168. Therefore the advent of democracy depends on the expansion of education of the same kind as the educated classes have had?—Very largely I think, yes. Give time to this unfortunate country—that is what I say.

6169. Do you think there is anything inherently wrong in the educated classes taking the lead in a country in politics?—In a country in which education does not convey sympathy with the uneducated I think there is something very wrong. How are you going to hand over these down-trodden outcasts to the mercies of the upper classes; you cannot do it without injustice.

6170. Has their education enabled them to get over the superstition and prejudices of the ages with regard to the lower classes or down-trodden classes?—I am afraid not; that is the worst of it. If it had there would be no difficulty in this question.

6171. Have these down-trodden classes been much better off after, say, 150 years of British rule than they were at the beginning?—They are undoubtedly better off. They are no longer slaves. They were slaves tied to the land. They are not slaves now. They can emigrate so long as they are allowed to emigrate; that alone gives them freedom.

6172. As you have mentioned emigration, may I draw your attention to another fact in which I think you are not quite fair, perhaps, to the classes who agitate against emigration from India, if I may say so with all respect? Is not it possible that the conditions under which the emigrants live in the Colonies to which they emigrate may be at least a portion of the reasons for which there is this outcry against emigration—Fiji, for instance?—I have not been to Fiji.

6173. South Africa—Canada?—I have always understood in South Africa that substantially the position is very favourable, except for the political difficulties. They are enormously better off than in their own villages; they are healthy.

6174. Is it your opinion that there are no others except political difficulties in South Africa—refusal of licences to trade, and to gain the means of livelihood?—Far greater exist in their own villages, where they are unable to do anything.

6175. I am not suggesting that there are not difficulties in one's own country. There are in every country. I am suggesting to you that the difficulties under which these people labour in the Colonies to which they emigrate may be one, at any rate, of the reasons for which people like Mr. Gokhale and others took up the cry against emigration from India—indentured labour?—Yes, I quite accept that statement—one of the reasons.

Major Ormsby-Gore.

6176. Have you been in South Africa and seen the Indians there?—No.

6177. Have you heard that the conditions in a place like Johannesburg are appalling?—No; I never heard that word applied to them.

6178. From what I saw of them they were?—Have you been in India?

6179. No. I have only been in South Africa. You said that you had been into the temple at Tanjore?—Yes, into the large enclosure inside the main gates where this notice is hung up.

6180. You would not be allowed in a mosque in India, would you?—Yes, I think so. I have been in the Jama Masjid, in Delhi; I have been in the Great Square.

6181. An objection to people going into places of worship is that they do not belong to the religion of that temple?—I do not know; but in this case the Hindoo does belong to that religion.

6182. The outcast Hindoo is regarded as belonging to the Hindoo religion?—I think so, yes.

6183. There is one thing in your Minute about the conditions of caste which I should like to ask you about. You say, "The Brahmin's claim to supremacy is based not only on race and intellect, but also on the injunctions of religion. The sanctity of a Brahmin's person, and the religious merit to be obtained by feeding him, paying for his education, providing money for the marriage of his daughters, endowing him with land, and so on, has been an established belief in India for centuries." Does that still go on?—I think so, yes.

6184. That is to say, the non-Brahmins have to pay for the Brahmin's education and provide dowries for his daughters?—No, merit is the point. The man will pay money towards the dowry of a Brahmin girl or towards the education of a Brahmin boy because doing so gives him religious merit.

6185. But he is not a Brahmin himself?—No.

6186. Could

Mr. Montagu

6186. Could you give me from your memory quite roughly the average number of resolutions that were disallowed for discussion in the Madras Legislative Council per year? Was it tens or twenties, or less?—I am afraid I cannot.

Mr. Montagu—continued.

6187. It was a considerable number?—It was a considerable number. I should say thirty.

Mr. Montagu.] We are very much obliged to you for giving us this evidence.

(The Witness is directed to withdraw.)

Lord SYDENHAM.
Lord SINHA.

Sir HENRY CRAIK.
Mr. MONTAGU.
Major ORMSBY-GORE.
Sir J. D. REES.
Mr. SPOOR.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THE LORD BRODRICK (VISCOUNT MIDLETON), AND AFTERWARDS THE RIGHT HONOURABLE E. S. MONTAGU, IN THE CHAIR.

MR. A. J. PUGH, is called in; and Examined as follows:—

Lord Brodrick (Viscount Midleton).

6188. Can you tell us how long your experience is of India?—Just thirty years.

6189. You have been good enough to answer the questions we have submitted to you?—Yes.

The questions and answers are as follows:—

1. Do you accept the proposition that it is desirable to bring about the progressive realisation of responsible government in India, and, if so, how do you define the expression "responsible government"? And do you generally accept the proposition contained in the Preamble?—(a) Yes. (b) A government responsible to the electors. (c) Yes.

2. Do you think that the realisation of responsible government in the provinces involves the establishment in provincial Legislatures of a substantial elected majority (Clause 6)?—Yes.

3. Do you think that the non-official members of the provincial Legislatures should possess power to control the actions and policy of the executive? Do you think they possess such power at present?—(a) Yes, in transferred subjects. (b) No, except by criticism.

4. Do you think that there are certain matters or functions of Government in the Provinces in which at present the provincial executive must remain responsible to the Secretary of State and Parliament, and must therefore be in a position to enforce its wishes?—Yes.

5. If you accept the propositions stated under Questions 1 to 4, do you think that the dual form of government embodied in the Bill is the best means of securing them? If not, what are your objections to that feature of the Bill, and by what other means would you attempt to secure the objects in view?—I prefer the scheme suggested in the "Joint Address," under which work of the Ministers would not be liable to be judged by their attitude to the reserved subjects.

6. If you have any other method to suggest, does it (i.) provide possibilities of advance by stages and facilitate the "progressive realisation of responsible government," and, if it does, in what way (Clause 2, 3, etc.); and (ii.) does it afford means of judgment (a) to the electors and (b) to the Statutory Commission which is to examine and report on progress, of the success or failure in results of the control exercised by the Legislature and those who represent it in the executive?—The scheme suggested in the "Joint Address" has these qualifications.

7. If you consider a dual form of government acceptable in principle, are there any points of detail the modification of which you regard as necessary? If so, what are those points, and what modifications would you suggest?—I accept the principle of dual Government, but desire that European representation should be placed upon a sounder and more permanent footing. I will deal with this matter in more detail when I have answered the set of questions.

8. In particular, do you think (i.) that Ministers should hold office "during pleasure"—i.e., should be liable to removal if they are unable to support the action decided upon in their department by the Governor or if they fail to retain the confidence of the Legislature? (Clause 3 (1).) (ii) That the Governor should have power to disregard the opinion of his Ministers if he considers that action in accordance with that opinion is inconsistent with the due discharge of his responsibilities? (Clause 3 (3).) (iii) That the executive council should in all provinces normally consist of one official European and one non-official Indian? (Clause 4.) (iv.) That the Governor should have power to dissolve his Legislative Council (Clause 7 (4).)?—(i.) Yes. (ii.) Yes. (iii.) Yes, though a non-official European should be qualified for the unofficial seat provided he is elected by a general electorate. (iv.) Yes.

9. Referring back to Questions 2, 3 and 4, if your answers to the first and third of these are in the affirmative, and if you think that the Legislatures should be given greater powers of control and influence than they possess at present, do you regard the limitations imposed generally by Clause 9 of the Bill upon their financial and legislative powers as (i.) suitable, or as (ii.) unnecessarily severe, or as (iii.) inadequate to safeguard the responsibilities which the Government owes in the last resort to Parliament (Clause 9)?—I regard the provisions of Clause 9 as suitable provided the cases which may be specially referred to the Grand Committee under sub-section (3) are only those relating to "reserved" subjects as indicated in sub-section (4).

10. In particular, (i.) do you think that the Legislature should have power with whatever limitations to vote supplies? (Clause 9 (2).) (ii.) Do you accept the plan of Grand Committees as the means of giving to the Government the power to secure essential legislation in the event of their failure to carry their propositions in the Council?—If so, have you any modifications of detail to suggest? If not, what other method would you suggest to secure the object in view?—See answer to Question 9.

11. Do you accept the position adopted in the Bill (Part II.) that the time has not yet come to give the Legislative Assembly a similar measure of control over the Central Government as that given to provincial Legislative Councils over provincial governments?—Yes.

12. Do you agree that it is advisable none the less to provide for a substantial elective majority in the Indian Legislature (Clause 16)?—No. The Central Government should remain unaltered until the reforms have proved successful in the provinces.

13. Do you accept the plan of a bicameral legislature as arising out of this, as constituting both a satisfactory machine for the ordinary purposes of legislation and as affording the means to the Governor-General in Council to secure legislation which he regards as essential (Clauses 14, 15 and 16)?—I do not desire to offer any further opinion with regard to the Central Government. It obviously requires alteration, but its reconstitution should not be taken in hand until the constitution of the provinces has been placed upon a satisfactory basis and proved workable.

14, 15. Do you accept the provisions of the Bill as to the course of legislation in the Indian Legislature? (Clause 20 (3) and (4).) Or do you regard them as unnecessarily restrictive on the popular will, or as an inadequate means of ensuring to the Governor-General in Council the discharge of his responsibilities? Do you accept the changes made by the Bill (Clause 21) in the constitution of the Governor-General's Executive Council? If not, what are your reasons, and what modifications would you suggest?—See answer to 13.

16. Do you think that the development of provincial autonomy on the one hand, and of self-government in the Provinces on the other, involves any modification of the provisions of sections 2, 33 and 45 of the Government of India Act (Clause 23)?—This is a matter for the legal advisers of the Government.

17. Do you agree that the gradual realisation of responsible government involves periodical examination of progress by independent authority, and that the provisions of Clause 28 of the Bill are well designed to afford such examination?—Yes.

18. Are there any matters which it is proposed in the Bill to deal with by rule which you would suggest should be provided for in the Bill?—No.

19. Have you any observations to offer on the Reports of Lord Southborough's Committees and of the Committee on the Home Administration of Indian Affairs?—I have not had the opportunity of perusing the Report of the Committee on the Home Administration of Indian Affairs. As regards the reforms I desire to say that they should be approached in a generous spirit; there should be no "whittling down," and they should be introduced at the very earliest opportunity. Trust in the "word" of the Government of India has undoubtedly weakened in late years in the opinion of Indians generally, and an effort should be made to restore confidence. The British in India are personally satisfied with the present form of government, but many of us recognise that the present system cannot last. It has done its work, and done it satisfactorily, but it cannot go on. Power to criticise without responsibility only leads to discontent. The future welfare of India is dependent on the co-operation of British and Indians in politics, commerce, industries and agriculture. We recognise that reforms must come, and provided that the British interests are adequately represented on the new Councils we welcome Indians being given the opportunity of taking a responsible and active part in the government of the country in which they live. By adequate representation of European interests I do not mean to suggest a majority, but it is necessary to consider what the proportion should be. I suggest that the Southborough Committee and the Governments in India have not approached this question in a proper light.

The importance of the interests which Europeans represent are mainly the following:—(a) Interests of the British Empire, that the British connection may be secured and the British character of the administration may be maintained. (b) Interests of British capital already invested, and which will be invested in India. (c) Interests of Europeans who reside in India. These interests in the past have been safeguarded partly by European officials and partly by elected non-official Europeans.

At present on the Bengal Council, out of 51 members 21 are Europeans, including officials. In the new Council about one-third should be Europeans to represent the above interests. I include officials in the above proportion. In the proposed Bengal Council of 125 there should therefore be 42 Europeans. At present out of the 21 Europeans 14 are officials and seven non-officials. The silent official voters should be as few as possible, and if the non-official Europeans are given votes and allowed to take an active part in public affairs, I suggest that of the 42 Europeans 17 or two-fifths should be officials, and 25 or three-fifths non-officials.

The next question is, how are the non-official Europeans to be elected. The ordinary method of open election by a general electorate will not do. Unless the required number of seats are reserved for Europeans they cannot hope to get in through open competition. There must be separate representation. There are, however, three separate electorates and methods of election possible, viz.:—(a) Election of European Members by a mixed electorate. (b) Election by a purely European electorate, voting being direct. (c) Election by industries or by a practically European (though not wholly European or British) Institute like the Chamber of Commerce. The latter method has been recommended by the Southborough Committee, which allows 12 industrial seats and only two seats from the general body of Europeans.

The chief objections to (c) are:—(1) That an organisation like the Chamber of Commerce has only about 211 members, most of whom are firms and joint-stock companies. Many of the occupations in which Europeans are interested are not represented on the Chamber. The elections would be indirect, by heads of firms and companies which are members of the Chamber. Owing to the system of firms acting as managing agents of several companies it is conceivable that the head of one firm might be able to vote for, and get elected, six separate members of Council. (2) Even the 211 are not all British or European. Some are Indian and some are aliens. (3) Firms and companies are not entitled to votes. It is the individual who is entitled to be voter. (4) If firms or companies, it will mean that absent proprietors or shareholders will, in effect, be voters. (5) The shareholders in many companies are largely Indian, some are aliens. (6) Is the proprietor, shareholder, manager or employee to vote? (7) It is desirable to let Europeans vote as they please so that they may take an active interest in politics. Under the present system only the heads of firms have any chance of being elected, and even the head of a small firm has no chance at all. Up to now the non-official has been practically kept out of Indian politics. (8) The Provincial Councils will have very little opportunity of affecting the larger interests of trade and commerce. (9) Industries are not purely British; Indian capital is largely invested, also alien capital and in the future there will probably be more Indian capital invested. The industries in the future therefore may not be so representative of British interests as they are now. (10) Industrial representation of this sort means the representation of capital without representation of labour. (11) With a few exceptions experience in India has shown that commercial representatives do not as a rule take an interest in public affairs outside purely commercial subjects.

Method (a) is undoubtedly preferable to (b), provided it is certain that representative Europeans would get in. It is useless to have as European representatives men who do not properly represent European interests. Proper safeguards to ensure this may be imposed. With proper safeguards (a) has many advantages over (b). 1. The member would realise that he had been elected to represent Indian as well as purely European interests, and he would get in touch with his Indian as well as his European constituents. 2. The electors, European as well as Indian, would be likely to vote for the man who would endeavour to get things done. A member elected by a purely European constituency will not have nearly as good a chance of getting his views accepted as if he was in the Council as the representative of both Indian and European interests. 3. Europeans should be in the Council as the link between England and India, between Imperial and Indian interests, in order that the British connection may endure. It is eminently desirable that European members of Council in future should be able to interpret faithfully the real wishes of the people, and this can be done by election through a mixed electorate.

If, however, (b) is decided on and Europeans are given special representation by a special electorate with direct voting, the constituencies should be plural constituencies, returning several members each, so that the principle of proportional representation may be applied in the elections. The small number of voters, the fact that they are to be found near or in towns in a small area, and that most of them would be intelligent enough to judge of the comparative merits of the candidates, are considerations which indicate that the principle of proportional representation can be introduced with good results.

The 25 European seats in Bengal, according to the distribution of European voters, may be distributed as follows:—

Calcutta	14
Presidency division, including most of the mills up and down the river ...	4
Rajshani, including Darjeeling and tea districts and zemindaries ...	3
Dacca division, including Chittagong	1
Burdwan division, including collieries	3
	25

The zemindaries, jute, tea, coal and other industries would all be adequately represented under the above scheme.

6190. You have carefully considered the scheme which is before us, and you have yourself been associated, I think, with other schemes?—With the joint address which was prepared by certain Europeans and Indians. I was instrumental in getting up the joint address. Certain Indians and myself met first of all in Darjeeling. I said I should like to find out what was the difference between the Moderate opinion in India and the opinions of Europeans who were prepared for some form of progress. I said, speaking for myself, I found that non-official Europeans in India took very little interest in public affairs outside Calcutta, speaking for Bengal and Calcutta, and as far as I could see there was no objection from our point of view in allowing the Indians to take an active and responsible part in such matters as sanitation and education and local self-government, provided the non-official Europeans, and Europeans generally, were adequately represented in the councils in order that they might get their voice heard and see that nothing was done which would affect the interests of Europeans generally and commerce in particular. This was said to Mr. S. R. Das, Standing Counsel of the Calcutta High Court. He said that was really the views of the Moderates. Then I said, "Cannot we get certain Europeans and Moderates to meet together to discuss the question, and see whether we cannot put forward some proposals by both sides?" We then collected—this was in Darjeeling—as many of the leading Europeans as we could get up there, and a certain number of the leading Indians. We met together and discussed the question, and we then came down to Calcutta and put our proposals before the other members of the European community in Calcutta. I think they were generally favourably received by the European community in Calcutta, but unfortunately they had just been committed to a proposal of their own, and although the members of the Chamber of Commerce in Calcutta desired to get the other representatives of the European Association branches back to Calcutta to reconsider the proposal put forward in the joint address, there was a flat objection by Madras and one or two other places. They said they had already come and discussed the question, and refused to come and discuss it again. So that we were unable to get the address generally considered by the whole of the European community.

6191. The European community practically formulated a scheme. They thought of different points, and what the Secretary of State has put before us is a third one. We do not want details, because it might be rather lengthy, but what do you consider generally, or would you like to tell us generally as to the advantage of the scheme which you had in your mind as compared with that which is before us now?—I do not profess to be an expert in responsible government. Myself, and most of us in India have practically been kept out of politics; we have not been allowed the opportunity of taking any part in politics. That is the real reason of what you may call the apathy of the non-official Europeans. Therefore I do not pretend to be qualified to express an opinion as to the absolute merits of the schemes. The principles, as I read them——

6192. Before you go on may I ask you this question? Is it your opinion that a considerable number of non-official Europeans would be prepared to take part in politics if they had the opportunity?—Undoubtedly.

6193. And take a share in governing the country?—Undoubtedly, and they would like to do so. I have been on the Corporation of Calcutta for five years, and there are a considerable number of Europeans who sit on the Corporation. I do not believe a single one of such men has ever been elected by the Bengal Chamber of Commerce to the Legislative Council, or very few possibly. The average non-official European who is inclined to take an interest in politics has not the opportunity of getting any further than the Corporation.

6194. Will you continue what you were saying?—With regard to the principles, the principles of the scheme put forward by the Viceroy and the Secretary of State, as I read them, are very much the same as the principles in the joint address. They are the same, in this way, that we desire to associate Indians by letting them take responsibility in governing themselves. The question is how it is best to be done. The difference in the joint address was that we suggested that Ministers should practically be independent of the rest of the Government, whereas in this scheme they are not so independent. The only thing which occurs to me, as an outsider, is that possibly the Ministers who are elected under the scheme before us are more likely to be judged by their attitude to the reserved subjects than they are by the subjects which they have to look after themselves.

6195. Judged by the people generally, or judged by the Government?—I should think judged by the people generally.

6196. Do you see any means of dividing more clearly the responsibility of the Ministers from that of those who were responsible for reserved subjects?—No, I say I do not profess to be an expert, not having had the necessary experience. All I do wish is this, that the Indians should be given a chance of taking an active and responsible part in managing their affairs—that they should assume responsibility. What has happened is that lately they have been given power to criticise, and their criticisms have been more destructive than constructive, and I should think if they are given responsibility it will help matters.

6197. You regard it as important that the Ministers should be as far as possible divorced from the reserved subjects, so that their responsibility may be clearly defined on those subjects which are entrusted to them?—I do not know that I can go as far as to say I desire it. I wish to emphasise the fact that I have not had experience actually in what is desirable. I want to see that the reforms which are to be carried out are carried out in a generous spirit, and that they do get real responsibility.

6198. From your knowledge of India, do you imagine that for many years to come the responsibility of the Government could be abrogated for a certain number of subjects, or must the control of the Government be reserved for many years to come, in your opinion?—My opinion is this, that I consider the Indians are qualified. A lawyer, as soon as he passes the examinations, is qualified to practise, but he does not really become an efficient lawyer until he he has practised for a considerable time, and I should say the same thing here. I consider that they are qualified, but that they have not had the practice.

6199. I see you say in answer to Question 12: "The Central Government should remain unaltered until the reforms have proved successful in the Provinces." What period of years do you think is the earliest at which there should be a re-consideration?—I should like to answer that question about ten years hence, I think, when we see how the Provincial Governments have developed.

6200. Have you anything to say on the question of the Grand Committee, which it is proposed should intervene between the Legislative Council and the decision of the Government?—I should prefer to leave that question to people who are more expert than I am, and have had the experience.

6201. You spoke of adequate representation of Europeans. What had you in your mind? Would you like Europeans to vote on a separate panel, or how do you desire to secure it?—I have explained in this note as best I could, that I consider that the Europeans are necessary, and it is necessary that there should be a certain number, and that in order that there should be that number you have got to give them separate representation; but as to how they are to get in, I say there are three different ways. That is what I have put down in my note here, the different ways that they could get in.

6202. Have you any apprehension as to the embarkation of fresh European capital in India if there is a considerable transfer of the responsibility for government?—I think if you do not give them responsible government, and do not carry out a scheme of this sort, you will then have in India greater cause for alarm than you have had for many years past. The position seems to be rather this: We cannot stand still where we are. The Morley-Minto reforms really led you nowhere, and if we continue there is bound to be discontent in India, and that discontent will no doubt take the form very largely of strikes and interference with commerce and interference with trade. If, on the other hand, you satisfy Indian opinion, instead of having those strikes you will find that the general body of Indians will go with you. It seems to me to be rather a question of the parting of the ways, and it is up to the British statesmen to lay the course. If you lay it in the right way you will carry India with you; if you lay it in the wrong way you will have India against you.

6203. I gather that in order to ensure European support in India, both in the matter of capital and otherwise, you must not give powers to men who are qualified, but have not experience, and which may be used against commercial interests; you must give adequate powers, but you must have a sufficient check to be sure that they will not be used detrimentally to the general interest?—No, I think you have to give full powers in certain subjects. From my experience in the corporation, what I want to have is a reliable body of Europeans who may speak as they like and vote as they like, because in my experience in the corporation we find that we get on extraordinarily well together—that the Indians there are men of great ability and of keenness, and we do not find there is any element there of danger or of anything else. I think if you have a strong body, although it may be a small body, of Europeans, you will find the other members of the Council will lay great stress on what they say and on their opinions; and I think that they will certainly be able to guide, if not to lead, the Indians in the Reformed Councils that are to be introduced.

6204. You think a sufficient body of Europeans could be found who would be both eligible and willing to serve and take their share?—I think so; yes.

6205. In municipal matters are all those Europeans you speak of, whose influence is felt, elected or nominated? In speaking of the influence these Europeans have, are you speaking of men connected with the Government, or men who are entirely apart from the Government, and non-official?—Entirely apart from the Government. They are elected by the Chamber of Commerce, they are elected by the Trades Association, and they are nominated. As regards myself, I have been nominated by Government, and some of them have been elected.

6206. Do you find any difference in the acceptance of the opinions of those who are nominated by the Government or elected by other bodies? Are they equally acceptable in the Council?—They are equally acceptable, I think. There may be one or two who are purely official nominees, but I do not think there is anything of that sort in the Corporation.

Mr. Montagu.

6207. I want to ask you a question or two about your scheme. You still prefer it to the scheme of the Report?—As an inexperienced man, I prefer it.

6208. What is public opinion in Calcutta about it now, or when you left Calcutta? Supposing you were to publish it again to-day and ask for signatures, would you get more European signatures than you did in the old days?—I do not imagine that there are any Europeans in Calcutta who have really considered whether the scheme in the joint address, or the joint scheme of the Viceroy and the Secretary of State is preferable. It probably has not been considered.

6209. Is Indian opinion in favour of it growing?—As far as I know, the Indian opinion is prepared for the scheme put forward by the Viceroy and the Secretary of State. I think when it was published they thought the scheme was largely based on the joint address, and they seemed to think that there were some points in the joint address which were preferable to the other.

6210. The relations between the two schemes are really that, starting with the joint address, you can go on making your sub-province bigger and bigger, and if you make it big enough it becomes equal in area to the area of the Province itself?—Yes. What we rather felt was that it would be easier, in making a beginning, to take a sub-province of, say, 10 millions than to take a province of 45 millions.

6211. If the area of the province and the sub-province were the same, the two schemes would be the same?—I do not know that it would be the same, because the Ministers are absolutely independent under the joint address, and they are more or less joined under your scheme.

6212. If the area is the same, the schemes are the same; or at any rate, roughly speaking, they would come much nearer together?—I do not wish to suggest that I for a moment desire to press or say, or even that I am qualified to say, that the scheme we presented was the better scheme, because the scheme we presented was one which was agreed to by people who, as I say, were inexperienced.

6213. Nor do I want to suggest that I am prejudiced for or against either scheme. I want to compare their merits. I want to ask you what you think would happen in your sub-provincial Government which was in charge of the three subjects which you have mentioned, but without any opportunity or power of expressing any opinion on subjects which were not in their charge. Would you, for instance, allow your Sub-Provincial Government to pass a resolution objecting to some action that had been taken in the Provincial Legislative Council?—Are you going to have the two Legislative Councils the same? No.

6214. I am taking your scheme. You have a State Council, I think you call it, with a State Government, in charge of education, say, in a particular part of Bengal; the Legislature of the whole of Bengal passes some statute dealing with police. Would you allow your Sub-Provincial Council, your State Council, to pass a resolution condemning that action?—No.

6216. They have neither an opportunity of expressing an opinion, nor of persuading, nor of advising on the police?—They have such opportunities as they have at present.

6217. But at the present moment they would all be members of the Bengal Legislative Council. Now you are putting them in the seat of Government of your State, in charge of education. Those people would get no opportunity of saying anything about police?—But we are going to create a new power altogether. I do not know that we are actually taking away anything. We say let the present reserved subjects be carried on as at present. At present, I believe, they have power to express a view with regard to the police.

6218. And they do it very emphatically. Those are people in the Legislative Council?—Yes.

6219. But the people in the State Councils would be divorced altogether from those powers?—Yes; the people of the State Council, I say, should not have anything to do with it.

6220. Do you not think there might come to be great friction between the State Councils and the Provincial Government?—My own belief is that the Indians would try and make a success of the scheme.

6221. Therefore, eventually, all the subjects now dealt with by the Legislative Council you would propose should be transferred to the State Council?—Eventually.

6222. Bengal would disappear then?—Yes.

6223. And you would have all sorts of Sub-Provinces, which would then become Provinces?—Yes.

6224. How would you define the areas of your Provinces? Would you set a Commission to work, or would you try to find out public opinion on the subject, as to what the area should be?—I should be inclined to set a Commission to work, which would take the views of members of the public.

6225. It has always been represented to me that the re-arrangement of Provincial areas in Bengal is rather a thorny subject?—I think you are probably quite right there—that is so; it might create very great difficulty. I think a good deal is due to the Government itself, and a good deal of the discontent has arisen since the Partition Scheme. As regards what I have described as the trust in the word of the British Government, that has deteriorated since the Partition Scheme. When the Government partitioned Bengal they then proclaimed it as an accomplished fact, which could never be undone, and they then proceeded to undo it. And since that time I have heard several Mohammedans, amongst others, say that they will not believe the word of the British Government again.

6226. In your Memorandum, and in your answers to Lord Midleton, you talk about the effect of a miscarriage of reform generally on Indian public opinion, and I think you used very grave words. You said that it would be the most alarming situation that we had ever known in India?—Yes.

6227. You know Bengal very well, and I do not. I want to ask you this question: Supposing you were to go to the Bengali and say, "We are going to give you reforms, but the result of those reforms will be that you will not get self-government in Bengal until you split the Province of Bengal into, let us say, four Sub-Provinces," what would be your reception?—I should be somewhat surprised myself if the Legislative Council themselves do not in the course of time suggest sub-divisions.

6228. You will observe that that is provided for in the Bill?—Yes.

6229. Is not that a very different proposition from starting by saying that the scheme depends upon the division of your Province into four?—Yes. My own personal opinion is that Bengal is too large. Whether it is advisable now from what the Government has done and undone to start and re-partition it is a matter for people better qualified than myself to say.

6230. I want to ask you a few questions about the Europeans. Supposing it were desired to get a non-official European as a member of the existing Executive Council in Bengal, do you think there would be any difficulty?—None whatever.

6231. I believe the present law is that you must divorce yourself entirely from business connections, is it not?—I think so.

6232. And you think there are people who are willing to do that?—I have not asked them as to whether they would accept a seat on the Council if it were offered to them.

6233. You assume there would be no difficulty?—I can name two men as a matter of fact; one has just retired from a very large jute concern in India, and he is still there. He is a man of means. He takes great interest in public affairs, like Y.M.C.A. matters and that sort of thing; and another is head of a big shipping firm, who has also just retired, and I know it is his intention to stay out in India for some time and do what he can in the country in which he has done well.

6234. That is very encouraging. You would agree, I suppose, that the large representation of non-official Europeans would only be justified if there was a clear indication that non-official Europeans were prepared to stay in the country and take an interest in it?—What I think is this: I think a considerable number of the commercial community really recognise that they have got to take an interest in public affairs. In the past it has usually happened that the only man who has really entered politics is a man on the eve of retirement. He would have been much more qualified to take part in public life if he had been permitted to do so from his earlier days. I think that you will find that in most of these firms they will allow probably one or two of their assistants to take part in public life, say in the corporation, and stand for election as ordinary members of the Legislative Council. They will thereby gain experience.

6235. Would you prefer the reservation of seats in a mixed electorate, if that were possible?—Personally, as I indicated, that is undoubtedly, to my mind, the best course if it is possible and if you could impose sufficient safeguards for getting in a representative European. I think that is the better course. I am somewhat inexperienced. It is a little difficult if you have a Government composed simply and solely of communal representatives elected by their particular electorates; it seems to me to be somewhat difficult for the Minister, or whoever is the head of the Council, to get his particular Ministers. Which particular community is he going to? Is he going to have one Minister a European, and one a Mahommedan, and one a Hindoo? If, on the other hand, you have a certain number of Europeans elected by a general electorate, I think it will be better for getting things put through and for working with their co-Indian members.

6236. One last question. You would leave the Central Government unaltered. That is your answer to question 12. Your answer to question 19 contains this sentence: "As regards the reforms, I desire to say that they should be approached in a generous spirit; there should be no whittling down and they should be introduced at the very earliest opportunity." Would you regard it as whittling down if we omitted those parts of the Bill dealing with the Government of India, and left it as it is, or when you use the words "whittling down," do you refer only to the Provincial scheme?—I refer principally to the Provincial scheme. I should rather like the members of the Imperial Council, such as Mr. Surendranath Banerjea and Mr. Sastri, really, in the first instance, to devote their time and labour to putting the Provincial Councils on a satisfactory basis, and then eventually proceed to the Central Government.

6237. Have you read or heard the evidence given here?—Only yesterday.

6238. I think it is true to say that most Indian witnesses who have been before us suggest the Bill does not do enough with regard to the Imperial Government. What do you think would be the effect, after that evidence, of doing not so much as the Bill proposes?—I was asked to express my own opinion, and my own opinion is that I should prefer to see the Provincial Government put on a proper basis before you proceed to touch the Central Government.

6239. Could you give me some indication of the opinion of the Europeans in Calcutta about the Imperial Government? Do you regard the Legislative Council to-day as sufficiently representative?—The European in Calcutta looks upon the Government of India as being practically divorced from commercial interests. They have removed themselves. They practically have not the opportunity now of getting into touch with commercial opinion.

6240. You are a member of the European Association?—Yes, I was vice-president of the Calcutta Council till I left India the other day.

6241. Evidence was given here on behalf of the European Association by Mr. Welby, of Madras?—Yes.

6242. How

6242. How was that evidence formulated? Did you have any concern yourself in determining what evidence Mr. Welby should give on behalf of the European Association?—I was not asked.

6243. How was the policy formulated?—By what they call the Head Council of the European Association, which is composed of about a dozen men. It was entirely their own opinions. From time to time Mr. Welby has submitted certain pamphlets, which have come round to the different branches for criticism. We have sometimes criticised them, and have returned them.

6244. I think there are 6,000 members?—I believe it is 8,000.

6245. This evidence, which was given on behalf of the European Association, was formulated by a dozen men without reference to any of the other members?—Yes. I think it has been the practice. As I say, I think the Government are partly responsible for the apathy of the non-official European, who has not bothered himself very much about politics, and therefore for several years all the representations of the European Association are really the representations of the Council. If it were put to the vote of the 8,000 members, probably out of the 8,000 there are only 200 or so who concern themselves with politics at all.

6246. Your joint address was signed by, roughly speaking, how many Europeans?—Somewhere close on a hundred, I think.

6247. I only want to know where I am. You present the views of a hundred?——

Lord Sinha.] Sixty-four, to be accurate.

Mr. Montagu.

6248. Sixty-four Europeans. Mr. Welby comes here on behalf of 8,000, but you come to analyse it, you tell us Mr. Welby comes here on behalf of twelve?—On behalf of the Head Council, yes. I suppose if you asked the members of the Association as to whether they would repudiate what their council had done, they would probably say no.

6249. I omitted one other question. Have you studied the scheme of reform presented by the majority of Local Governments?—No, I have not, as a matter of fact, because I do not consider myself so qualified with regard to the details of a scheme.

Sir Henry Craik.

6250. Do you know other parts of India?—I know the whole of Bengal fairly well—at least the greater part.

6251. The United Provinces?—No, I do not profess to speak for other parts of India. I do not know them.

6252. But you have lived in the more outlying parts of Bengal?—No, in Calcutta.

6253. You have lived in Calcutta always?—Yes.

6254. Do you talk the language?—I talk Hindustani, yes.

6255. On grounds of principle, what distinctions do you draw between the scheme put forward by this meeting in Calcutta, which you declare generally that you prefer—what are the broad grounds of difference between it and the scheme of the Joint Report?—I think the main ground is that the Ministers under the joint address scheme are acting independently, and under the scheme before us they are acting jointly.

6256. And they are acting independently, because by your scheme of sub-division of Provinces you leave them with very independent and responsible powers within a sub-division where they are acting, and in regard to the duties that are assigned to that sub-division?—Yes, we desire to give them full responsibility in certain subjects.

6257. And therefore get rid of what some of us feel to be the great difficulty of a government that is not only one, but yet which represents different tendencies, and therefore cannot be united. That is, the dual system?—Yes.

6258. You want to get rid of that?—We wanted to give them the full responsibility, and at that time we did not quite see how it could be done if they were acting jointly with the others.

6259. Quite so. And your opinion, and that of those you represent, is that by assigning within smaller areas full responsibility, that might offer a means of advance and of growing responsibility more successfully than under the dual system?—Yes. I do not know that the question of division was what you might call a sine quâ non. The question of division was because of the forty-five millions, and we thought it would be easier to get on with less.

6260. You are speaking of the United Provinces. You would rather divide them into something, ten millions, or fifteen millions?—Yes; I am speaking also of Bengal. I thought forty-five million inhabitants in Bengal was rather large.

6261. Then about the question of the choice of the European representatives, you put forward two schemes, and you prefer what you call method A, that is, the election of European members by mixed electorates?—Yes. I should like to say that there should be so many Europeans, but as to how the Europeans are to get in is a different matter.

6262. But nominally you are making them representatives of a mixed electorate?—Yes, to be elected by them.

6263. But a mixed electorate, however much it prefers others, cannot prevent a certain number of Europeans coming in?—No; I say you ought to have a certain number of Europeans.

6264. That is scarcely representative government, is it? Would it be a very dignified position for a European? Supposing there were four vacancies, and there were four Indians elected with very large majorities, and then you told them: "No, only three of you can be elected, and you must have a European," who is perhaps near the bottom of the poll. That would be the only way. You reserve a certain number of seats for Europeans?—Yes; we reserve a certain number of seats for Europeans, and we allot them to certain specified areas.

6265. Your method of getting the European in is to say: "You have so many representatives; one must be a European, and we will take one European, however he stands upon the poll." Is not that the only method?—Pardon me, I think not. Say there are to be in this Council 125, of which, say, one-third, or whatever it may be, are to be Europeans. Of that one-third you take out the officials, because I am quite willing the officials should be included in the European representation. Then you have got your general electorate distributed probably over the whole Province. Then you come to where you are going to put in these European seats. You have to get your European representation——

6266. If you will excuse me, do not say the point is where you put in your European seats. It is not that. We presume they are settled. It is where you are to get your European representative, the occupant of the seat. You must begin by arranging for a certain number of seats. You say so many of these must be assigned to Europeans. How do you get the Europeans in?—By either a general electorate, or by a purely European electorate.

6267. According to your plan it is to be a general electorate, which you say you prefer?—Yes.

6268. Supposing the general electorate puts a large number of Indians at the top of the poll, still the returning officer must return one European?—I should not do it in that way at all.

6269. That is what I want to get at?—I should say you take a particular electorate—say an income-tax electorate, people paying on 2,000 rupees and upwards. Those are the people who would elect in this particular way. The general electorate would have a very much lower qualification. I have made a note here. This was in a statement I submitted to the Franchise Committee: "As regards the qualification of a voter who will vote for a European member, I would suggest that all persons who pay income tax on an income of 2,000 rupees and over should be allowed to vote. I am suggesting this figure for the following reason:—I do not think that there would be any European voter with an income of less than 2,000 rupees, and an Indian voter who in a mixed electorate would be entitled to vote for a European member should also have the same qualification."

6270. Your plan is not exactly a mixed and open electorate, but a special electorate?—A special electorate, yes.

6271. Surely

6271. Surely the easiest way to get a special electorate is to say that the people who are to be represented should vote. Would it not be better to have a special electorate for their representation? What can be the reason of saying, "I think if you create a fancy franchise of a certain high income probably there will be a dominant section who will elect a European." Is not that a very artificial way of doing it? Is it not better to say, if you are determined to have a European in, "We had better let the Europeans elect him"?—In the Council, I think, the European may possibly command greater authority or respect if he actually does represent Indian interests as well as European interests.

6272. Are you really doing so? Does he represent Indian interests when according to your plan you are not to have an open electorate, but a specially constructed electorate, where you think he might possibly have a chance of getting in? Are you able to say he represents the Indian electorate? If you must have Europeans is it not better to get them elected by Europeans plainly and straightforwardly?—As a matter of fact, Europeans who are elected to the corporation are elected by a general electorate.

6273. But you told us that they would not be elected to the Legislative Assembly——

Lord Brodrick (Viscount Midleton).

6274. We cannot carry it much further. If it were possible by direct election you would like to have the Europeans elected by that, but, failing that, you think there should be means for those Europeans who wish to co-operate to be in the Council?—Yes, I want to get them there. If I may answer Sir Henry Craik's question, in the general electorate for the corporation in those particular districts the Europeans are in greater number, and in one particular case where an Indian did contest a seat against a European several Europeans voted for the Indian, and the Indian got in.

Sir J. D. Rees.

6275. The Bengal Government deals with matters of first importance to commerce in Calcutta—there was the Khidderpore Dock, for instance?—Yes.

6276. And the Legislative Council have a certain influence and will have greater influence over the Bengal Government?—Yes.

6277. You say in answer to Question 19: "In the proposed Bengal Council of 123 there should therefore be 42 Europeans." Then, lower down, you say, "(8) The Provincial Councils will have very little opportunity of affecting the larger interests of trade and commerce." I do not quite understand that?—The Questions with regard to taxation and things of that sort, any matters which may affect commerce, as I understand, are dealt with by the Imperial Government.

6278. You do not really mean that "the Provincial Councils will have very little opportunity of affecting the larger interests of trade and commerce"?—No; I suppose they can in certain things. What we rather desire is that, so far as trade and commerce are concerned, that ought to be, as far as possible, left to the Central Government to deal with.

7279. But this Sub-clause (8) is rather more than you mean?—I understand trade and commerce is more or less a reserved subject. That is what I meant. If it is a reserved subject, then they will not have so much to do with it.

6280. In answering Mr. Montagu, you said with reference to getting a non-official European representative that it would be possible to get a prominent merchant who was staying on in India. Do you think it would be possible to get the most prominent men, like the men who hitherto have represented the Chamber of Commerce, like, for instance, Lord Inchcape, who was my colleague as an additional member? Would it be possible to get the higher representatives, the biggest representatives, of commerce in Calcutta to remain? Do not they have to come home to join the home firm as soon as their term as head has finished?—You have picked out a particular instance, but I have often asked several Europeans if they can name anyone, barring about two, within the course of the last thirty years, who, being members of the Imperial Council, nominated by the Chamber of Commerce, have ever done anything that they can remember in the Imperial Council; and they mostly say that, barring Lord Inchcape and one or two later exceptions, they cannot recall anybody. I think there are men—I have men in my own mind now—who I believe would do very well, and command respect. For instance, the man who has at present been elected to the Council, Mr. Crum, I think would be a very excellent representative; and the man who has retired from the firm of Landale and Clark. I think the late Sir William Ironside, who lately died, at a meeting of the European Association, said he considered it the duty of Europeans who had made their money in India to stay there and try to do something for the benefit of the country.

6281. And you think they will do that in future?—Yes, I think so.

6282. In reply to Mr. Montagu you referred to the divorce between the Government of India and the chief mercantile community in India—namely, that of Calcutta—by the removal to Delhi. I dare say you know that this matter was brought before the House of Commons when it was decided upon. Do you know that the Government of India claim to spend two months now in Calcutta, in spite of that change? They claimed to do so. Do you know that?—They certainly have not done so.

6283. It was formerly only three months. Am I right in saying one used to be summoned for about three months. That was the whole of the stay of the Government of India in Calcutta, was it not?—That is so. But most non-official opinion considers that the move to Simla is unnecessary, and that the Government of India ought to be in one of the provinces—we do not say Calcutta, Bombay, or anywhere. Somewhere where they are on the spot.

6284. I have here a note upon the Indian Reform proposals, in no sense confidential—it has been published—issued by the Indo-British Association and written by Sir John Hewett: "British rule can only be interpreted by British agents." Do you accept that, or wish to say anything about it?—I do not think I agree with it.

6285. As a matter of fact, are not the British agents very few amongst the numbers who do interpret British rule in India?—Undoubtedly.

6286. You do not agree with it?—No.

6287. In the same pamphlet I find this: "The real trouble about the Government of India is that for ten years or more it has ceased to attempt to govern." I should like to ask you having in view the condition of all Governments all over the world, and particularly for the last ten and the last five years, whether you accept that, or whether you could make any remark about it which would help the Committee?—I think that the general opinion out there in the last few years is that the Government of India has been more or less a Government of conciliation rather than a strong Government. I think it would have been better if, instead of trying to conciliate, they had put their foot down. If they thought that powers ought to be given to the Indians, by all means give them. But that is what we have rather felt: that the Government has not been very strong.

6288. It has been less autocratic, do you mean, or less bureaucratic, or how would you put it?—I think that it has been——

6289. More conciliatory, you say?—Yes.

Mr. Montagu.

6290. The Rowlatt Act was a good example?—I think it is, in a way, because the impression we got after Lord Curzon's time was this: Lord Curzon was an extremely popular Viceroy. Although, unfortunately, he made a speech which put the whole of the Bengalis against him, up to the making of that speech I think he was an extremely popular Viceroy amongst the Bengalis; he was a strong Viceroy; and afterwards the idea came out that things were to be allowed to go on—that the various proposals Lord Curzon made were to be allowed to take effect, and we rather felt that the Government was not governing. I do not mean to say with regard to Indians, or anything else.

Sir J. D. Rees.

6291. I do not know whether I should ask this question, Lord Middleton. (To the Witness.) Are you familiar with the history of the Calcutta High Court?—What do you call history? I practised there as a solicitor for thirty years.

6292. Could you say that in the history of the Calcutta High Court it has had a very distinct disposition to support Indians and Indian aspirations against anything that might be considered to be the encroachments of the Executive?—Certainly not.

6293. You say it has not had that disposition?—I say the Calcutta High Court has heard cases and decided them to the best of its ability. I do not think it has been a question of trying to do one thing, or trying to do the other.

6294. I did not exactly mean that. Could you say that it ever had a sort of corporate attitude towards large questions of reform, or Indian aspirations, to use the common expression? Could you say that, or not?—No, not that I know.

6295. Do you think that now at the present time, in the present development of intelligence and political feeling in Bengal, the fact that one member of the Bench——?

Mr. Montagu.] I really must call your attention to a point of order, Lord Midleton. We are discussing the Government of India Bill. The present cross-examination has led to an expression of opinion as to the merits of the present Government of India as contrasted with its predecessors, and as to the political views or activities of the High Court of Bengal. I think this is most unfortunate.

Sir J. D. Rees.] In any case I will leave it.

Lord Brodrick (Viscount Midleton).] I did not check the first question, because I think it is quite a fair question to ask the witness whether the Europeon population agreed with so strong a statement as Sir John Hewett's, of there being an abrogation of Government in the last ten years, but the question as to the High Court I was going to stop.

Sir J. D. Rees.

6296. When I put it, I asked you to watch me and see if I were encroaching. (To the Witness.) I ask you, as a last question, whether you consider that the scheme in the Bill, particularly with the suggestions which you have mentioned, will have a good effect upon public opinion in India, and whether it possesses sufficient safeguards to satisfy, so far as you know it, moderate European opinion?—Personally I think it does.

Mr. Spoor.

6297. I would like to ask you a question regarding that conference you had at Darjeeling, from which the joint address emanated. It was attended, according to this Report, by 64 Europeans and about 90 Indians. How far would you consider that conference representative of public opinion?—It is not quite correct to say it was attended by that number. That is the people who signed it. They did not all attend. First of all a certain number attended in Darjeeling, and then we put it before a considerably larger number in Calcutta, and then it was afterwards published; and we asked anybody who liked to sign it to send in their signature.

6298. Would you consider that these 90 Indian signatories are in any sense representative of any body, more than the 90 people themselves?—I think that many of them are representative of what I might call the Moderate Association.

6299. I take it that really you represented in that conference more than anything else, commercial interests?—From the European point of view.

6300. I see you have certain missionaries there who signed?—Yes, and there are heads of firms. Take signatory No. 1, which is a somewhat important one with regard to the question put to me by Sir John Rees; that is Mr. C. B. Gregson. He was the manager of the Midnapore zemindary. He has also been, in India, the head of Messrs. Andrew, Yule and Company, with which Sir John Hewett is associated, and he has signed the joint address, and he is a man who has very considerable, if not more experience of Bengal and the lower classes in Bengal than any other European. Then there is Mr. Crawford, who is also a zemindary manager.

6301. In the list of interests which you think should be specially considered you refer to the interests of British capital already invested. Do you believe that the security of British capital is in any way imperilled by the Bill? Assuming the Bill is carried in its present form will it have a stabilisng effect on British capital invested there, or otherwise?—I should think there would be much more danger if you did not carry the Bill.

6302. Do you think that the need of British capital in India will continue to diminish as time passes and as India secures a still larger measure of self-government?—I should think it would continue to increase.

6303. I do not know whether you are aware that we have had it suggested here by one witness that as time passed, and as India's credit improved, as it would improve, he believed with the industrial development of the country, a time might be reached when British capital would not be required?—I should not agree with that.

6304. You also said that the interests of the British Empire should be secured, and that the British character of the administration should be maintained. Do you mean that the British character of the administration should be permanently maintained?—We mean with regard to doing things in the right way. There is no doubt that the British Government so far have brought about the present what I may call efficiency and prosperity of India. We desire to see that the connection between England and India is maintained, and I think, as I have said, that the Europeans who may be elected will very largely act as a sort of connecting link between the Empire as a whole and India in particular.

6305. All the Indian representatives we have had here have expressed the desire to remain within the British Empire. I do not think that necessarily involves the British character of the administration being maintained. Does it not occur to you that is rather contrary to the terms of the pronouncement of August, 1917—the progressive realisation of responsible government?—I wish them to be responsible. The only thing is I do not want to exclude the Europeans. I want the Europeans to be there in order that they may see that things are actually done in the right way, and help by their advice and assistance.

6306. But more and more the tendency will be to secure India for the Indians, that is, a complete measure of self-government ultimately?—Not to the exclusion of the non-official European, who is out there and working. Why should not the non-official European take a large part in helping?

6307. I do not suggest that there is any desire for such exclusion; at the same time to suggest that the British character of the administration is to be permanently maintained is, in my opinion, going rather contrary to the aim of the Bill, and certainly the spirit of the pronouncement of August, 1917?—What I mean is that the present character of the administration, call it Indian or call it British, whatever it is should be continued in a satisfactory manner.

6308. One question with regard to responsibility in the Central Government. You are very definite, both in your answers and in your joint address, on that question. You believe there should be no interference at all with the Central Government?—That is my private opinion, because we are, in a way, proposing to alter the Central Government very much on the lines of the Provincial Governments to a certain extent. I think that you should start with the Provincial Government, and get that on a really satisfactory footing first, and, having got it on a satisfactory footing then take in hand the Central Government.

6309. You state in your address that you believe in progress by successive stages. Do you not think that a reasonable element of Indian representation in the Central Government would be a perfectly legitimate and perfectly safe line? I mean at the very start a reasonable element of Indian representation. Would not that be quite in harmony with the declaration of August, 1917?—May I put it in this way: Personally I accept, and am quite willing to accept the proposals of the Viceroy and the Secretary of State; but speaking generally, from the point of view of the Europeans, I think that they consider that you should begin with the Provincial Governments, and then go and tackle the Central Government.

6310. You would agree, however, that Indian opinion does not agree with that?—Yes.

6311. Personally you would agree with the proposals made by the Secretary of State and Viceroy?—Yes; they are experts, and I am not. If I had been Secretary of State or Viceroy I should have taken the other way; but they know more about it than I do, and they say this way, and I say all right.

Mr. Bennett.

6312. Have you ever heard it complained that the influence of the British character in the administration of India has been harmful to India?—No.

6313. You would not think that it would be an unmixed advantage to India if the activities of British character were gradually to disappear from the life of the country? If I may put it in another way, has the activity of the British character been for the good or for the ill of India?—It has been for the good.

6314. That meeting that you had in Darjeeling, I take it, you regarded as a fairly representative meeting, did you not?—When it got to Calcutta.

6315. You had something like 170 of both races?—Yes.

6316. And it represented, as I read the list, nearly all elements of Indian life, except the Extreme Right and the Extreme Left?—May I ask what you mean by the Extreme Right and the Extreme Left?

6317. The Extreme Right means the reactionary, and the other would mean the aggressively radical, so to speak. The term is French rather than English, I am afraid?—You do not include Moderates in either the Extreme Right or the Extreme Left?

6318. No, I do not?—As regards the Extreme Right or the Extreme Left, I think you will find a note at the bottom of the joint address, or rather a memo. here, and, in fact, three letters which we have appended. One of these letters is signed by Mr. C. R. Das. I do not know whether he represents the Extreme Right or the Extreme Left. What he said was this: "I think there is no reason why the whole of the Provincial Governments should not be made responsible to the people in the different Provinces. But, in view of the differences of opinion that exist among different communities a scheme such as this calls for the careful consideration of all parties and communities. It is certainly desirable, as I said before, that in a matter like this all parties should co-operate and try and come to a common understanding. I have no doubt that the Bengal Provincial Conference, which meets in Calcutta at an early date, will fully and carefully consider this."

6319. Are you a member of the Bar?—No, I am a solicitor.

6320. I think you belong to a family which has had a very prominent part in the life of Calcutta?—Yes. My father was a very well-known member of the Bar, and so was my uncle, Sir Griffith Evans.

6321. He was Advocate-General?—Yes, I thought so. You do not represent in any large degree the commercial interests of Calcutta?—I am not authorised to speak on behalf of the commercial interests.

6322 You take a broad view of the question and are aiming at the good of India as a whole?—Yes.

6323. You do not even take a selfish European view of the matter?—No.

6324. You have thought the basis of co-operation between Indian and European can be found in this proposed legislative system?—Yes, undoubtedly.

6325. You mentioned you were a member of the Calcutta Corporation. Did you find racial differences assert themselves in the Corporation in any degree which would interfere with the smooth and harmonious working of that body?—Practically not at all. There certainly are two members who occasionally bring up racial animosity, or try to. One is a European journalist, who seems to like trailing a red rag before a bull, and the other is an Indian. The Indian, when it comes to a question of appointments, very often tries to get a non-European appointed. Otherwise, with the exception of this, they work most harmoniously together.

Mr. Bennett—continued.

6326. Have you found that caste enters into every operation of the Corporation?—My experience is that it does not enter into it at all.

6327. There is a great authority against you, if I may say so?—I have no objection.

6328. Is the Chairman or President of the Corporation elected in Calcutta?—No, he is nominated. As a matter of fact, they have just had a proposal to alter the municipal constitution in Calcutta. At the present moment the Chairman is nominated. This new Bill was sent to the Corporation for criticism, and we took up the question of the constitution of the corporation. It was sent to a sub-committee and a special committee to deal with the Bill, and at the first meeting of that committee the Chairman, who if he is present always has to sit as the Chairman of the Committee, wanted to know if the members, who were principally Indians, considered that he should be there or not. They said that they considered he should not be there, because they were dealing with his position, to a certain extent, and he then retired, and it was then necessary for the members of the special committee, composed of about fifteen or twenty, to elect a member as Chairman from amongst themselves. Although there were a number of Indians there in the majority, they did me the honour to elect myself, and we were able to produce and send up to the Government a unanimous report on the constitution.

6329. And you would not be surprised if, when you elect your own Chairman, the Calcutta Corporation were to follow the example of the Bombay Corporation, where, although there is a large Indian majority, it frequently elects a European President? You would not be surprised if your Corporation were to imitate that example?—My own belief is that if you had an election of chairman of the Corporation at the present moment they would elect the European official who has just been chairman of the Corporation.

6330. I think you prefer a general electorate, in which a seat or seats should be reserved to a European, is that so? You prefer that to the alternatives which you have suggested?—Personally, I think it is better.

6331. How would you frame that constituency? Would you place it in an area in which there was a substantial European population?—Yes; I should try and divide it principally in the places where the Europeans are.

6332. You would take the commercial quarter of Calcutta?—As a matter of fact, in a statement which I prepared for the Franchise Committee I did allocate them, and if it is any assistance to you I can give you a copy of it.

6333. Perhaps you will do so?—Yes.

Lord Sinha.

6334. I think you have annexed it to your answers?—Yes. But in Exhibit A, a statement I submitted to the Franchise Committee, I have gone into it in more detail, and I can hand over three copies of that.

Mr. Bennett.

6335. I will not ask you to repeat your answers to the questions put to you by Mr. Spoor. But have you heard recently of large European undertakings being projected or established in India very recently—new enterprises?—Yes, I think there are some.

6336. Did you notice yesterday that the "Times" mentioned that Thornycroft's were going to open up a branch in India?—Yes.

6337. Have you recently heard of a much larger engineering firm in this country arranging to open works in India?—I have heard, yes.

6338. I have not mentioned names, purposely?—I think I know the name of the firm you refer to. I would rather not say anything about it, because I happen to be the solicitor of the firm in question.

6339. It is well known that great British undertakings are even now being projected or started in India?—Not only British, but American.

6340. That is unfortunate?—I am not sure about the Japanese as well.

6341. Quite apart from any checks there might be upon their action, would you be afraid of the Indian Legislature attempting to pass differential commercial legislation to the disadvantage of British enterprise?

Have

Mr. Bennett—continued.

Have you ever contemplated such a possibility as that?—No. As a matter of fact, I think, if I might mention this, it has been rather the other way. There is a good deal of feeling in India over the question of the Lancashire piece-goods. You have referred to my uncle, Sir Griffith Evans. He happened to be at that time the member of the Government who insisted on introducing this, or at any rate keeping it up. I recollect, from statements that he made at that time, that he said the nominated members of the Council were expected to vote with the official majority, but that he did not agree with this, and he declined to do so. And he probably would not have been re-elected but for the fact that he was an extremely capable man, and the Government thought they had better keep him instead of getting rid of him.

6342. You, as a European with interests in India, have no fear lest an enlarged or liberalised Legislature should operate to the disadvantage of your interests, and European interests generally, in India?—I happen to be a landholder in India, and I should be perfectly content to leave my investments in India, notwithstanding the new Government.

6342A. You are not following the example of British landholders?——

Major Ormsby-Gore.

6343. Following on what you have just said about Lancashire piece goods, is it the opinion of that section of the European community whose signatures are here, and with whom you are associated, that the present control of Indian policy by this country should cease, and that fiscal autonomy should be established in India?—I do not know whether I am entitled or authorised to speak on their behalf in that respect.

6344. Can you give me your own opinion?—My own opinion is that fiscal autonomy ought to be with the Government of India with regard to commerce generally.

6345. I see in your joint address, section 8, you suggest that legislation passed by Provincial Governments affecting commercial and industrial undertakings should be reserved for the sanction of the Secretary of State, and a limited time should be laid down, within which representations from the interests affected can be received by him; and, further, that instructions to this effect should be included in a schedule attached to the Act of Parliament in which the scheme of reforms was embodied. Now, is not that rather an attempt to rivet the control of Whitehall on commercial and industrial development in India even more than that control has been exercised in the past? What do you think you gain under that in reserving commercial and industrial undertakings to the Secretary of State?—What we were trying to do at this particular time was to try and get Europeans and Indians to agree upon a joint scheme. We wished to get in the Europeans in order to see that their interests were not going to be prejudiced in any way under the new form of government. Therefore I think that should be reserved for the sanction of the Secretary of State.

6346. What are the apprehensions, if any, of the persons interested in industrial and commercial undertakings in India that those undertakings might be interfered with to their disadvantage under the scheme embodied in the Bill.—That the industry should pay for the government.

6347. They are afraid, in other words, that increased taxation may be put upon Indian industries which those industries cannot bear under the present conditions of competition?—We are quite willing to give the Indians full responsible government in certain subjects, provided that for the present the commercial interests are not prejudiced, and this was put in more with a view to safeguarding commercial interests.

6348. That safeguarding of commercial interests is a safeguarding in fiscal and taxation matters, not in legislation so much, or anything of that kind?—That is so.

6349. On the other hand, you told me just now that you wanted, as far as possible, the present control of all Indian revenues by the Secretary of State in Council here to devolve on the Government of India?—Yes; but I am not a commercial man, you see, and we had to agree. It was a question of getting agreement, and the commercial community said: "We are prepared to agree to this, provided we are protected"; and it was put in for that reason.

6350. What is the present attitude of the unofficial European community as regards the way in which the Government of India at present facilitates, or does not facilitate, the industrial expansion of India? We have had the evidence of Sir Stanley Reed that further industrial expansion of India is absolutely necessary. Do you think we can leave the Government of India unaltered, as you suggest, having in mind the suggestions of the recent Industrial Commission? Do you think that ought to be given legislative effect in any scheme of reform?—Yes. I think what we really suggest is the power of control of the Provincial Government over law and order, and also in protecting the interests of the different communities like, for instance, the religious rights of the two peoples, the Mohammedans and the Hindoos, should remain and that nothing should be done which might interfere with that in any way. As to the details of carrying out the industrial proposals suggested by the Committee, of course there is no suggestion that they should not be carried out.

6351. There is no great demand for the inclusion in any reform scheme of any definite statutory changes which would give either the Provincial Governments, or the Government of India, powers which they do not at present possess?—No. Speaking from the point of view of an outsider in India, I say that after the publication of the Report of the Mesopotamia Commission we should have been very much inclined to try to get along with some other members of the Government, if it had been possible to put them in, and to get rid of the Executive Council. We should have liked to have had a change and put in some other members of the Executive Council; but we cannot suggest anything of that sort can be done at the moment.

6352. Your proposal, really, as I understand it, based on the fact that you think Bengal is too large and that it must therefore be sub-divided, is rather in the nature of anticipating what you consider Indian opinion will come to. Is that a correct interpretation of your scheme? You say you are quite sure that in time people in Bengal will find the Central Government is inadequate to deal with the area. You anticipate that view which you contemplate by suggesting a scheme to establish it now?—If I were an Indian Minister and were asked whether I should prefer to make a start with governing 45 millions or with governing 10 millions, I think I should prefer to govern 10 millions. That is what seemed to us—that the divisions were rather unreal and rather large.

6353. If you took a considerable number, I have no doubt you would find some who would say they would prefer to govern 45 millions?—To govern the whole 300 millions, possibly.

6355. You said in the course of your evidence that under the scheme you were afraid that Indians who are administering transferred subjects would always be regarded by India as responsible for anything that went wrong in a reserved subject. We have had a good deal of evidence from that chair in exactly the opposite direction. How do you come to that conclusion, that an Indian will be held responsible for something that goes wrong in a reserved subject, rather than a European?—It may enter into it on the question of the Ministers, I think. When they have to go back to their constituents for re-elecion they might possibly prefer to put in a pleader instead of a landholder, because they might think the pleader, if he were elected a Minister, would have more power or be better able to convince the Executive Council than a landholder would.

6356. It is a different point, is it not? However, I do not want to press you upon it. The only reason I put it was because so many people have told us that under under this dual system the unfortunate European will have to bear the brunt of the evils of both sides. You are the first witness who has put the boot on the other leg and suggested that the Indian is going to bear the brunt?—There is one thing with regard to the scheme I should like to say. I do not know why all possibility of a non-official European being a Minister should be excluded; at least I do not know that it is excluded, but it is rather assumed that Ministers are always going to be Indians.

6357. It is assumed that a non-official Minister will always be an Indian, and not a European?—Yes. If the Indians wish to elect a non-official I do not know that there is any objection to a non-official European being a Minister.

6358. I do not think there is anything in the Bill to prevent that. Now, with regard to industrial development, you regard that as very important, although you said just now that you speak as an outsider. I suppose you speak as an outsider who knows a good deal of what is going on inside from the position you occupy. From your experience you would say that the industrial development in all the Provinces is second to none in importance?—Yes. I do not know whether to put it first or second to agriculture. I think, taking agricultural development and industrial development, I should put industrial development probably first.

6359. It is of the very first importance?—Yes.

6360. Would you like to see a greater development in the direction of joint enterprise as between Europeans and Indians?—Very much so.

6361. Is that making any way at present? Do you know of many businesses which are jointly run now by Europeans and Indians?—As a matter of fact, shortly before I left some Indian clients of mine came and offered to subscribe, and wanted to form an Indian jute mill. They were particular about getting hold of the best European manager they could. I think that is very largely going to be how trade will develop. There is undoubtedly a large amount of capital in India, and I think that if it is properly looked after, at any rate in the first stages, and they can get hold of European managers to look after it, and so on, with Indian directors, there will not be the slightest difficulty. I expect it very largely.

6362. I think you said just now you would prefer to see in the early days industrial enterprise as a reserved subject?—Yes, that is the view of the representatives who signed the joint address.

6363. I will ask your opinion on this: Do you not think it is important that in a matter of this character you should have joint co-operation, and if possible joint control by Europeans and Indians in the future development of industry?—Taken outside the council or within the council?

6364. I mean in the Executive Government. Wherever industry has to come into touch with government and has to be subject to government, as it has to be in all countries, would you not say that it would be more likely to be successful in the future if that government were composed of both Europeans and Indians, and was not merely subject to the decision of an executive mainly European? Do you follow my question?—I am not quite certain that what you might call the necessary co-operation in politics is necessarily going to induce co-operation in business; I think the co-operation in business will develop irrespective of the co-operation in politics.

6365. You do not understand my point. There are occasions when business has got to come into contact with politics in that it has got to be subject to control. That is the point I want to get from you. Would you prefer to see that control represented by the two races with equal power rather than by one race?—In the future, I think probably by the two.

6366. With regard to the control of industry Sir Stanley Reed is very strongly of opinion that all industry should be under the control of the Provincial Government, and that any superior control on the part of the Government of India should be removed. Do you agree to that?—I am rather inexperienced with regard to that. I have not studied the question with regard to the point of view of industry, which is right and which is wrong—which is the correct way of doing it. All I know is that the Europeans who have signed this report and are willing to support the reforms are perfectly willing to support responsible government being granted provided that their interests are not endangered in any way. I cannot go any further than that.

6367. As a solicitor your opinion would be of value in this connection, and that is why I am asking the question, to elicit it if possible. Apart from control in starting these enterprises they may require assistance, financial or otherwise, outside and beyond what is to be procured within the Province?—Yes.

6368. Would you say that that assistance and guidance could better be given through the instrument of the Government of India or through the instrument of the India Office, possessed, as it might be, of a commercial department?—I am afraid I find that difficult. I have not had any dealings with the Secretary of State or the Viceroy personally.

6369. It is not so much the Secretary of State and the Viceroy. It is the guidance and the assistance. Do you think that an enterprise started in Bengal would derive the combination of control and assistance more effectively if it were done from Simla or more effectively if it were done from London?—Are you speaking with regard to London capital or with regard to capital raised in India?

6370. I refer to all those matters—the control to see that too hazardous an enterprise is not entered upon, the terms of the capital, and the way the capital can be raised, and so on, all of which you are very much more conversant with than I am—all the whole arrangements of a concession and settlement of an enterprise?—I would sooner not answer that.

Lord Sinha.

6371. I suppose you have a very large number of clients, both amongst the European merchants and amongst Indian merchants, as many as anybody else in Calcutta?—I think we have.

6372. Is it your experience that the feeling between Indian and English merchants is not now so friendly as it was before?—I should be very much surprised to hear that there has been any difference. If there has been any difference I think it has been in the way of becoming more friendly.

6373. We had it from Mr. Welby that the feeling is not now so friendly as it was between Indian and English merchants. You disapprove of that entirely. Your experience is the other way?—Yes. I think what Mr. Welby must have been referring to is the feeling as represented in the Press. I think that the European Press in India—at any rate, in Calcutta—is very largely to blame for any feelings that there may be with regard to that. It generally happens you find the European Press says something and the Indians retaliate.

6374. It is generally begun by the first-mentioned, especially with regard to any questions of reforms? Now, is it the fact that the European commercial community has been threatened with extinction?—I am not aware of it.

6375. Neither by newspapers nor speakers, so far as you know?—I am not aware of it, except I might say this, possibly. This is all, I imagine, based on some particular——

6376. Newspaper controversy?—I think what happened was that at a meeting of the European Association a particular gentleman, who was the representative of one of the papers, got up and said that the people in the Legislative Council were composed of lawyers, landholders and moneylenders. A few days after that one of the leading Extremists got up at a public meeting and said that all the Europeans out there were petty traders and had to be got rid of. That is what happened, I think. I do not think anybody else paid much attention to it

6377. It was a mutual exchange of compliments from Extremists on both sides. In your experience in the Courts throughout Bengal have you ever heard that the judgment of a Court is venerated more or less according to the caste of the judge who pronounces it? Have you ever heard such a thing as that?—I think a statement like that is ludicrous.

6378. In the High Court, as well as in any other Court, have you found caste having any influence at all, either in the profession, or on the Bench, or in any other relation? I am dealing only with the Courts?—The only thing I can think of is it might possibly possibly have an effect in the Criminal Court. If a jury were to consider whether a Brahmin had committed murder or not, I do not know whether he might not stand a better chance of getting off through being a Brahmin.

6379. They would probably not hang a Brahmin. But apart from that?—Apart from that there is nothing.

6380. Have you ever seen any trace of the influence of caste in the Courts?—Nothing whatever.

6381. Mr. Welby used to be in Madras till he came to Calcutta as the secretary of the European Association?—Yes.

6382. He was a journalist in Madras—editor of the "Madras Mail"?—I believe so.

6383 He has rather distinguished himself as an extremist in opposition to the reforms, has he not?—I think you might say that Mr. Welby rather led the European opposition to the reforms.

6384. And he has been rather vehement in his language?—Yes.

6385. And he had created a good deal of ill-feeling by reason of that?—As far as I could judge.

6386. He has toned down a bit since he came to Calcutta, has he not?—I think he has changed his views considerably.

6387. No. 53 in the list of signatures, "A. Yule." Is that Sir Andrew Yule, the head of the firm you mentioned?—No.

6388. There is another one amongst the Indians, "S. N. Banerjea, No. 37." That is not Mr. Surendrenath Banerjea, but a young barrister?—That is so. Mr. Surendrenath Banerjea, as a matter of fact, attended the Conference, and I believe he supported the scheme, and I think he undertook to sign it. But, unfortunately, he was away at the time. In fact, he did not sign it.

6389. In your answers you state you would rather leave the Central Government alone for the present. Does not that refer to the question as to whether there should be a division of functions so far as the Central Government is concerned, in the same way as the Joint Report proposed with regard to the Provincial Governments?—Principally.

6390. Is not that it primarily?—Yes, primarily.

6391. So far as the expansion of Legislative Councils is concerned, for the purpose of making them more representative, you do not object to that, do you?—No, I think it is more the Executive.

6392. That is what I wanted to get—that it is your desire that the Central Government should be left untouched, reserved really to the Executive Government in the Government of India?—Yes.

6393. Now, with regard to the scheme, of course the joint address was prepared before the Secretary of State arrived in India, really?—That is so.

6394. And therefore it was long before the report was published?—Yes.

6395. And the central idea of the joint address was a division of functions between two portions of the Government, one being subject to popular control and the other not. That is the main idea?—That is the main idea.

6396 And was it the view of those who signed this that that idea could be more conveniently carried out with regard to a population of 10 millions, than, for example, with regard to a population of 45 millions?—That was so.

6397. And that is the object of the proposed division of the Provinces into Sub-Provinces?—Yes. Not only numbers, but areas as well.

6398. It depends a great deal upon the people?—Yes.

6399. The area is taken to be a small one, because they will have to deal with a small number of people?—Yes, the discussion is there in the preliminary part.

6400-1. Do you remember the reasons given in the Joint Report of the Secretary and the Viceroy for rejecting that scheme with regard to that feature? When the joint address was considered the question of cost was not gone into, was it?—No.

6402. The scheme would involve separate Legislatures for each Sub-Province, a separate staff of officials for each Sub-Province, and separate Executives?—Yes.

6403. So that the question of expense is a very material factor?—Undoubtedly it has to be considered.

6404. It was not considered as a matter of fact then?—Not minutely, I think We were told, I think, that it would not be excessive.

6405. It would have to be really two entirely separate governments working with separate staffs and separate legislatures?—That is so.

6406. That is one of the reasons why that is rejected. You have not considered it even now in detail, as regards the question of cost, have you?—No.

6407. And you agree, do you not, that any general scheme of geographical partition before any scheme of reforms is put into operation would evoke opposition in almost every part of India?—Yes, I think so.

6408. Remembering what happened with regard to the partition of Bengal, you would agree with that?—Yes.

6409. And you would also agree, would you not, that the re-distribution of Provincial areas should not be imposed by official action, but should be left to the Legislative Councils?—I accept it.

6410. You believe, as the authors of the Joint Report do, that the Provincial Legislative Councils will as a matter of fact recommend the re-distribution of Provincial areas?—I expect that they will do so in certain places.

6411. Therefore the question of sub-division is only a question of time, according to you. The joint address, before the Report, which was made after consideration of the evidence from all quarters was presented, suggested that re-distribution should be made before any scheme was put into operation?—Yes.

6412. Whereas the Report says the re-distribution should come after the scheme is put into operation?—Yes.

6413. That is the main difference?—Yes.

6414. But with regard to the essential feature, the division of functions, it is common to both?—Yes.

Lord Brodrick (Viscount Midleton).] Thank you very much.

(After a short adjournment.)

THE RIGHT HON. E. S. MONTAGU IN THE CHAIR.

(The Committee sat in camera for a short time.)

The Revd. DR. S. D. BHABHA and MR. K. T. PAUL called in; and Examined, as follows:

STATEMENT by REV. DR. S. D. BHABHA, President of the Indian Christian Union of Great Britain and Ireland.

Historically speaking, the British Government in India never encouraged the Christian missionary. As a matter of fact, he was banished from the British territory and took refuge in Burma.

However, the Christian Church had existed in India since the days of St. Thomas. The missionaries from the Apostolic Patriarchate of Antioch founded the Christian Church in India. The missionaries from Persia preached Christianity in the North and in Afghanistan; those from Alexandria and Syria in the South.

The Syrian Christians with their converts settled down in the kingdom of Travancore. By their exemplary lives they won the favours of the noble-hearted kings and queens of Travancore. Many valuable grants of lands and money were made to them.

When

When the Portuguese went to India, the Roman missionaries were surprised to find a Christian Church well established and flourishing. They did their best to claim them for Rome, but succeeded only in attaching to themselves a few congregations. When at the end of the 18th century the British began their rule, the Bishop to the English in India visited the Church in Malabar and offered to send English missionary teachers. The offer was accepted. Two English missionaries commenced their work, but instead of teaching secular subjects they attempted to proselytise the children of the ancient Church, wishing to make them Protestants.

The then Syrian Metropolitan of India, with his bishops and priests, requested these men to leave their dioceses. They did not do so, and appropriated some of the land and money to themselves and made a schism in the Church.

Following this the English missionaries started missions of their own. These men are the fathers of the so-called caste system in the Christian Church.

They had the white man's church, where no Indian priest would be allowed to officiate. It suited them to allow the caste converts to have churches of their own and separate churches for Christians of the outcaste people. This sort of un-Christian procedure is confined to the Madras Presidency alone.

In the other Presidencies where the Scotch and the Irish missionaries began the work, they never countenanced caste in any form or shape.

The children of the Brahmins sat side by side with the children of the Chambhars. I remember once the Hindu teachers threatened to resign, but the missionaries stood firm, and the Chambhar boys reached the highest rung in the educational ladder. One took his degree of Master of Arts, and another was qualified as a physician.

A retired Anglo-Indian missionary is going about in this country trying to prejudice the minds of the natives against Mr. Montagu's Bill. Caste and Brahmins seems to be the bogey with which to frighten the people and tell them that Christian missions will suffer.

As Indian Christians we refute it, for history has taught us that Hindus have been most hospitable not only to Christians but to Parsees and Jews. The Maratha Brahmins are considered a terrible set of people. One instance of a Brahmin convert from these brave men will suffice.

The late Rev. Dr. Narayan Sheshadri became an apostle among the Mangs and Mahars. He received and administered the Blessed Sacrament from the same chalice to the converts from all castes and no caste. He was highly honoured by the Maratha Brahmins.

Another notable case of a Brahmin Christian was that of the late Rev. Father Nehemiah Gore, of whom Prof. Max Müller said that he (the Professor) learnt more of the Christian religion from Father Gore than from any of the bishops of the Church of England.

All over India, particularly in Northern India, he was loved and revered by all.

As Indian Christians we have sufficient faith in our non-Christian brethren that they will allow us liberty of conscience. The only person who will have to reconsider his position will be the English missionary. Whether he will give up his autocratic and bureaucratic ways and become a real help in shaping and moulding the lives of the people, or retire and lament over the lost opportunity. The Oxford, Cambridge and Dublin Universities Mission Brotherhoods give some promise of better things.

Missionaries of the type of Andrews, Allnutts, Lefroys and Westcotts are revered and loved both by Christian and non-Christian.

The Rev. Dr. Palmar, the Bishop to the English in Bombay, says:—

"Christianity as preached by the European missionary is objected to by the Hindu as anti-national; but Christianity is international, which the West has forgotten."

On the national platform there is no Brahmin or Pariah, no Moslem nor Christian, no caste man nor out-caste man. They are all the sons of India, their loved motherland, all loyal and true subjects of their beloved Emperor, King George.

God Bless the King.

Mr. Montagu.

6415. I must apologise to you for the absence of Lord Selborne, who has asked me to take the Chair on his behalf. Would you care to make a statement to the Committee on the points which are of interest to you?—(Dr. Bhabha.) I have sent a written statement in, as I was asked. The statement I have made is that the British Government, when they first took over the government of India, did not allow missionaries to do any missionary work at all; in fact, they were banished from India, and they had to go to Burma. The Christian Church in India has existed since the days of St. Thomas. The missionaries from the ancient apostolic Patriarchates of Antioch and Alexandria went to South India and North India and established Churches. In South India the work of the Syrian Christians and their converts was very highly appreciated by the Kings and Queens of Travancore, and they made grants of land and money to them. Then, at the advent of the Portuguese Government, the Christian Church had to suffer. Then followed the English rule. The first Bishop of Calcutta went to South India, and, finding this large, flourishing Christian Church, poor, but holding the essential doctrines of Christianity, offered to send Christian missionary teachers. Two missionary teachers were sent, but, unfortunately, instead of teaching secular subjects, they began to try to make the Indians members of the Church of England. The Bishops of the ancient Church took fright, and told them to leave the place. They would not leave, but, on the contrary, they appropriated some of the endowments, both of land and money. Then they started missions of their own, and the question of caste, which has been brought before your Committee here, came in, and really it was the English missionaries who were the fathers of the caste system in the Christian Church, but that is confined only to a small portion of the Madras Presidency. A great deal has been said about the Brahmins, and I have mentioned instances of Brahmin converts, including some Maratha Brahmins. One of the most eminent Brahmin converts was Dr. Narayan Sheshedri, who founded a large Christian colony amongst the outcasts, and he administered the Sacraments to them from the same chalice as he received it himself. Another was the Revd. Father Nehemiah Gore, of whom even Professor Max Müller in Oxford said that he had learned more Christianity from Father Gore than from all the Bishops of the English Bench. Father Nehemiah Gore was revered all over India by the Brahmins as well as by the outcasts. As far as the Indian Christian communities are concerned they know nothing of castes. If any caste is existing in a community it is due to the English missionaries who have, for purposes of their own, tried to keep the people separate, but in other Presidencies in Western Indian, and in the Bombay Presidency, and in Calcutta, in the mission schools the outcast boys of the city sit side by side with the Brahmin boys. I remember the instance that I have mentioned in my statement where, when the Tamil boys came to school the Hindoo teachers offered to resign, but the missionaries stood firm, with the result that these boys continued their education and one of them took his degree of Master of Arts in the University, and another was qualified as a medical man. To this day Brahmins send their sons—Hindoos of all communities send their sons—to England. I am an Indian Christian, and they send their sons to my care. They are not afraid. The Brahmin Christians associate with the Higher Brahmins in India, and to say that the caste system is in any way going to interfere with any political liberties that the people of India will get is simply absurd. Certainly, the Brahmins are a more intelligent and more educated people and they have got the power of government, but as Indian Christians, as a Christian Church, we are not in the slightest degree afraid of the Brahmins or Moslems. As I said, on the National platform we have neither caste-men nor out-caste men, Christian nor heathen. As far as the Hindoos are concerned, as I have stated/ the Hindoo sovereigns have been most hospitable to the Parsees when they first migrated to India, to the Hebrews, to the Jews, to the large colony of Ben-Israels scattered all over India, and more particularly in Southern India. I think it is a libel on the Hindoo people to say that they will in any way interfere with the Christians. Of course they may become become Christians and be persecuted, but they know their work, and that has nothing to do with it. Christians are persecuted. If a Protestant became a Catholic in this country he would be persecuted, but that is nothing. I am afraid they are persecuted bitterly.

6416. Is that all you have to add?—Yes.

6417. Mr. Paul, have you anything to tell the Committee?—(Mr. Paul.) I have prepared a statement, but I had not time to furnish copies of it.

6418. Will you read it? Before you begin Lord Sinha reminds me, would you mind telling us something about yourself, or is that in your statement?—I do not know what I can say about myself.

6419. What province do you come from?—I am a native of South India, and I have been asked by the All-India Christian Conference to represent them before this Committee, the All-India Christian Conference consisting of representatives from various provincial Christian organisations. My family has been Christian since 1801.

6420. What have you been doing recently?—I am now general secretary to the Young Men's Christian Association for the whole of India, and for the last six years I have held that office. Before that I was connected with another All-India organisation, connected with the Church; and before that I used to be on the staff of the Madras Christian College. During the past thirteen years I have been travelling all over India in connection with those two All-India organisations.

6421. What denomination do you belong to?—My denomination cannot be mentioned in terms of Western denominations. It is a new Church, including all the Congregationalists and Presbyterians in South India, and it is called the South India United Church. It is about nine or ten missions, hailing from different countries, who have co-operated in that Union.

6422. Thank you?—Sir, I first want to make a statement about the effect of the caste system on politics. In support of my conclusions, I wish to present my own personal experience. I am a native of a typical Mofussil (district) headquarters town of about 80,000 people, named Salem, in South India. The municipality of this town consists of a purely Brahmin ward, several purely non-Brahmin wards, a couple of wards mainly Mahommedan, a ward of bungalows occupied mainly by Europeans and the wealthier Indians, and a ward, very largely mixed, of all sorts of people. In the whole municipality the Indian Christian votes are about 1 per cent.

My entry into local politics took place when I was invited by a few Brahmin friends to stand for their ward. My opponent was a prominent Brahmin vakil (that is, a pleader), who afterwards became chairman of the municipality. I was defeated by less than 10 per cent. of the votes, which means, of course, that a large number of Brahmins voted for me. Brahmin feeling was certainly used against me, but not, I have good reason to believe, by my gallant opponent. The large measure of support I received was therefore due to what may be called the general common sense of the Brahmin citizens.

I then entered the Municipal Council through the "mixed" ward, and was elected for two terms. All through my experience, in the many questions of varying importance which come up for decision caste feeling had influence every now and then; but it was fought down successfuly by a group of us, friends, Brahmins and non-Brahmins who stood on the larger ground of unity. During the brief time (a few months) when I acted as Chairman, my experience was the same. The gentlemen who were elected chairmen after me were both Brahmins, namely, Mr. P. T. Subramania-Ayer and Mr. Chakravarthy Rajagopalachari. The former an orthodox conservatively religious Hindoo, the latter of the modern reforming class. Both of them were undoubtedly men of fair play and justice in the treatment of non-Brahmin interests. A significant incident in the administration of the latter may be cited. A Panchama, menial employee of the municipality, was transferred to the Brahmin ward. His duty was to open the water taps. This was objected to by a Brahmin councillor, who raised the point in the Council and wished to put pressure on the chairman to get the man re-transferred. Another Brahmin councillor was firmly against it on the sole ground of justice, and was supported by the chairman, who was himself a Brahmin. Finally the decision of the council was in favour of the chairman's action. I have also had facilities to observe the way in which caste spirit operates in the elections to the Legislative Council of Madras, and in the administration of the Revenue, Judicial and other Government Departments in my own district, and I have noted the phenomena in some of the other districts also in the course of my many tours in the last fourteen years. My personal conclusions are: First, in South India Brahmins were early in possession of most of the Government posts and largely of the Bar, and therefore of public influence, and undoubtedly used their advantages for holding on to their dominance. Secondly, the Non-Brahmin communities took a long time to shake off the traditional subservience to Brahmin leadership, reinforced as it was by the advantages indicated above. When, by reason of considerable spread of English education, non-Brahmins gained independence of thought, and realised the situation, the resentment was naturally very great and even violent. Thirdly, all the while, however, it was undoubted that there were individuals on both sides who stood for fair play, justice and unity. With the rise of nationalism their number is increasing almost every day. For instance, even in the periods of heated controversy, in several towns in South India there were frequent what I call "cosmopolitan dinners," promoted by members of both classes who were determined to promote unity. These were attended by Brahmins and non-Brahmins, and also Mahommedans and Christians. Fourthly, as to the Panchamas, their grievance is not specially against Brahmins. At the same time, they are still too far behind the stage of education and material well-being to take care of their own interests. It will not do to expect any of the castes as castes to Godfather the Panchamas.

Fifthly, Indian Christians should be treated separately from all these three classes, Brahmin, non-Brahmin and Panchama. Whatever the source of the recruitment of my community, its interests, needs and even law are in many important points distinct from the others. Personally, I am opposed to such a distinct separation, and am working against it. Meanwhile, things have to be taken as they are and dealt with accordingly. While this is so, it is certainly wrong to say that the Indian Christian community would need the special protection of the British Government as against Brahmins or any other Hindoo caste. The indigenous Christian community of Travancore, called "Syrian Christians," have for centuries not only flourished in peace and religious freedom, but also flourished under a Hindoo kingdom which is certainly to-day the most backward in its caste feeling. So also did the Roman community under the Niaks of Madura, and the Lutherans and Anglicans under the Maharattas of Tanjore.

Then I wish to say something about the representation allowed by the Franchise Committee to the Indian Christian community. The representation allowed is not felt by the members of the community to be satisfactory. So long as the principle of representation of minorities is practised it is important to allow our community a share equal to the others on principles of fairness. This may best be provided for by reserving a number of seats for Indian Christians in plural constituencies retaining the general electorate. The laws regulating our community are made in the Imperial Council. There is, for example, at the present time widespread dissatisfaction with reference to the laws regulating marriage and succession. Therefore, we submit that at least one member be allowed to my community on the Imperial Council, which may for the present be by nomination and later, when the constituencies become more developed, elective.

In Southern India our community fails to understand why it should be allowed only three representatives, whereas the sister community of Islam should have thirteen, seeing we are almost half as many as they in numbers and almost twice as literate. The All-India Conference of Indian Christians specially mentions in a cable to me the necessity of providing a member in the Central Provinces.

We submit that our representation should be by election and not by nomination. Our people have been for a long time trained in the art of electing representatives by ballot to committees, councils, boards and assemblies connected with the ecclesiastical organisation. This is true not only of the urban, but also of the rural congregations. Further, through the agency of our Indian Christian Associations (which will now become all the stronger), it is possible to ventilate political views and exchange opinions between the leaders and the rank-and-file of the community. If any body of people in India are already competent to understand and handle the Franchise with intelligence and independence it is our community.

Then I wish to say something about the "Enfranchisement of Women." I am familiar with rural life in most parts of Southern India, and do not see any difference as between men and women in the interest taken in politics and administration. I do not follow the point implied in the Southborough Committee's statement that it is premature to extend the Franchise to women, when so large a proportion of male electors require education in the use of a responsible vote. To my mind the education of both sexes in this matter should begin at the same time. As for the educated community, while the percentage of educated women is very small, the position already accorded to them in public opinion and life is such that it will be an extremely delicate situation to accept an arrangement implying their inferiority merely by reason of sex. I say this with reference to all communities, and not only mine. In my neighbourhood probably the most capable head of a zamindari for 100 years was Mutchialamma, who was almost totally illiterate, and yet thoroughly educated in many matters of public importance. On the District Board of Salem, of which I was a member for a number of years, she would have been at any time worth half a dozen nominated male members.

In India the social unit is the family. When the Franchise is given on a basis of inherited property, it may reasonably be given to the head of the family, whether male or female. Where given on a basis of self-earned property or income, it should not be denied to women. Nor should women be excluded if it is conferred on a basis of education. Speaking for my community, I certainly feel that the time is quite ripe for the enfranchisement of women.

Then I wish to say something about education as a transferred subject. On this point I have not had the opportunity of ascertaining the views of my community. I hold the Madras University's degree in teaching, have been teacher, head-master of a high school, and tutor in the Madras Christian College. I have also been a member of the Missionary Council of Education at Madras for several years. My personal view is that education in its entirety should be transferred. If there are fears that elementary education will be starved, the educational progress in the Mysore State may be referred to for re-assurance. In that country, while a University has been started, at the same time elementary education is rapidly advancing, and is being made practical and vocational. I certainly hold that at the present stage preference should be given to elementary education, and that no expense or man-power should be spared to make it practical; but I cannot conceive of any minister not recognising the necessity for this when he studies his subject from all points of view. As for higher education, I think the solution is not in reserving it separately, but in securing that it and, in fact, all education, be not killed by over-departmentalisation, but kept abreast of the needs of the country and of the times by the freedom which can only come when guided in a real manner by expert and non-official opinion.

Lord Sydenham.

6423. What association do you represent, Dr. Bhabha?—(Dr. Bhabha.) The Indian Christian Union of Great Britain and Ireland.

6424. Of whom does that body consist?—Of Indians residing in this country for study and so on from all parts of India.

6425. How many Indians does that include?—It varies according to the number of the students there may be, and at the present moment there are about 80 belonging to the denomination.

6426. Where are the headquarters of your association?—London.

6427. Have you an office in London?—We have no office.

6428. You meet for consultation?—Yes, we meet, and the junior branch meets at the Y.M.C.A.

6429. You have not any separate corporate existence, you have not any local habitation?—No.

6430. How do you prosecute your business—do you hold annual meetings?—Yes. We used to hold our annual meetings in a public hall, and representatives from nearly all the missionary societies used to attend.

6431. From Ireland as well as England?—Ireland, of course, could not send their representatives, but if the Indian Christians from Ireland were here they attended our meetings.

6432. Is there any branch of your association operating in Ireland?—Not in Ireland; we have no branch there. There may be two or three Indian Christians at a time there.

6433. You have given us a good deal of old history. What do you mean by the caste system in the English Church of to-day?—That I confine, as I said, only to Southern India. The missionaries allowed their converts to harbour caste prejudice, and would not allow the converts from a lower class or different caste communities to worship in the same church.

6434. Which missionary bodies made that exclusion?—In Southern India.

6435. Which of them made this exclusion which you refer to?—I am afraid they were mostly of the Anglican Church—the Church of England.

6436. Do you say that all the Church of England missions in Southern India exclude the lower castes from their schools?—Not from their schools, but from their churches. They have separate churches. They started with having a church for the English people themselves, and would not allow anybody else to be there; they did not want them, and then, of course, they had converts from the higher communities, the Brahmins and so on, and they had Churches for themselves.

6437. Do the other missionary bodies—for instance, the American missions—do that too?—No. The missionaries are beginning to see the folly of it now, and the thing is dying down.

6438. All you mean is that this one society, this Anglican society, originally had separate classes for European Christians, and provided other churches for Indian Christians?—The higher-caste Indian Christians and the lower-caste Indian Christians had to worship separately.

6439. You do not seriously tell us that the Christian Missions of to-day encourage caste prejudice or differentiate between castes?—No.

6440. I do not quite understand what you mean?—There is a missionary going about the country, a Mr. Sharrock, and he is one of the missionaries who did not want the Christian community to unite; and it was in consequence of what Mr. Sharrock has been saying that I brought that in.

6441. I take it that you do not mean what I understood you to say: that, as a matter of fact, the Christian Missions to-day encourage caste or differentiate between castes? They do not?—No. But still the churches which were established are there, and the system is still going on, although it is dying out. The Indian Christians themelves are rising to force the missionaries' hands to let there be one Church. There should be no distinction of caste or creed.

6442. Are there not many Indian Christian priests now, and one Indian Christian bishop?—There is one, after a century of missionary work.

6443. There is one now?—Yes, there is one now.

6444. Do you mean to say that any of the missionaries exclued Panchanas from their schools?—I am not able to answer that question as to the Panchanas; my friend here may be able to say.

6445. I should very much like to know?

Mr. Montagu.

6446. I understand that these two gentlemen are not in any way connected, and therefore we had better finish with the one before we ask questions of the other. Dr. Bhabha, when were you last in India?—Not for many years.

6447. You

Lord Sydenham.

6447. You do not know whether the missionaries exclude Panchanas from the schools or not?—I do not.

6448. You know that the Panchanas are excluded from the majority of Government schools in Madras?—Yes.

6449. And you know that is only done because the Government knows that public opinion in the villages would not tolerate their inclusion?—Well, possibly that is the Government understanding.

6450. You do not suppose for a moment that the Government would not admit them to every school if they had the chance?—I think they ought to. In other presidencies, where the Government stood firm, all the outcasts were admitted into the schools.

6451. They are not admitted in Bombay. I do not know about the city itself, but they are not in the rural districts. If they are not excluded, they have to sit in little groups apart from the other children, as if they were criminals or outcasts, and I have seen them myself. You have read the Laws of Manou, I suppose?—Yes.

6452. Do you consider that their influence has entirely disappeared from India?—Not entirely.

6453. Do you think any Brahmin now enjoys any privileges at all in India?—To a very limited extent. What privileges he gets are very limited, and the Brahmin is not the same man that he was in the time of Manou. Since the advent of the British Government the Brahmin is no more a Brahmin; he does not follow his profession, because the Brahmin should actually be a priest. The Brahmin is now entering into every walk in life, and he is not exclusively a priest, which he used to be.

6454. It is quite clear, at any rate, that the Brahmin cannot exercise the privileges that he could in the olden times, when he could cut out the tongue of members of a certain class. So that practically he enjoys no special privileges at all?—That is so.

6455. If there were a conscience clause adopted by the Legislative Council which applied to all State-aided schools, how do you think that would affect the Christian schools?—It would not affect the Christian schools in the slightest degree; in the Christian schools, as I gave an instance, you see Christians, Brahmins and Hindoos all sitting together.

6456. You are aware that the Christian schools do not confine themselves to Christians, but throw their gates wide open to Hindoos and Mohammedans?—I am talking of the educational institutions of the missionaries; I am not talking of Christian schools for Christians themselves. They have no such institutions at all; they are for the general public, where the children of all communities and all castes are admitted without distinction.

6457. You say that if a conscience clause applied to a school of that kind, it would have no affect on the Christians?—I do not think so.

(Dr. Bhabha is directed to withdraw.)

Major Ormsby-Gore.

6458. (To Mr. Paul.) There is one question I wish to ask you, Mr. Paul, and that is on the question of Christian representation. I think under the Southborough Committee's proposals they are allotted three seats in Madras?—Yes.

6459. You state that they want more?—I did not state that in my statement. I made no reference to any number.

6460. You were comparing the Mohammedan representation of thirteen?—Yes, I stated that our community is dissatisfied with that number. The number originally suggested was five, and that would have been nearer the mark.

6461. Roughly the Christian community of Madras is divided mainly into two halves, namely the Protestant half and the Roman Catholic half?—Yes.

6462. And they are about equal in numbers?—Yes.

6463. How do you think that the three seats would work out? Do you think you would get a contest for each seat between a Roman Catholic and a Protestant?—I have suggested in my statement that there would be no communal electorate, but seats reserved for Indian Christians.

6464. You would rather have, in fact, the recommendations of the Southborough Committee with regard to the communal representation of Indian Christians done away with?—Yes.

6465. And in its place the reservation of seats?—Yes.

6466. You say five?—I would deprecate anything which would stereotype or add strongly to our separation in India; we should very much like to be part and parcel of the whole community.

6467. The point I am anxious to get at is with regard to the suggestion for the adequate representation of the two main divisions of the Christian community?—Obviously an even number would be more satisfactory.

6468. Provided those interested in the Protestant schools and those interested in the Catholic schools can make their voices heard in the Legislative Council, that is what we want to get at?—Quite so.

6469. And you think that can be done better by the reservation of seats?—Yes.

6470. Than by having the possibility of a fight between the Catholics and Protestants in the three separate constituencies?—Quite so.

Lord Islington.

6471. What do you mean by the reservation of seats; what is the electoral machinery you are proposing?—I am proposing that the Indian Christians be not made to vote only for their Indian Christian representatives, but that in the general election, so to say, all communities be asked to return a certain number of Indian Christian representatives.

6472. You mean, that you ask for a territorial basis for the electorate?—Yes.

6473. But at the same time a reservation, of whatever it may be, three or six Christian representatives?—Yes, that is it.

6474. And how are you going to do that if you do not get them returned on an open franchise? Supposing you put your candidates up and they are all defeated, and others get in, what is to be the process by which you are to get your six seats? Would you cancel the successful candidature of six to make room for yourselves? What would be the method?—I confess I have not thought it out.

6475. It wants thinking out, does it not?—Yes, certainly it does.

6476. Otherwise you would get into great complication?—Yes; but I understood that was one of the alternatives proposed.

6477. I know it is one of the alternatives proposed, but I fail at present to discover how it is going to be worked out in practice, and how you are to get over the difficulties of elections turning out unsuccessfully to your own community, and what course you are going to take then to ensure that you get your stereotyped number. You have not thought that out?—I have not.

Lord Sinha.

6478. Have you found from your own experience any difficulty in co-operation with regard to matters of politics between the educated Christians and the educated classes of the other communities?—No, I have not.

6479. They have always co-operated together?—Yes.

6480. As a matter of fact, some of the Indian Christians in Calcutta and Bengal, which I know best, have been leaders of political thought in Bengal?—Yes.

6481. As regards what Lord Islington asked you, is not this scheme that you are thinking of one of plural constituencies, there being so many seats, out of which there must be one for which the candidate is only to be a Christian, or, rather, the candidates have to be Christians, and the adherents of no other religion?—I said that would be better to be in plural constituencies.

6482. The electorates are to be the whole body of the voters, but one seat or more is to be earmarked for the candidates of your religion; that is the scheme?—That is so.

6483. There is no difficulty about that, is there?—I really confess I have not fully thought out how it will work.

(The Witness is directed to withdraw.)

Ordered,—That the Committee be adjourned to Monday next at 11 o'clock.

Die Lunae, 25° Augusti 1919.

MEMBERS PRESENT:

Duke of NORTHUMBERLAND.	Mr. F. D. ACLAND.
Marquess of CREWE.	Mr. BENNETT.
Earl of SELBORNE.	Sir HENRY CRAIK.
Lord ISLINGTON.	Mr. MONTAGU.
Lord SYDENHAM.	Sir J. D. REES.
Lord SINHA.	Mr. SPOOR.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THE EARL OF SELBORNE IN THE CHAIR.

SIR VERNEY LOVETT, K.C.S.I., is called in; and examined, as follows:—

Chairman.

6484. What position do you hold in the United Provinces?—I am a member of the Board of Revenue in the United Provinces. My last post was President of the Committee appointed to consider the reorganisation of the Medical Services.

6485. You were at one time a member of the Bengal District Administrative Committee, 1913-14?—Yes.

6486. You have been good enough to send in answers to our questions?—Yes.

The questions and answers are as follows:—

1. Do you accept the proposition that it is desirable to bring about the progressive realisation of responsible government in India, and, if so, how do you define the expression, "responsible government"? And do you generally accept the proposition contained in the Preamble?—We are bound by the declaration of August the 20th, 1917, to bring about the progressive realisation of responsible government in India. We were understood to mean government amenable to the peoples of the various Provinces of India. I accept the proposition contained in the Preamble.

2. Do you think that the realisation of responsible government in the provinces involves the establishment in provincial Legislatures of a substantial elected majority (Clause 6)?—I answer this question in the affirmative.

3. Do you think that the non-official members of the provincial Legislatures should possess power to control the actions and policy of the executive? Do you think they possess such power at present?—The non-official members of the Provincial Legislatures exercise control over the actions and policy of the Executive by moving resolutions, by asking questions, and by criticism of Bills in Council and before Select Committees. I cannot improve on the remarks in paragraphs 92-4 of the Montagu-Chelmsford Report, which are entirely accurate. The control in question is substantial. It must be increased in view of the terms of the declaration referred to above; but, as is recognised by the framers of this Bill, it cannot be absolute as long as the British Parliament is responsible that government in India is administered for the benefit of all His Majesty's subjects resident in the country.

4. Do you think that there are certain matters or functions of Government in the Provinces in which at present the provincial executive must remain responsible to the Secretary of State and Parliament, and must, therefore, be in a position to enforce its wishes?—I answer in the affirmative.

5, 6. If you accept the propositions stated under questions 1 to 4, do you think that the dual form of government embodied in the Bill is the best means of securing them? If not, what are your objections to that feature of the Bill, and by what other means would you attempt to secure the objects in view? 6. If you have any other method to suggest, does it (i.) provide possibilities of advance by stages and facilitate the "progressive realisation of responsible government," and, if it does, in what way (Clause 2, 3, etc.) and (ii.) does it afford means of judgment, (a) to the electors, and (b) to the Statutory Commission which is to examine and report on progress, of the success or failure in results of the control exercised by the Legislature and those who represent it in the Executive?—This is the first occasion on which I have been requested to record my views regarding the Reforms proposals. My time for intensive study of the official literature on the subject is short. I am not as familiar with it as I would like to be. Broadly, however, my views are as follows:—If the terms of the pronouncement of August, 1917, involved an immediate allotment of separate and clear-cut responsibility which was to be succeeded by additional allotments as these were deemed advisable, the diarchy proposed satisfies the requirements of the declaration better than any alternative arrangement. If it can be worked with sufficient harmony and will not involve frequent friction and agitation, it will clearly facilitate the realisation of full responsible government. Theoretically it is the best solution of a most difficult problem. It has also the advantage of having held the field for some time, and was originally accepted by sober politicians with a welcome which would, I think, have been less qualified but for indirect Extremist pressure and Extremist influence on the Press. The procedure, too, adopted by the highest authorities of publishing detailed proposals for criticism compelled the Indian politicians to ask for more. On the other hand, in the words of the majority minute of Provincial Governors, the dual system proposed by the Montagu-Chelmsford Report exposes a large surface to administrative and financial friction, especially to financial friction. By the masses dual transitional government will not easily be understood. They look on Government as one and indivisible. They will consider, and be told, that its shrinking British element and otherwise altered conditions are signs of the impending abdication of the British Raj. That is how fresh changes will present themselves to their minds, and the effect, enhanced by Extremist efforts, will be unsettling. Lastly, dual government, accompanied by substantial, measured and progressive reductions of the British elements in the all-India services will, I fear, in course of time depress British recruitment for those services to a marked degree. These disadvantages are, I think, inherent in any transitional system which aims at the achievement of Parliamentary Government in India by pre-arranged stages, stages likely to be rapid when the obstacles to be encountered are remembered. These obstacles have been excellently described in paragraphs 133, 136-7 and 195 of the Montagu-Chelmsford Report. When we note that the population involved is 2½ times as large as the population of the United States, we cannot but realise the magnitude of the enterprise which we have undertaken. No good can come from underrating it. Whatever successes may attend the initial stages of transitional government, under the dual or any other system that may be devised, the final stage will be a very big venture indeed. The unified system of transitional government proposed on January the 15th, 1919, in the Minute of the Majority of Provincial Governors accords better with previous experience and tradition than does diarchy. It would be much simpler in operation; and if it had been proposed originally as a possible interpretation of the policy declared, and accepted as such by Indian

Chairman—continued.

Indian political leaders, it would, I think, work more smoothly, although with less outward promise of an early arrival towards the goal which diarchy is intended to reach. But this unified system came late into the field as a debateable proposition in circumstances certain to secure it an unfavourable reception from the Indian political classes. I gather that it has been unanimously condemned by them. (My impression is derived from what I have read. I left India before the despatches of March the 5th were published.) It has been held by the Government of India to fall short of reasonable expectations to which the declaration of August the 20th, 1917, gave rise. Under these conditions dual government is, so far as I can see, the preferable experiment.

7, 8. If you consider a dual form of government acceptable in principle, are there any points of detail, the modification of which you regard as necessary? If so, what are those points, and what modifications would you suggest? 8. In particular, do you think (i.) that Ministers should hold office "during pleasure"?—i.e., should be liable to removal if they are unable to support the action decided upon in their department by the Governor or if they fail to retain the confidence of the Legislature (Clause 3 (1))? (ii.) That the Governor should have power to disregard the opinion of his Ministers if he considers that action in accordance with that opinion is inconsistent with the due discharge of his responsibilities (Clause 3 (3)). (iii.) That the executive council should in all provinces normally consist of one official European and one non-official Indian (Clause 4). (iv.) That the Governor should have power to dissolve his Legislative Council (Clause 7 (4))?—I agree with the propositions put forward in Question 8.

9, 10. Referring back to Questions 2, 3, and 4, if your answers to the first and third of these are in the affirmative, and if you think that the Legislatures should be given greater powers of control and influence than they possess at present, do you regard the limitations imposed generally by Clause 9 of the Bill upon their financial and Legislative powers as (i.) suitable or as (ii.) unnecessarily severe, or as (iii.) inadequate to safeguard the responsibilities which the Government owes in the last resort to Parliament (Clause 9)). 10. In particular, (i.) do you think that the Legislature should have power with whatever limitations to vote supplies (Clause 9 (2))? (ii.) Do you accept the plan of Grand Committees as the means of giving to the Government the power to secure essential legislation in the event of their failure to carry their propositions in the Council? If so, have you any modifications of detail to suggest? If not, what other method would you suggest to secure the object in view?—In this connection I accept the views put forward in the latest letters of the Government of India—those of March the 5th and April the 16th. I would secure the Governor from all prospect of failure on "Grand Committee." I agree with the opinion expressed in paragraph 80 of the letter of March the 5th. If a Governor failed to carry the Grand Committee with him his position would become most difficult.

11. Do you accept the position adopted in the Bill (Part II.) that the time has not yet come to give the Legislative Assembly a similar measure of control over the Central Government as that given to provincial Legislative Councils over provincial governments?—I accept this position.

12, 13. Do you agree that it is advisable none the less to provide for a substantial elective majority in the Indian Legislature? (Clause 16.) 13. Do you accept the plan of a bicameral Legislature as arising out of this, as constituting both a satisfactory machine for the ordinary purposes of legislation and as affording the means to the Governor-General in Council to secure legislation which he regards as essential? (Clauses 14, 15 and 16.)?—I would have preferred to leave the Imperial Legislative Council as it is, pending experience of the new Provincial Governments and Councils. This course, however, seems now impracticable. I am therefore in favour of the proposed Council of State and bicameral Legislature. The Chambers, however, should, in my opinion, always deliberate separately. I do not think that joint deliberations will work well.

Chairman—continued.

15. Do you accept the changes made by the Bill (Clause 21) in the constitution of the Governor-General's Executive Council? If not, what are your reasons, and what modifications would you suggest?—As I have no copy of the "principal Act" I find this question difficult to answer. I attach, however, considerable value to the qualification "ten years in the service of the Crown in India." Personally I have found 34½ years progressively instructive in Indian character and conditions. I approve of sub-section 3 of Clause 21.

16. Do you think that the development of provincial autonomy on the one hand, and of self-government in the Provinces on the other, involves any modification of the provisions of Sections 2, 33 and 45 of the Government of India Act (Clause 23)?—I see no reason to take exception to Clause 23, but, as I have already stated, I have no copy of the Government of India Act at hand.

17. Do you agree that the gradual realisation of responsible government involves periodical examination of progress by independent authority, and that the provisions of Clause 28 of the Bill are well designed to afford such examination?—I agree. As the realization is to come by definite stages I accept Clause 28. In all the circumstances it is the best provision possible.

18. Are there any matters which it is proposed in the Bill to deal with by rule which you would suggest should be provided for in the Bill?—I think the qualifications requisite for members of the Governor-General's Executive Council should be specified in the Act, and in no instance left for regulation by rules.

19. Have you any observations to offer in the Reports of Lord Southborough's Committees and of the Committee on the Home Administration of Indian Affairs?—I have never seen the Reports of the Southborough Committees, but have read the letters of the Government of India regarding them, dated April the 23rd and 16th. I have only a few observations to offer. (a) I would endorse the warning conveyed in paragraph 9 of the letter of the 23rd to make constituencies manageable. (b) I agree that it is very important to give the depressed classes representation sufficient to prevent their submersion on Council, and to stimulate their capacity for collective action. (c) I attach particular importance to the proper representation of Bengal Mahommedans (paragraph 24 of the letter of April the 23rd). In regard to the remarks of the Government of India on the subject of the representation of non-Brahmins, I would particularly endorse the sentence, "Numbers count for little in India against social, educational, and especially religious superiority, which has behind it the sanction of centuries." (d) Other sentences which seem to me of special weight are in paragraph 28 of the above letter, and run as follows:—"After religion and race the boundary between town and country is the greatest dividing line that runs through the Indian people. . . . It is roughly the difference between the old India and the new—the forces that are pressing us forward and those that are holding us back." I think that while we are being pressed forward we should not forget that the town population is not 78.1 per cent. as it was in England and Wales in pre-war days. It does not approach that figure even remotely. At the last Indian census it was 9.5 per cent. These figures are a measure of the magnitude of the task which we have undertaken. (e) I agree entirely with the conclusions of the Government of India against the transfer of secondary, collegiate and technical education, and the transfer of industries. Appendix III., page 65, of their Despatch is noteworthy. The whole success of the reforms depends largely on the healthy development and prosperity of these Departments.

I have only to-day received a copy of the Report of the Committee on the Home Administration of Indian Affairs. I regret that as I cannot delay this Memorandum longer I have no time to receive a considered opinion on the recommendations

6487. Is there anything you would like to say on the subject generally in addition to that?—There are various things I should like to say. If I may give a brief resumé of my experience, it may assist you in knowing what I am likely to possess anything like a competent knowledge of. My experience has been that of Executive Officer in the United Provinces Civil Service. I have held charge of various prominent districts and divisions: Benares, Allahabad, Meerut and Lucknow. I have been for several years a member, first of the Legislative Council of my own Province, and then of the Imperial Legislative Council. I have served as a member on the Bengal District Administrative Committee and on the Rowlatt Committee. I am now a member of the Board of Revenue of the United Provinces, but was last employed as President of the Committee appointed to consider the re-organisation of the Indian Medical Services. I have not been a Member or the Secretary of the Government of India or of any Provincial Government. On the other hand, I have been much in touch with people of all classes and with the officers of the various services.

I may say, as I said before in my Memorandum, that this is the first occasion on which I have been invited to record any opinion on the various changes proposed in the Montagu-Chelmsford Report, and that I have had very little time for reading up all the copious special literature on the subject and the literature that has followed on the publication of the Report. I have done my best, but I cannot profess to have the knowledge that I would otherwise have regarding the particular points of the scheme of reforms.

The first questions on which I would wish to say something are Questions 5 and 6. I should like to add something to what I have said there. After the words "marked degree" I should like two notes inserted. The first would be this: "It may, of course, be argued that these disadvantages will be compensated for by the fact that they will bring the conservative elements of society, the landlords and rural population into public life, and thus greatly stabilise politics. But these classes are at present very backward indeed, very much occupied in their private concerns, and in their numerous law suits, and are very hard to move. They neither care for nor understand politics. For years, if not always, they will be outwitted and out-talked in any councils that can be devised. In the meantime, the Extremists will enjoy great opportunities of doing mischief. These opportunities they will not neglect." I have elaborated my views of their present position in a separate note.

The second note is this, to come immediately after the other: "So far as my experience goes, British officers of the Civil Services are apprehensive about the future. They consider that Ministers are likely to be subject to strong racialist influences, that disagreeable friction will result, and that even if the reformed Provincial Governments prove visible failures, things will be allowed to drift until some catastrophe occurs, when Home Rule will come with a rush long before it is due under the Montagu-Chelmsford scheme. They believe that such premature Home Rule would mean the abandonment of India and themselves to weak Parliamentary Governments liable to be moved by extremist influences, that their own position will become intolerable, and the final results of British rule in India would be strife and disaster."

That is all I have to say about those two questions. As I have said, I have elaborated my views on the extremist position in a separate Memorandum. "Note on the position of extremists. For years a party of extremists has been working on the clerical middle classes and the people of the large towns. These men rely on a vigorous propaganda of combative nationalism, backed by slanders and misrepresentations to create an atmosphere of racial hatred which will lead to measures designed speedily to reduce the British in India to the position of impotent lookers-on at the doings of Indian oligarchical Parliaments, which would collapse immediately on the withdrawal of British protection from the country. They do not desire the ordered and harmonious progress which is contemplated by the authors of the Reforms Report. They reject the idea of a carefully graduated system of transition. Twenty years ago these extremists were few, and commanded influence only over generally insignificant journalists and fanatical young men. Things are different now. For various reasons, partly connected with events outside India, Extremism has considerably expanded. Camouflaged by democratic labels, it makes strenuous efforts to capture, not only the educative youth of the country, a field of endeavour in which it has achieved a certain success, but also the credulous and illiterate masses, a comparatively new enterprise. It has largely called the political tune, although it is disliked and feared by many politicians, who have so far failed to show the resolution that alone can conquer it. These people, and the great body of opinion which stands away from politics, generally silent from dread of newspaper abuse, need a strong lead from England. Unless the British Parliament decides that no constitutional changes shall hamstring its Government in India during the highly critical years now at hand, Extremism, addressing itself more and more to the masses, and taking advantage of the discredit and embarrassment of the authorities, will accomplish the ruin both of India and of British interests in that country."

Chairman—continued.

My next additional note is about Question 10. I would like to add to my reply: "A Government that relies on a majority partly composed of nominated members may find itself badly let down on a critical occasion."

After Question 15 I would add: "I would retain the provision in section 36 in the principal Act that one member of the Imperial Executive Council must be a barrister of England, Scotland, or Ireland."

Then, after my answer to Question 19, I would add: "The Provincial Governors who dissented from their colleagues on the 16th January, 1919, stated that one of their reasons for adhering to diarchy was that this system would reserve to Governments full control over essential subjects. I agree that this is a good argument in favour of diarchy, and would again emphasise that, without sound and healthy advance in these two departments there can be little hope for the development of prosperity for the educated youth of India, or of success for the reforms. I consider those two departments essential subjects. My experience on the Bengal District Administrative Committee convinced me of the enormous importance and difficulty of these two departments, and of the need that exists for the best most careful, and most attentive steering that can be devised for them."

6488. Which two departments?—I mean both industries and higher education.

6489. You did not mention them?—I mentioned industries in the note. We had two chapters on industries in the Bengal Report, and one chapter on the subject of high schools, Anglo-vernacular schools.

6490. You have nothing more you wish to say on the general subject?—No.

Duke of Northumberland.

6491. You have given us some very good reasons for objecting to the principle of diarchy, and I think you say that the principle proposed by the Provincial Governors would really be sounder, only you think it is too late in the day to have to embark on that scheme?—I think that scheme would be rejected by all prominent sections of political opinion in India—all articulate sections of political opinion in India and the Government of India themselves have said that it would not fulfil the requirements of the declaration. I think it is extremely undesirable that these reforms, which are intended to provide scope and satisfaction for the educated classes, should begin with any imputation of bad faith on our part, and they would have undoubtedly some handle for saying that we had not been quite straight in the matter, in view of what they could quote from what the Government of India has stated. Personally, I do not think the Provincial scheme is opposed to the declaration; but the point is not what I think in the matter, but what I think they would think. For that reason, I am not prepared to back that scheme.

6492. So that you think there is really no alternative to the scheme proposed by the Government of India?—That —That is so. I do not see what else can be done in the present circumstances. I think there are considerable dangers; but I think we have got to take them and secure the position as best we can.

Lord Islington.

6493. Do you think the dangers that you apprehend from a dual system can, to any substantial extent, be mitigated by modifications in the machinery and the method of procedure?—I have said all that I can in that way. I agree with the safeguards lately proposed by the Government of India in the recent correspondence. I agree with all the modifications they propose. My time for studying the literature has been very short. As far as I can see, I accept the modifications which they have proposed.

6494. The main modification of it is a separate purse, is it not?—Yes; that is one of them.

6495. You agree with that?—Well, of course, there I am at a disadvantage. I know nothing about financial work. I have never been a Financial Secretary.

6496. Then I will not ask you questions on that. You gave us a supplement, a note on the I.C.S.—on the dangers that the members of the I.C.S. apprehend?—Yes.

6497. Do you share those apprehensions?—Yes.

6498. Do you think that those untoward results will occur?—I am not saying that untoward results will occur; I am saying that untoward results may occur.

6499. You were speaking of the more advanced Indian politicians, the Extremists. Was I right in gathering from you that you consider the landowning classes would have no chance against them?—I do not think they would have.

6500. You mean they would have no chance if they were given an open field for entry into the Legislative Council?—Oh, I think that they would have a chance—I did not mean that—my point is that they would take a long time to make effective use of their chance. In the meantime the coast is more or less clear for people who are not of their ways of thinking. That is what I am afraid of. Of course, in all these constitutional changes, I am fully aware that things may always occur which no one anticipates, either on the one side or the other.

6501. You apprehend that, first the electioneering ingenuity, and secondly, the debating superiority of the Extremist, is such that the landowning class would have small chance?—Yes, I certainly think so. But my point is not that the educated classes would be all Extremists. I would not say that for a single moment. My point is that the politically educated classes on these Councils would be liable to Extremist influences. That is my point. There are many educated politicians who are not Extremists. I do not for a single moment mean to imply that all the educated politicians are Extremists.

6502. But you think that, under the more open system of debate in the public assembly the Moderate educated classes will be susceptible to influence by the Extremists?—The point is not how they would be influenced in the course of the debate; I think influence is very seldom extended in the course of a debate. Speakers in a debate have generally made up their minds before they come in what they are going to say. The question is how they would be influenced from outside. I have seen that working myself.

6503. Then you say that a Government dependent on nominated members, might possibly, on important occasions, be let down?—Yes.

6504. What are you alluding to?—I was not alluding to any special thing. I have seen that sort of thing happen several times. I have seen nominated members vote in a manner in which they were not expected to vote by the Government—the Government did not expect them to vote so.

6505. You have seen it both ways? Do you suggest by that that any majority that is arranged to get an automatic decision for the Government should be a substantial and definite one?—Yes.

Lord Sinha.

6506. May I take it that you are in favour, yourself, of a considerable advance in the matter of constitutional reforms?—Yes.

6507. And that you are absolutely convinced that it is impossible to let the present system go on?—I do not think it would be a sound measure.

6508. Under the circumstances at present existing all the world over it is absolutely essential to change the system?—I think it is absolutely essential to develop the system; that is I think some reforms are certainly necessary. There is no question about it.

6509. And that reforms must be in the direction of greater consideration being given to the representatives of the people?—Yes.

6510. So far as you are aware there are only two alternative methods?—Yes.

6511. One the diarchy advocated by the joint Report?—Yes.

6512. And the other the scheme of the five heads of the Local Governments?—Yes.

6513. Am I right in thinking that if you had to decide yourself—supposing a decision rested with you, and you alone—taking into account all the existing circumstances, you would decide in favour of the Joint Report scheme—that is, the Montagu-Chelmsford scheme?—Stabilised and steadied by the recent recommendations of the Government of India.

6514. Quite; those are modifications?—Yes.

6515. But as a basis you would decide in favour of the Joint Report scheme?—Yes, I think we are pledged to that. I do not think you could hold it before the public all this time and then say you are not going to do it.

6516. And therefore, in your view, the only question is how many of the suggested modifications should be accepted?—Yes.

6517. Do not you expect yourself that the adoption of that scheme will itself have a moderating effect on the people generally in India?—I think that it will for a time, just in the same way that the Morley-Minto reforms had; but I think that the whole danger of the situation lies in this, that the scheme encourages all politicians, extremists included, to be constantly appealing to the masses. Well, if they begin appealing to the masses we know the sort of arguments that extremist politicians usually use. They generally say to them, "You are under a foreign Government; it is very oppressive. If you listen to us you will get Home Rule quickly and all your taxes will be lowered. Your capital is being taken out of the country," and all this sort of arguments. Those arguments would be addressed to ignorant and inflammable people. That is the danger in the situation, to my mind.

6518. What remedy do you suggest for that?—The only remedy I suggest is that the safeguards proposed by the Government of India, so far as I have been able to grasp them and read them, should be adopted, and that in the deliberations of the Committee this danger should be clearly borne in mind. I have not had time to go into the details, but if the Committee will bear that danger in mind they will have ample opportunity for considering what safeguards should be adopted.

6519. Of course, you have said already that the modifications suggested by the Government of India in their latest despatches are safeguards. Do you think, with those safeguards, there can be a cessation of political activity?—No, certainly not, but the point is this—I do not want cessation of political activity; that would be absurd. There will be no cessation of political activity; on the contrary, I think there will be a great deal of political activity. What I wish to emphasise is that these reforms have practically turned the politicians on to the masses in a way they have never been turned before, and they will practically go and tell them to go and look out for self-government and cultivate ideas of self-government, and all that. That would be all right if that opportunity were used in the right way; but what I am afraid of is that it will be used in a way that would not be right, and that would be dangerous to public peace.

6520. What I wanted to get from you was as to what would allay such apprehensions as to the misuse of political activity. Is there any method which you can suggest, or must that not depend upon the increasing education both of the politicians and of the masses?—Yes, exactly, I quite agree. I think one of the

the very best remedies is increasing and improving education, and it is just for that reason that I am so keen on education being kept in the hands of the most responsible and the most experienced section of the Government.

6521. Therefore your remedy against mischievous activities is, and can only be, increased education?—Yes. I may say another remedy that I attach great importance to is publicity. I think that the Government should not hesitate to start publicity departments all over the place

6522. I take it that you are prepared to rely upon the effect of education to mitigate such mischievous activities as you have described?—Not only upon the effect of education, but also upon the fact that the new constitution that is framed preserves the power of the Government, and does not whittle it away so that the Government is regarded as beneath contempt.

6523. Is the Bill calculated to bring about any impression of that kind?—The Bill, as it stands, is not calculated to bring about any impression of that kind; but it is very difficult to judge of the effect of these changes without seeing what regulations will be framed in consequence of the Bill?

6524 Do you mean rules under the Bill?—Yes, the rules under the Bill—the regulations that will be drawn up.

6525. In your view will it not be for the benefit of both parts of the Government if they are encouraged to deliberate jointly as much as possible?—Yes, most decidedly.

6526. In all matters?—In all matters.

6527. And that it would be a mistake to keep them in water-tight compartments?—Yes, most decidedly.

6528. In all matters?—In all matters I think they should deliberate jointly, undoubtedly.

6529. So that the Ministers will influence the members of the Executive Council, and the members of the Executive Council will influence the Ministers?—Exactly.

6530. With regard to the two departments that you have mentioned, education and industries, taking education first, you have read or heard the evidence that education must be kept as one entire unit?—Yes.

6531. That is primary, secondary, and higher education?—Yes.

6532. Would you reserve all three for the official part of the Government?—No, I should leave vernacular to the Ministers; I should have vernacular education a transferred subject.

6533. By vernacular, I suppose you mean primary?—Yes

6534. Do you not agree with those experts who have said that all three must be kept in the same hands?—No, I do not.

6535. Primary, secondary, and higher?—No.

6536. Has education progressed on right lines so far in India?—I think that there have been mistakes in education; I think there have been great mistakes; but I think that after all the mistakes were to be expected. We were bound to expect them. I think, on the whole, education, in spite of the mistakes we have made, has progressed, and I think, on the whole, it has been on right lines. After all, when we abuse education as far as it has gone, we have to remember that education has produced the present situation; it has conduced to the enlightenment of the people generally, which has spread enormously. Altogether I do not at all agree with people who indiscriminately condemn the progress of education as it is.

6537. I know that. At present secondary education is a good deal in the hands of the people themselves?—Not so much in some Provinces as in others.

6538. Take Bengal, with which I am familiar, and I think you are also?—I cannot claim to be familiar with it, but I was in it for six months and travelled all over it, and took a great deal of interest in it. It interested me profoundly.

6539. There it is a great deal in the hands of the people themselves?—Yes.

6540. Would you take it away?—Well, I think it has been a great deal too much in their hands.

6541. You would change that?—I would.

6542. Taking the higher education, the University education, it is also greatly in the hands of the people themselves, we are told, in the Universities?—I do not mean to say that I would take it away from the people completely for a single moment. I mean the control of the people should be steadied in the matter. I think it needs steadying.

6543. Would you agree that if it were transferred—that is to say, to the Ministers—that they should be assisted by a representative board, on which the Government and all educational institutions and representatives of the people should be represented? That is a scheme which we have heard propounded by Sir Michael Sadler both here and in his report. Would you agree with that, that if it is transferred to a Minister, the Minister should have for his guidance and assistance a representative Board, consisting of all shades of opinion?—I do not think that would be a good plan. I think, for one thing, the position of the Minister in regard to education would be so exceedingly difficult, because very great pressure would be put upon him from vested interests, which the reserved part of the Government would not be so subject to, and, after all, the Minister in early days will not be in the same position in regard to education and in regard to the educational service that the reserved part of the Government is in: he will not be in so strong a position or in so experienced a position. He will have great pressure put upon him.

6544. To do what?—There are a good many things he might do.

6545. For example?—Well, Sir Michael Sadler, I believe, has proposed that intermediate colleges should be started which should largely assume the functions of schools. I do not know how that proposition will be taken in India. It will certainly disturb a great many vested interests in Bengal, and I think it is quite likely to be very largely opposed, and think the opposition of a Minister in regard to that particular reform would be exceedingly difficult.

6546. Of course, the idea is that it would be subject to legislation on the lines of the report, provided the Government of India is able to accept the recommendations of the Report—that there should be legislation first on those lines, so far as Bengal is concerned?—You will not alter the ultimate decision, anyhow. The Minister is presumably to have the ultimate decision. The ultimate decision will rest with him whether you have a Board or not.

6547. Do you agree that the great want in regard to education—in Bengal, at any rate—is money?—I think that is a great want.

6549. Hitherto, of course, the funds spent on education have been, as compared with other Departments, small?—I have not compared them. It seems to me there have been very considerable sums spent on education. I was looking the other day at the figures spent on education, and the figures spent on medical services, and on the medical relief of the people, and it struck me that they came off uncommonly badly compared with education.

6550. Both have been starved, probably because we have not money, but they have been starved all the same, have they not?—I do not think education has been starved; I think more money could be spent on it with advantage, and great advantage, but I would not say that it had been starved, in view of the general necessities of the country. The Government's wish has not been to starve it; the Government have all along wished to spend as much as they could on it.

6551. In fact, the money spent on education has not been so large. Take it per head. Are you aware that the money spent per head in India, as compared with other countries, is extremely small?—I have not compared the figures. There is one point I might say a word about. I sat on the Functions Committee as an official looker-on and adviser for my own Provinces, and I put exactly the same points before them at that time. It seemed to be understood by some of the members of the Committee, another extra member who was on it with me, an Indian, seemed to think that if education were kept a reserved subject it would be removed from Indian influence, and that Indians would have nothing to say to it. I pointed out if higher education were a reserved subject it would still be subject to strong Indian influence; there would be an Indian member of the Government, and he would be advised and helped by a standing Committee of the Legislative Council.

6552. So would a Minister?—Oh, yes, exactly; but his position would be a stronger position than the Ministers', a good deal.

6553. You mean he would be less amenable to the influence of the Council?—He would be less amenable to influences from outside—the Press and all sorts of influences from outside.

6554. Of course he would have expert advisers; whether he was a Minister or a member of the Council he would have expert advisers on all matters of education?—Yes.

6555. The question really resolves itself into this, how far he is able to follow or accept the advice of experts?—I do not know. I think he might go against the experts, I have known that frequently done in India.

Mr. Montagu.

6556. Have you had an opportunity to read the letter from the Government of the United Provinces on this scheme in the Blue Book?—I have not read it in detail; I glanced at it.

6557. There was a difference of opinion on the informal Committee of the United Provinces as to the transfer of education?—Yes.

6558. I wanted to call your attention to this. The informal Committee, whose names appear in the Report, I imagine you would agree, was a very representative and influential Committee?—Yes.

6559. This paragraph is what I wanted to call your attention to: "The Executive Government would, however, consist of a Governor and four executive Councillors, of whom two would be officials and two would be chosen from among the elected members of the Legislature. The latter, since they would be selected from the ranks of the Legislature for the express purpose of ensuring that they were persons in touch with, and in general sympathy with its views, and since the Legislature would control the Budget provision for transferred subjects, would, as a matter of practice and convention, be placed in charge of the transferred subjects. And again, as a matter of practice and convention, the Governor, who would hold the casting vote in case of a difference of opinion between the official and non-official members, would normally defer to their advice in respect of these subjects"?—Yes.

Chairman.] Is this the scheme of the five heads.

Mr. Montagu.] No, it is the United Provinces' own scheme, on page 217 of the Blue Book.

Chairman.] A non-diarchical scheme?

Mr. Montagu.

6560. Yes. (To the Witness.) Do you remember having read those words before?—A long time ago. I did not read them the other day. I read them in India at the time. I remember those words.

6561. Does not that really amount to diarchy by custom and convention?—Yes, it does, very much.

6562. Then there is a question about the Grand Committee. The majority in the United Provinces Legislative Council to-day is not an elected majority, is it?—No, I do not think it is. No, I know it is not; of course, it is not.

6563. It is nominated, is it not?—The Government and the nominated members exceed in numbers the elected members, as far as I remember.

6564. The nominated and elected members together exceed the official members, do they not?—Oh, yes; I think so.

6565. It is a non-official majority?—I think so—I am not sure. It can easily be verified.

6566. If the Legislative Council to-day has a non-official majority, do you not think the Grand Committee ought to have one also?—The point is this, that things will not be as they are to-day in any way; things will have changed enormously. The betting will (in legislation often be) much more on the other side than on the Government side. That is why I want the Grand Committee so safeguarded.

6567. Let me put the question in this way. Assuming a position in which, on a particular piece of legislation, the whole of the elected element of the Legislative Council is opposed to it, and the Government cannot secure six members to support it, do you think then the Provincial Government ought to legislate?—The point is that if all members vote according to their convictions I think things would be all right, but I know very well that they do not—that some are very often terrorised or influenced in some way, and some vote against their convictions.

6568. So you think there are occasions in the future in which the Local Government ought to have power to legislate when it cannot rely even on six members?—I think there may be occasions. I admit they would not be frequent, or anything of that kind, but I say there may be occasions. It is only that I want to safeguard the position.

6569. You emphasised in your evidence that you insist on having one member of the Governor-General's Executive Council a barrister?—Well, I did not emphasise it.

6570. You suggested it as important?—Yes.

6571. Do you mean a barrister and not a vakil?—I certainly do not think a vakil would do. I think he ought to be a barrister and a man with European experience.

6572. As a member of the Executive Council?—I think so—a lawyer of European experience.

6573. You impress me very much by your anticipation of the appeals which would be made to the masses as a result of the reform scheme. You have heard it argued, have you not, that one ought to delay, or perhaps even to deny, constitutional reform to India because the masses are apathetic and take no interest in political affairs?—Yes.

6574. That is a criticism which has often been made against all attempts of this kind?—Yes.

6575. Would not you expect the natural answer of those who want constitutional reforms, and who want to answer that argument, to be to try to stir the masses up?—You mean they would do it anyhow?

6576. It is natural, is it not; would not you do it yourself?—I am quite aware of that. It is what I pointed out as the greatest danger of the whole scheme to my mind.

6577. But is it not a danger inherent in the present condition of India, if not of all countries?—I think it is to a large extent.

6578. I mean you could not lessen the danger?—I think it has come out tremendously lately. It used not to be the case. They used to appeal to the masses in the way they are doing now.

6579. They are appealing to the masses successfully, are they not?—They are coming on more. They are to a certain extent, yes.

6580. The masses are beginning to take an interest in politics?—Well, they are beginning to be very discontented with the Government in some parts, if that is taking an interest in politics.

6581. That I find usually happens in my constituency?—Unfortunately there is no alternative government as there is here. In India it is a foreign government.

6582. You do not suggest with regard to an appeal to the masses that the dangers you apprehend would be lessened either by the defeat of this Bill——?—No, I do not. That would not stop such appeals.

6583. Or by the adoption of the local governments' alternative scheme?—No, I do not, because it is not a question between dualism and unitary government at all. (Except in so far as the constitution of either may affect the essential considerations laid down in my answer to 6584.).

6584. It is not even a question of a joint or separate purse; it will come in in any case, whatever we do?—Yes, it will. But, if I may say so, my real point was that the Government in India should not be unduly embarrassed; it should be in a position to preserve its prestige and it should be able to cope with difficult situations by itself.

6585. Ought not it also to pay careful attention to the arguments used against it in order to see if there is any substance in them?—Of course it ought, yes. (It does.)

Lord Sinha.

6586. I intended to ask you about the qualifications for the legal member. Why do you say that he must be a man of European experience?—Because I think he should be. He is much more likely to understand things generally, and to be able to compare conditions in India with conditions elsewhere in the world. I have very often known very able and intelligent members of the Imperial Legislative Council—I do not say I have often known, but I have sometimes known very able and intelligent members of the Imperial Legislative Council speak of things, and see things in a manner, in which they would not have spoken of, or have seen them, if they had had European experience and lived in England.

6587. But we are talking of one particular member. It being agreed that he should be a lawyer, why should he be a lawyer called to the Bar in England, Ireland, or Scotland, and not a lawyer trained in India—the highest training that India can give?—He should be trained in India, too; I daresay you might argue in that way.

6588. It is only that one particular point I am upon. Assuming it must be a lawyer, would you confine it to a lawyer with European training, or would you allow also a lawyer with Indian training only to be eligible for the appointment?—The lawyer is not confined merely to questions of law. He takes part, as far as I know, in all the deliberations of the Council, not only in matters connected with law. In law he is an expert; in other matters he may be a most useful consulting member.

6589. We are talking only of the expert member. So far as the expert member—that is, the legal expert—is concerned, you would not confine yourself to an English lawyer—I am putting it roughly—a barrister; but you would also extend it, having regard to what you know of Indian pleaders, to vakils? You would also make them eligible?—Yes, if they had been to England and had been called to the Bar—if they are barristers.

6590. I am putting that apart. Supposing an Indian is a lawyer trained in India and has not been to England, why do you want to exclude him from the position of being eligible as the legal expert member of the Viceroy's Council?—Because I think he would be deficient in general experience of conditions in England and in Europe which are required for any member of the Viceroy's Executive Council.

6591. Then, as I understand you, according to you, there ought not to be any Indian member of the Viceroy's Council who has not had personal experience of Europe, or England?—Well, I think that is very much better. I do not mean to say that any fatal results would follow if a vakil were made the legal member of the Viceroy's Council—for a single moment. I merely say that I think it is better that the legal member should be a barrister. That is all I say. I would prefer it.

6592. That observation applies not merely to the legal member; but to all members?—I am not applying it to all members; I am speaking simply of the legal member. My remark was simply about the legal member, and I confined that observation to him.

6593. Why do you select him specially?—Because he is specially selected by the section in the Principal Act.

6594. For legal qualifications?—Yes; for legal qualifications. They do not say it is only for legal qualifications, but presumably it is.

6595. That is laid down—the legal qualification is laid down?—I do not remember the wording of the section.

6596. Why should not that qualification be extended so as to render Indian lawyers eligible?—I simply say that I think it is better to have a barrister. I do not mean to say that there are no pleaders sometimes who would do perfectly well. I would not accentuate that for a single moment. I say, as a rule, it is better to have a barrister.

Sir Henry Craik.

6597. You contemplate the division of the functions of education: one part to be transferred and the other to be reserved?—Yes.

6598. Where would you draw the line of demarcation?—I would draw the line of demarcation at high schools, and, going up from high schools, up to University education—Anglo-vernacular schools.

6599. Including University education?—Yes.

6600. Do you think the secondary schools can be quite separate from the primary?—Oh, yes.

6601. And the technical schools?—Yes.

6602. Do not they enter very much into the scheme of the education of young boys and girls: something very separate from University education, which means a separate and higher education?—Primary education is in the hands of the local bodies in my own Provinces; the secondary education is not. The technical schools come in with secondary education.

6603. And with University education?—Well, I could not say exactly. It is all changing about. I ought to put University education and higher school education together.

6604. When you say higher schools, you would include technical schools?—Yes.

6605. Do you think that is a division which could be drawn? Have you experience in education which makes you think that is a possible method—to include technical schools with Universities, and to keep the primary schools quite separate? Would that be possible if you were attempting such a thing here?—I do not know anything about the system in England.

6606. Supposing we had reached the line of demarcation, what are the special qualities required for the administration of University education and the other side, whatever it is—what are the different administrative qualities required for those two?—I should say that for the University and for the higher education you required a higher variety of qualities and a greater freedom from vested interests than you require for the superintendence of primary education. You want teachers selected with great care and judgment. You want the whole direction of education very carefully considered.

6607. Which is the larger of the two branches—the primary or the higher?—I think the primary is larger, undoubtedly.

6608. Does not the primary require enormously bigger administrative powers?—No, I do not think it does—not in India.

6609. Would not it involve an immensely greater financial expenditure?—I imagine it would, but I cannot say how expenditure is divided at present.

6610. Is it not incomparably greater—the real expense of establishing a thoroughly efficient system of primary education, than anything which you would be called upon to do for University education, if you are to make it adequate?—Yes, undoubtedly, if you are going to make it adequate.

6611. Is it not a very important and very exacting department of administration to face the establishment of a completely efficient system of primary education, which at present does not exist in India? Is not that a very difficult part of administration?—It is a very difficult part of administration.

6612. On the other hand, with regard to the higher education, what do you want in the University education? Is it not to develop the genius of the Indian people on its own lines?—In University education?

6613. Yes?—Yes, undoubtedly.

6614. Would not it be well to leave a great part of it to voluntary effort, and to the people who are governing each University?—I do not mean to say that voluntary effort should not be encouraged as much as you can, but I mean it is such a big, difficult department, and it requires such impartiality and judgment and experience that it had better be with the reserved side of the Government than with the other side.

6615. But not because it will try to interfere too much; only because it will hold a just balance between different views. You do not want to interfere with Universities in the way that you interfere with primary schools?—Oh no, of course not.

6616. So that what is really wanted in Universities is a wise and just person who will lead the other Universities to develop of themselves on sound lines?—Yes.

6617. Whereas

6617. Whereas in primary education you want a man of great administrative power ready to face enormous financial problems, and really to organise the whole thing in a way in which it has never been organised before?—Yes, quite.

6618. And these are the two lines of demarcation, are they not?—Yes. (University education must carry with it High School education in India. For High School (Secondary English) education great administrative power is required.)

Sir J. D. Rees.

6619. May I refer to your answer to Question 3? You say the semi-official members?—I did not say semi; I said non; it was a mistake in the type.

6620. Your answer to Question 5 ends with these words: "Lastly, dual government, accompanied by substantial, measured and progressive reduction of the British elements in the All-India Services will, I fear, in course of time depress British recruitment for those services to a marked degree." Why should these changes exercise so deterrent an effect upon those who come into the services in future? For the moment you are contemplating the future, and I ask you why, as a new proposition, it should not be acceptable to those who are seeking employment in India?—Well, before they seek employment in India they will carefully inquire, or a good many of them will inquire, what the conditions of employment there will be, and if the answer from those who are in the country and have been in the country, or who know people in the country, is unfavourable, they are likely to be deterred.

6621. Do you think that young men who are about to be employed go to their seniors very much for advice in such matters? Do you think that would really weigh with them very much?—That is my experience—that they do a good deal. I have known that happen. I say they do go to their seniors for advice, particularly when they are starting for an unknown country, or thinking of doing so.

6622. You do not think that the new India, if these reforms are accepted, will be an extremely interesting proposition for anyone to be concerned in?—I think it will be a very interesting proposition. I think they will examine the conditions there with great interest, in their own interests, quite apart from other things. I think it will be a very interesting proposition, and I hope that things will go well and that the answer will be favourable. I merely say that if they inquire into the conditions of life in India and are told that they are unpleasant, that the British service is being gradually reduced there, to my mind it is likely to act, and I think it will act, as a deterrent.

6623. Sufficiently to deter the enterprisng youth from public schools from going?—I do not say it will deter all of them; I say it will deter some of them.

6624. It is a matter of some importance?—Yes, I think it will have a deterrent influence. It will not be strong enough in some cases, and will be strong enough in others.

6625. In your answer to Question 7 you say: "This unified system came late into the field as a debatable proposition in circumstances certain to secure it an unfavourable reception from the Indian industrial classes"?—It was not "industrial"—"political" was what I wrote. It is a mistake in the type.

6626. Then I have nothing to ask on that. With regard to the appointment of a lawyer upon the Governor-General's Executive Council, why should it be more necessary to have a lawyer there than to have a lawyer in the Cabinet in England, for instance?—Legal questions so constantly arise, and the home member so often stands in need of legal advice.

6627. They have the Law Officers of the Government?—Yes, but he wants a man of equal status to himself to put the legal aspect of the case and the legal possibilities of the case before the Government.

6628. Are not the legal advisers of the Government in a superior status to the members in respect of law? I am asking you why a legal member is necessary. Why is it a sine qua non that there should be a legal member in the Government of India when they have legal advisers? They have a Government solicitor—and an Advocate-General, for instance?—I think the general idea is that a lawyer member has a voice in the deliberations of the Government. It is not merely a question of his advice, but it is a question of his voice; he has a vote. The Government is steadied in its home policy, and is advised in its home policy by an adviser who is a member of the Government—that is, he has a status in the Government which no outside person has.

6629. At any rate, you do think it is necessary?—I do think so, decidedly, from what I have seen of the working in Council. Very often points are raised in debate. For one thing, he would be a member of the Council of State, and I have seen points raised in debate in the Imperial Legislative Council constantly—legal points arise in debate, which cause the Government to require a legal member to be there to take up the point and answer it—either answer it or admit it.

6630. At any rate, you think it necessary?—Undoubtedly.

6631. Although it is not necessary in the British Government?—It is so different.

Chairman.] What about the Lord Chancellor?

Sir J. D. Rees.] He is in the House of Lords; he is not available for debates in the House of Commons.

Chairman.] No, but he is a member of the Cabinet.

Sir J. D. Rees.

6632. I was thinking the law officers are not. (To the witness.) When your Government is asked for its opinion upon any matter by the Government of India, to report upon any important public question, do you hold that the opinions of the individual members, of the individual Lieutenant-Governor or the Governor, whatever he technically is, alone is required, or the opinion, so far as ascertainable of the public, or the public services as well?—It depends what the question is. In any general question of administration the opinion of the public is constantly taken, and the opinions of selected officers. What frequently happens is this: A proposal is sent out for opinions to the Commissioners, heads of Divisions, and they are told they are at liberty to consult any district officers that they please. These papers are also sent to important non-official members of the Legislative Council. All these opinions are collected. Sometimes the matter is debated in Council, the resolution is brought up and it is debated in Council, and a reply goes after all opinions have been collated. That is what generally happens. There are other matters which are referred to further outside opinion.

6633. For instance, on a matter like these reforms the opinion of your Government is asked for. Would it be a compliance with the request to state the opinion of your technical Government, or would your Government consider itself bound also to state public opinion, so far as ascertainable?—Oh, yes, they would always do so.

6634. In your supplementary statement this morning you drew rather a black picture of the future of India. You suggested that the landowning electorate was likely to be outwitted and be in the hands of rather unscrupulous politicians. Do not you think that to a certain extent, at any rate, that is inevitable?—I do think so. I think to a certain extent it is inevitable, but I do not want it to take place to a greater extent than is compatible with good government.

6635. You will agree that in our own country the same kind of thing happened when the vote was first granted?—Well, I am afraid I have not studied the ins and outs of constitutional history in England.

6636. I mean people would require a few years?—I agree it is inevitable. I do not deny that, but in India the problems are so different, because, first, you have there a foreign Government presiding over an enormous mass of people, over 300 million people, and the conditions are so very different from England. Dangers which are comparatively negligible in England are anything but negligible in India. The character of the people is widely different.

6637. But in making this statement I take it you would not use it as a reason for either delaying reform or in any degree weakening the proposals?—I think the reform has got to come. I think we have have to take the risk. We have made the declaration. We have said we are going to do all this, and we have got to do it.

6638. You said, I think, also, that as a result of this Home Rule would come perhaps before it was really intended, and before it was desirable?—Yes.

6639. What do you mean by that? How would it come?—This is what I think may possibly happen—I do not say it will—that if the dual governments do not work, and people get more and more worked up, and things become altogether very black, it is quite on the cards that some Government in England will give Home Rule straight away.

6640. You said some extremely interesting things about the Extreme Nationalist movement in India. You spoke of a campaign of combative nationalism which had been going on for some time?—Yes.

6641. I take it you do not suggest that the spirit of nationalism is a thing that should not be developed?—No, I do not say that for a single moment. That is a different thing altogether. I say that the spirit of combative nationalism which employs as its weapon misrepresentations and slanders is, when working among the masses, a very dangerous thing. As long as Nationalism simply preaches, you must all learn to protect yourselves, and you must all learn to vote for yourselves, and to understand public questions, and to look forward to the day when you will be able to stand on your own legs and govern yourselves, and prepare yourselves for that day; it is a very good thing. Nothing could be better, and nothing could assist the Government of India more, because I am perfectly aware that our administration cannot guide affairs for ever in India.

6642. Have you any idea of the extent of this Left Wing Nationalist movement, and the probable cause of it?—I should be happy to give you my opinion of the various causes in camera. I do not think it would be very desirable to do so in public.

6643. I believe that during comparatively recent years there have been a number of papers suppressed in India, and there have been certain items of repressive legislation. I simply wanted to ask you whether in your opinion a policy like that contributed in any degree to the development of things which you mentioned this morning?—No, I do not think that. In India it is always so difficult to know how far papers should be allowed to go. So far as I know I have never seen any instance in which I thought the Government was unduly harsh. The Government has to keep order. It must do so, particularly in a time such as the four years we have just been through. I believe that all the actions of the Government in that respect were unavoidable. Supposing the Government had not taken that action, I think there would have been some very inconvenient outburst. That is what the Government had to guard against. I think the Government really had no choice. Whenever anything is done, whenever any repressive measure is enacted, which the Government are always, as a matter of fact, most reluctant to enact, there is always all over the place the cry, "Oh, the Government is repressing this and that!" But the spirit of which that cry is a manifestation is a spirit which would be there, and it would go on in exactly the same way whether it was encouraged by influences which were not checked or whether those influences were placed under restraint. Every now and then, when somebody who has been urging the thing on is placed under restraint, there is a particular agitation. I know no reason to say that the action of the Government has precipitated extremism.

6644. Is not it true that the whole of Indian opinion, Moderate, Extreme Right, as well as Extreme Left, has condemned unanimously the recent policy of repression in India?—What do you mean by that?

6645. Take an example, like the Rowlatt Act?—The Rowlatt Act was grossly misrepresented. The most abominable lies were circulated about it and its measures among numbers of ignorant people, who knew nothing whatever about it.

Mr. Spoor—continued.

6647. I think you have had wide experience of a good many of the aspects of administration in India?—Yes.

6648. You say we are bound to bring about a progressive realisation of responsible government?—Yes, we are.

6649. You know the terms of the announcement which were, that there should be a gradual development of self-government, with a view to the progressive realisation of responsible government. Does that necessarily mean that a measure of what is technically known as responsible government must be given at once, or might that not mean that self-government is to be gradually developed as a foundation for progressive responsible government at later stages?—The real point is what it was understood to mean, and I think it was understood to mean what I said.

6650. But you do admit that the announcement might be capable of more than one interpretation?—I think it is a most difficult announcement to get clear exact sense out of in that connection.

6651. As matters now stand, at all events in the recent past, do you know any instance in which a Provincial Government has passed measures to which all the elected members of the Legislative Councils were opposed?—A Provincial Government?

6652. Any Provincial Government which has passed any measure, forcing it against the wishes of all the elected members?—Not in my own Province.

6653. Do you know anywhere in India where that has happened?—I am speaking rather vaguely. I was thinking of the Canal Colonies Measure in the Punjab, at the time of Sir Charles Rivaz.

6654. If the Legislative Councils are now enlarged, and their base is broadened as proposed, is it not certain that their influence upon the Provincial Governments must be much more powerful than it has been, because there they gather a much wider sphere of subjects under the decentralisation scheme?—I beg your pardon.

6655. If the Legislative Councils are now enlarged, as is proposed, is it not certain that their influence on the Provincial Governments will be much more powerful than it has been in the past, because it covers so many subjects which will be assigned to Provincial Governments under the decentralisation scheme?—Yes.

6656. Without doing any more than increase those Councils, giving them the elective majorities which are proposed, would not a very large measure of power pass to them in controlling and influencing the Government?—Yes.

6657. Now you say you accept the diarchy, because it has held the field for some time?—I say, because it has been before these people for some time a large number of them have accepted it. They have all accepted the idea, and have become set on it. They have thought that is what we meant to give them, and they will be bitterly disappointed and disgusted if we do not give it to them. I do not think it is satisfactory that whatever reforms are introduced should start with a slant of absolute bad wind.

6658. You also, to some extent, accept the diarchy because it provides a method of doling out responsible government in piecemeal fashion in the years to come?—Yes.

6659. You think the policy adopted of publishing the Report over the names of the Viceroy and the Secretary of State before it had been considered by the Government and Parliament in this country, compelled the Indian politicians to ask for more—Yes, I think it did.

6660. You have stated some of your objections to diarchy. Have you read the Memorandum of the Government of Bombay, in which it is shown that the transferred and reserved subjects are inextricably mixed up in the administration?—Without reading any Memorandum, I think that is the case. They are very much mixed up, undoubtedly. They must be, from my own experience of administration.

6661. And that admixture must create great difficulties in the practical working of the diarchical system?—Yes, I think it will create difficulties.

6662. You say you believe that All-India services will suffer in recruitment to a considerable degree?—Yes.

6663. Is not the question rather more serious than that? May it not happen that in a short time a considerable exodus of experienced men in all the services may occur—of senior men, I mean?—Do you mean that men are likely to go before they are obliged to? That they are likely to go when they have completed the time for their pension?

6664. Sooner than they would in the other way?—It depends on what they think of the conditions in England.

6665. You know the proposals of the Government of India, that civil servants (and Sir James Meston told us the privilege was to be conceded to other Services) are to be allowed to retire on a proportionate pension, if they happen to be in disagreement with a popular Minister, even if the popular Minister is proved to be in the wrong?—Yes. Do you mean that I think that some system of proportionate pensions may be required?

6666. It is promised by the Government of India?——

Mr. Montagu.

6667. It is suggested by the Government of India?—Yes.

Lord Sydenham.

6668. Do you think that may lead to a certain number of retirements?—I think it may; I hope it will not.

6669. And it might lead to the retirement of some of the most conscientious civil servants and other servants?—It might; I could not say.

6670. Are you aware of any other step taken by the Government of India which might lead to a considerable number of retirements from the Civil Service?—What do you mean by any other steps?

6671. Any offer, or any communication to civil servants?—No.

6672. You do not know?—No.

6673. Now supposing that there was a retirement on a large scale, and also that there was any marked deterioration on in the quality of the European public service, do you not think that would seriously prejudice the progress of India?—Yes.

6674. Are there any means of replacing experienced public servants on short notice by Indians of equal experience in administration?—No.

6675. I think you have some experience of native States, have you not?—I assisted in the creation of the Benares State, and I was agent for the Benares State. I have no other experience.

6676. Do you think, in the cases where native States have achieved marked success, it is due either to their having a ruler of very special capacity or to the Dewans and superior officials having been specially selected as particularly able people?—I do not think it would be at all fair of me to give any opinion on that subject. I have not experience that would entitle my opinion to be worth having.

6677. You pointed out that the population of British India is about 2½ times that of the United States; is not that only a part of our difficulty? Is not the most important part of it due to the illiteracy of 94 per cent. of that population?—Yes.

6678. And, therefore, you would not really make out that there is any real analogy with the conditions in the United States?—I simply took the remark that was made in the Montagu-Chelmsford Report. They noted that fact. No, I think the population of India is utterly different from the population of the United States.

6679. You say you would secure the Governor for all his business from failure on the Grand Committees?—Yes.

6680. How would you do that? Do you think that a majority of one, which appears to be proposed by the Government of India, would safeguard his policy?—Well, if one would not, I should have two or three. I would attain my object.

6681. You would make it certain, in fact?—I would make it certain.

6682. And you would not regard a majority of one as making it absolutely certain?—Well, it obviously would not, because one of the members might be ill.

6683. Of course, that might happen on both sides. I think your personal view is that the Supreme Government ought to be left alone till some experience is gained of working the new system?—I should have preferred that, but I think it is impracticable now.

6684. Do you think it is too late?—I think it is too late.

6685. Do you think that our Parliament is committed practically to making some great change in the Government of India?—I do not see how it can avoid doing so.

6686. You say it is very important to prevent a submersion of the depressed classes in the Councils. Now, to avoid that submersion, do you agree with the principle of communal representation, or would you rely on nomination to safeguard the interests of those people?—I thought over that question very carefully, and I have never been able to get a satisfactory answer. The nomination would be a good thing if one knew who to nominate. It was once suggested to me in India by an authority on the subject, that missionaries might be nominated, or Europeans of independent position, but I never could see much in that. I do not see how it was practicable. I think the only thing to do is to afford them a sufficient number of representatives of their own class. Of course, they would be utterly out of it at first, most of them, but in time it may be hoped they will learn and then get political experience, and become more educated, and become more able to protect their interests than they are at present.

6687. That means practically what we call communal representation, does it not?—Yes.

6688. I think you say you agree with the Government of India that next to religion and race the greatest dividing line of India is that between town and country?—Yes.

6689. Now, you pointed out that the town population of India was only 9.5 per cent. at the last census?—That was the figure I got from the last census. It is probably more now.

6690. It is probably increasing, but not very rapidly, I suppose?—Not that I know of.

6691. Now, the other day Mr. Montagu said that it was a complaint here that the town influence dominated the rural population; but if 78.1 per cent. of the population of England and Wales is urban, do not democratic principles practically entail domination in this country?—Yes.

6692. But for that reason, there is not the smallest analogy between India and the United Kingdom?—I would not say there is not the smallest analogy. There is no analogy in that way. That is why I gave those figures.

6693. I meant from that point of view. Are you quite satisfied that, under the proposals of the Franchise Committee the interests of the rural population would have sufficient influence now under the new councils or influence in proportion to their vast majority?—I have not read the proposals of the Franchise Committee. I read the letter of the Government of India on the subject; but I really could not undertake to give an opinion on it merely from reading a covering letter on a matter like that; I should have to read the Report itself before I could give an opinion that is worth anything at all.

6694. Is it not a fact that the rural population bear the greatest burden of taxation?—Yes; far the greatest burden.

6695. Is it not a fact that the rural taxpayers in India are very often people of very small means?—Yes.

6696. Does not that make it necessary that these large numbers of people of small means should be adequately represented in the new Councils?—Yes; certainly.

6697. Is not that vital, if justice is to be done?—Yes; certainly.

6698. Are you aware that a member of the Legislative Council may pay no taxation?—I am not aware of that.

6699. If

6699. If the interests of the rural population suffered in any way under the operation of these new Councils, should not we have certain trouble to face?—Yes; if they suffered seriously.

6700. I mean if they began to feel they were suffering?—Yes.

6701. Is it not a fact that the violent agitation we have experienced in late years is organised in the towns, mainly by town-dwelling populations?—Yes.

6702. In regard to what you said to Mr. Montagu about diarchy, is not there an essential difference between what you call "diarchy by convention" and the diarchy contemplated in the Report?—There is a considerable difference.

6703. The diarchy by convention would practially mean an evolution of the present unitary government, would it not, except that one or two members of the Executive Council would have to be chosen from the elected members of the Legislative Council?—Yes.

6704. It would, therefore, not be possible, in that case, for half the Government to oppose the other half in the Legislative Council itself?—No; it would not be a proper thing to be done; it might happen.

6705. With a diarchical government, as it is proposed, is it not fairly certain that a permanent and organised opposition would grow up against the Government in every Council? I think it would, irrespective of diarchy. I think the Government is bound to have its opposition. It will not be any the worse for a reasonable opposition.

6706. But when the opposition has powerful representatives in the Cabinet itself, would not that be much stronger than it can be at the present time?—I think it would be just the same, whether you had a unitary or a diarchical government, as far as that is concerned. I do not think that would make any difference.

6707. But under a unitary government no member of the Cabinet could form a part of the opposition. Under the diarchy, it seems to me, he can?—But surely his position is the same, really. Supposing you had diarchical government, and a Minister wished to bring in a certain measure in regard to a transferred subject, and he was finally persuaded to drop it, or the Governor persuaded him to drop it, that would be well and good; he would not say anything in the Legislative Council; but I think it would be very well known that he had dropped it, and that he was against the decision of the Government, and the Council would know that perfectly well even if he sat quiet.

6708. So that the Legislative Council would know that they had friends and supporters in the Executive Council itself?—Undoubtedly they would.

6709. In that case, supposing these oppositions to Government do grow up, will it not be necessary for the Government, much more than it has done in the past, to explain its objects and its policy to the public?—To explain its objects, yes; that is why I laid such emphasis on the necessity for publicity.

6710. The Governments in India in future may have to do what Governments in other countries have to do; that is to say, to proclaim widely and to explain their policy and their objects on platforms or in the Press?—I do not think that platforms would be a very satisfactory arrangements, but in the Press, certainly.

6711. Is not the very serious rising in the Punjab a warning of the dangers to which a false propaganda may give rise among ignorant and credulous people in India?—Yes.

6712. A very grave warning, is it not?—Yes.

Chairman.

6713. I think you suggested that industrial development should be a reserved subject?—Yes.

6714. I do not think any question has been asked about that. Would you like to say anything to the Committee why you pressed for that to be a reserved subject?—I do not wish to add anything to what has been said by the Government of India. I agree with that entirely. I cannot say anything in addition to it.

Chairman.] We are very much obliged to you.

(The Witness is directed to withdraw.)

Mr. L. K. TULASIRAM and Mr. K. APPA RAO NAIDU are called in; and Examined, as follows:—

Chairman.

6715. Will you state what body you represent?—(Mr. Tulasiram.) I represent the South Indian Liberal Federation of Madras.

6716. And you, Mr. Naidu?—(Mr. Naidu.) I represent not only the South Indian Liberal Federation of Madras, but also the Ganjam Peoples' Association, of which the Uriyas are members.

6717. You have come particularly to speak for the non-Brahmins of Madras?—(Mr. Tulasiram.) Yes, I have come principally to speak on behalf of the non-Brahmins of Madras, as well as the industrial classes who represent the commercial and trade interests of the Madras Presidency.

6718. You have circulated a memorandum?—Yes. (See Appendix T.) (Mr. Naidu.) I also sent in a memorandum (see Appendix U), but I also represent the Uriyas of Madras.

6719. Is there anything you wish to say to the Committee in addition to the memorandum?—(Mr. Tulasiram.) Yes. First of all, after the tragic death of Dr. Nair, who has been espousing the righteous cause of the 28 million non-Brahmins in the Madras Presidency, I have to thank your Lordships' Committee for having given us an opportunity of stating our case before this august assembly.

Now a declaration has been made on the 20th August, 1917. We welcome that declaration, and we hope that it augurs a very auspicious policy for the ameliora'ion of the condition of all classes. Since the Morley-Minto scheme I should say that the non-Brahmins of the Madras Presidency have not fared well. I admit that the leaders of the non-Brahmin movement did not press the question of communal representation at that time. We thought that our Brahmin friends in Madras, whom we all adopted as our religious preceptors, had not been treating us fairly and squarely. They are highly educated and very clever. There are two lakhs of people who are educated in the English language out of 414 lakhs of people in the Madras Presidency. The Brahmin male population is 6¼ lakhs, and the non-Brahmin caste Hindoo male population is nearly 140 lakhs. There is one lakh of people educated in English out of these 140 lakhs, but there is the same number of well-educated men among the male Brahmin population of 6¼ lakhs. The 6¼ lakhs of people, who form 3 per cent. of the population of the Madras Presidency, have as many men educated in English as the 70 per cent. of the non-Brahmin Hindoo population of the Presidency. That is the place where we lay the greatest stress. Take 10,000 people: 1,553 people are English-knowing, whereas among the non-Brahmins, out of 10,000 people, there are only 115 or so. I have also submitted to your Lordships' Committee that while there is one Brahmin graduate to 66 Brahmin males, there is only one non-Brahmin graduate to 6,000 non-Brahmin males. Now the people, the masses, are illiterate; only 5 per cent. of the people are educated in the vernaculars of the country. When a large Franchise is given, generally the illiterate are always guided by the educated people, and among the educated people the English-knowing have a greater voice in shaping their politics and all that. During the Satgraha movement started by the non-Brahmin leader, the Honourable Mr. Gandhi, the Madras people knew nothing whatsoever of that movement. Then placards were posted in Madras, saying that people are to fast for a day; they could not do any work, because Mr. Gandhi had proposed that day to be observed as a day of mourning. The illiterate non-Brahmin class in the Madras Presidency thought it was an order of the Brahmin community and that it must be obeyed. All the shops were closed; nothing was sold from the shops; lakhs and lakhs of people went to hear the preachings of the Brahmins, though they knew nothing of the meaning of the words. "The Satgraha Movement." So I beg to submit that when larger powers are going to be given, it is only the educated and the English-knowing classes who will be benefited, unless special safeguards are provided for protecting the interests interests of the class who number about 28 millions in the Madras Presidency. The Press is in the hands of the Brahmins, and also the platform. If anything goes on they send a wire. When there is a meeting held by a handful of Brahmins they send a wire to an important place saying that the public of Madura have decided in such a way. I only say that the public knows nothing of these things; the views are those of a few educated men, and they are sent out in the name of the public. So what is called public opinion, or Indian opinion, you may take it from me is nothing but the Brahmin opinion of Madras. I have no grievance against my Brahmin friends of Madras, but I have said that the Brahmins of Bengal are meek and submissive, the Brahmins of Bombay and Gujerat are tolerant and cosmopolitan, but the Brahmins of Madras are clannish, selfish and ambitious.

There are 9,878 Brahmin graduates and 2,962 non-Brahmin Hindoo graduates. Taking it in round numbers there are 10,000 Brahmin graduates and 3,000 non-Brahmin graduates. The appointment of district munsifs and subordinate judges is looked upon as a very honourable appointment by the non-Brahmins, because they decide the civil disputes of the people. The munsifs and subordinate judges form the judicial body of the Madras Presidency. They have an amount of influence which it would be very difficult for me to represent. Out of 171 appointments I think 118 have gone to Brahmins, and very few appointments, something like 15 or so, have gone to the non-Brahmins. Out of 10,000 Brahmin graduates and 3,000 non-Brahmin graduates, who make up 13,000, we have to find out the number of Bachelors of Law. The Bachelors of Law in the Madras Presidency are 2,500 among Brahmins and 700 among non-Brahmins. We have a number of non-Brahmins who are learned in the law. The minimum qualification required for a district munsif or a subordinate judge is only the passing of the Bachelor of Law examination. When there are nearly 700 non-Brahmin law graduates available, why should there be only 15 men in the whole service when there are 120 men among the Brahmins? I attribute this to the policy adopted by the late High Court Judge, Mr. Krishna Swami Aiyer. Hitherto the portfolio of appointing these judicial officers was entrusted to one of the High Court Judges, who happened to be a civilian judge, and who was holding the balance even between all communities, Brahmins or non-Brahmins, where the distribution was equal; but the late Mr. Krishna Swami Aiyer, who acted as executive member also, after he left the High Court Bench, conceived the idea in 1910 of consulting all the High Court judges in the matter of appointing these munsifs and sub-judges. His idea was this. He thought: All the other English judges do not take a keen interest in the matter as to these appointments; they have no one there to help; it is only the Brahmin High Court judges who have to distribute, and a majority of Brahmin judges would be in a position to add to the majority of Brahmin candidates. From 1910 the proportion of Brahmin graduates in law, who were recruited into the judicial service was higher, and the non-Brahmins were going down slowly.

Then as regards deputy collectors and sub-magistrates, they are looked upon by the ordinary masses as important appointments, because they generally punish the people, and people look upon those magistrates as having more authority in the country. Generally the Shreshtadar, who advises the collector, happens to be a Brahmin, and those Brahmin advisers advise the English civilian judges to give more appointments to Brahmin lawyers as sub-magistrates and deputy collectors. When all these appointments are taken by the Brahmins the phenomenon is that 3 per cent. of the population of the Madras Presidency, who are Brahmins, have taken 50 per cent. to 60 per cent. of the higher appointments in the country, whereas the non-Brahmin Hindoos, who form 70 per cent. of the population, have taken only 15 per cent. of the higher appointments in the service.

Now these elections to the Legislative Council are almost all controlled by Brahmin lawyers, Brahmin professors, and Brahmin inspectors of schools, and they wield an undue amount of influence—so much so that, although we form an overwhelming majority, we seek safeguards in order to be protected from the effects of the decisive political ascendancy of a small minority. That is the phenomenon. It is quite unusual for your Lordships to see that an overwhelming majority should ask for protection, but at the same time it is also unusual for a small minority to have a decisive political ascendancy over a vast majority. And it is for that reason that we come before your Lordships and crave that special safeguards should be provided for the representation of the non-Brahmins. All the political associations of the country have unanimously supported our claim for communal representation. For instance, the Mahajana Sabha, the Congress Committee of Madras, the Andhra movement, and the Brahmin controlled Madras Presidency Association and the Moderate Congress held at Bombay have all supported communal representation. Even Sir Sankaran Nair, who is a non-Brahmin, in the volume called 'The Letter of the Government of India' of the 5th March, says: "I support communal representation for the non-Brahmins of the Madras Presidency."

Now the only question is, What sort of communal representation is to be given to the non-Brahmins? Is it communal representation by reserving seats in the plural constituencies or by separating and creating separate electorates for the non-Brahmins of the Madras Presidency? Now communal representation has, in a way, been provided for all the communities of the Madras Presidency—the Europeans, the Anglo-Indians, the Mohammedans, and the Indian Christians—and the only community which has been denied the principle of communal representation in the Franchise Committee's Report is the non-Brahmin Hindoos of Madras. The learned authors of the Franchise Committee's Report have clubbed together the Brahmin Hindoos and the non-Brahmin Hindoos. Even the depressed classes have been provided three seats by nomination. The only communities which are now clubbed together and are asked to fight in a general electorate are the caste Hindoos, consisting of the Brahmin Hindoos, who are 13 lakhs, and the non-Brahmin Hindoos, who are 280 lakhs? Why should we be tacked on to 13 lakhs of Brahmins? The authors of the Franchise Committee's Report say that they do not want to divide and rule, and therefore they club us together with the Brahmins. They say we ought to be together. Why did you take away the Mohammedans, the Indian Christians, the Anglo-Indians, the Europeans, and the depressed classes, and what is your special pleasure in clubbing together the non-Brahmin Hindoos in the Madras Presidency along with the Brahmins? We say the Brahmins want to divide us and rule, and you tell us that you would be dividing and ruling the community if you divided us. The object of the Brahmins in clubbing the non-Brahmin Hindoos and the Brahmin Hindoos together is to see that in the fight between stronger animals and the less strong animals the former prevail. Just as in a menagerie, if you throw food at random the lions and tigers and the stronger animals get the food and the others would be starving. It is for that purpose that the Brahmins want us to be clubbed with them. We say we will not be clubbed with them. If we are, the Brahmins will have the platforms and the Press in their hands. They will be delivering lectures, and illiterate people will be carried away when the claims of one candidate are highly pressed. They will think he is the cleverest man, and he will be elected. Our sad experience has been that the best man among the non-Brahmins when in competition with the ordinary Brahmin of the Presidency loses; the ordinary Brahmin succeeds against the best non-Brahmin in the country. For instance, Dr. Nair was defeated, ad now the whole country mourns for his loss, and they say he was the ablest man in the country. The reason these people are defeated is that there is a compact; all the Brahmin professors, the Brahmin vakils, and the Brahmin students club together to praise and sing Alleluia of their candidate, and he gains the day.

It may naturally be asked of me how do I account for the phenomenon of five non-Brahmin candidates having been elected on the Council when usually our position was that out of the ten seats provided for the general electorates only one seat was taken by the non-Brahmins and nine seats were captured by the Brahmins. The explanation I would give for this phenomenon is that this is not a Council for a full term; this is a transitory Council for a period of six months or so until the new Government Bill is passed into law and comes into force. Now the Brahmins want to show to the Committee, "We are very fair; we have not fought; we have given a lot of seats to non-Brahmins. Look here! They are strong enough; even when you have not provided exceptional arrangements they are able to capture five seats!" Otherwise, why have they been so generous as to give us five seats when for all these blessed twenty years we were so unsuccessful as not to get more than one seat?

The candidate for Madura, Tinnevelly, and Ramnad is an official non-Brahmin. He was deputy-collector fifteen days before the announcement of the new election. He retired on a pension. He had been a deputy-collector in the three districts of the Presidency in which he stood as a candidate, and the fear of that official had not subsided, and when he announced himself as a candidate all the people said, "Well, he is an officer; we will have to vote for him." They had not forgotten the punishments he had given to some of the criminals and to some of the other people, and he succeeded there. In another electorate the contest was keen between two Brahmin candidates, and so the non-Brahmin succeeded there by a majority of 13. If the two Brahmins had settled their differences the non-Brahmin would not have been elected by that small majority of 13 votes.

I know your Lordships' Committee has been doing yeoman service to help us by hearing all our statements. I only say it is very necessary, in the interests of public order, tranquillity, peace, and contentment of the country that you should give communal representation to the non-Brahmins of the Madras Presidency; if you deny communal representation, there is a proverb that a poor man's anger is that he bites his lips and keeps quiet—we cannot do anything. Our prayer is that you give communal representation to the non-Brahmins of the Madras Presidency.

6720. Do you wish to make a statement, Mr. Naidu?—(Mr. Naidu.) Yes, my Lord. I have already said that I represent the Uriyas of the Madras Presidency, and also I would like to say that I represent specially the Telugu parts, that is, the Northern parts of the Madras Presidency. In my Memorandum which I submitted before this Committee I stated that two kinds of communities, or two classes of communities, are demanding communal representation, that is the minority communities, and the backward majority communities. I want to say something with regard to the Uriyas. The Uriyas in the Madras Presidency are a minority community. They differ from their neighbours, the Telugu people, in language, in race, in customs, and in manners. Of course, it is true that they are Hindoos, as the Telugus are, but yet there are so many differences among them that they were pressing all through for a separate electorate for themselves. As I stated in my Memorandum, they form 1½ millions of people, mostly living in two districts, that is, in the Ganjam and the Vizag districts. One witness appeared before the Franchise Committee, when it was sitting at Madras, and demanded a special electorate for the Uriyas, and the Franchise Committee were pleased to remark at Paragraph 18: "Claims for separate electorates were placed before us by numerous other communities, such as the Uriyas of Madras and others. In these cases we did not feel justified in admitting the claim." With that observation they have thrown out the claim of the Uriyas. I was specially asked to represent them and plead for a separate electorate wherein two Uriyas can be returned. It was represented before this Committee that the zemindars are feeling that the seats provided for them by the Franchise Committee are insufficient. So I suggest that out of the two seats claimed by the Uriyas one seat may be given to the Uriya zemindars, and one seat may be given to the people, the Uriya people of those two districts.

Now coming to the backward majority communities, I have to represent the claims of the non-Brahmins of the Madras Presidency. They are a majority community only in a restricted sense. It was made out, or attempted to be made out, that these non-Brahmins consisted of several communities. If amongst the non-Brahmins there are several communities, then they form, not a majority community, but only minority communities which require protection. If they are considered to be a majority community, united for common aims, common sentiments, and common purposes, then, as I stated in my Memorandum, on account of the special circumstances under which the Madras Presidency is differing from the other parts of India, and especially the influences that prevail, both in the rural parts and also in the urban areas, we press for communal representation for the non-Brahmins in the Madras Presidency.

It was attempted to be shown to your Lordships' Committee that the non-Brahmins of the Telugu parts are not very much interested in communal representation. My friend, Mr. K. V. Reddi, and myself were specially deputed from the Northern districts, that is the Telugu parts, to plead their cause. The witness who made that statement lives mostly in Madras, and he is ignorant with regard to the conditions in the Telugu parts of the Madras Presidency. I may state that out of the many conferences which were held and which were enumerated by Mr. K. V. Reddi, some seven or eight were held in the Telugu parts, the conferences at Biccavole, at Bezwada, at Rajahmundry, at Masulipatam, and in several other places. They were well attended, and one of the biggest conferences that was ever held in the Madras Presidency was held at Biccavole, where 8,000 delegates and visitors attended. Apart from the conferences which we had, there were district organisations for the amelioration of the non-Brahmins, the Ganjam People's Association at Berhampur, the Godaveri District Non-Brahmin Association at Rajanmunday, the Krishna District Non-Brahmin Association at Bezwada, and several other branches of these associations working heart and soul for the uplift of the non-Brahmins in all spheres of activity.

It was also attempted to be shown that the contested question in the Telugu parts is the creation of a separate Province. The non-Brahmins of the Telugu country are against this bifurcation into two separate Provinces, because they see that it is only a duplication of the official machinery, leading to more taxation; that means taxing the rural classes, that is the agricultural communities, of which the non-Brahmins form 95 per cent.

It was stated many times before this Committee that the Madras Presidency Association is a representative body, and it voices forth the views of the non-Brahmins of the Southern Presidency. The Madras Presidency Association could not send a single non-Brahmin Hindoo to support their contentions. Two Christians and a Parsee of Bombay came forward as the representatives of the non-Brahmin Hindoos of that association. Mr. Kesava Pillai, President of the Presidency Association, has been referred to as one who is considered to be a leader of the non-Brahmin communities, and his name was referred to by Lord Carmichael, who said that a man like Mr. Kesava Pillai could succeed in any elections as against any other candidate. I beg to read to you a statement made by Mr. Kesava Pillai in "Justice" of July 28th, which came by this week's mail, with regard to communal electorates for the non-Brahmin Hindoos in the Madras Presidency. With the permission of your Lordship I will read a few passages of what Mr. Kesava Pillai said. Mr. Pillai was defeated twice of late, and as soon as he was defeated an interviewer approached him, and the following conversation took place: "(Q.) To what causes do you attribute your present defeat?—(A.) Except a few Brahmin gentlemen, there appears to have been a common understanding among Brahmins, officials, non-officials, vakils and voters to see me defeated. I have heard of one Brahmin deputy-collector in Kurmool sending his Dalayats to ignorant non-Brahmin voters and coercing them to vote for a certain Brahmin candidate. I have heard of a Brahmin Tahsildar, and Tamilian to boot, coercing non-Brahmin voters, who had promised me and their friends to vote for me, to vote against me. I have heard of a Brahmin police inspector coercing voters. A Brahmin Madhva vakil who had championed my candidature apparently out of ill-will towards one Brahmin candidate voted and worked for another Brahmin Brahmin. (Q.) Have you heard of a High Court vakil of Bellary, a Nationalist Home-Ruler to boot, telling that non-Brahmin voters dare not vote against a Brahmin, as they have to depend for almost all things on officials and lawyers, who are mostly Brahmins. (A.) I am not at all surprised at the presumption; I should have expected something better from a man of his education. He has no conception of the higher interests of the country, and forgets that a strong belief that such a state of affairs prevails is the chief ground why communal representation is insisted on. I am glad that he has frankly boasted of it, and it is sure to make the more self-respecting and intelligent non-Brahmins to seriously reflect over it and keep alive the non-Brahmin movement. (Q.) Do you believe that your defeat is essentially due to a conspiracy, as it were, of Brahmins against you?—(A.) I cannot say it is a conspiracy, because there were several Brahmin gentlemen who had risen above caste and other petty jealousies and worked and voted for me. But I am now informed that there was an unholy combination among the majority of them. Some of them, pretending to be friendly towards me, and promising to work for me, have proved treacherous; I am convinced of it. (Q.) What do you think the effect of this defeat will be on a non-Brahmin sentiment?—(A.) Unhappily very few non-Brahmins understand their real situation, but this defeat may be a powerful weapon in the hands of those who really understand their position, and are urging for separate electorates for the Brahmins and a separate electorate for the non-Brahmin Hindoos. (Q.) Will this in any way modify your attitude towards the question of communal electorates?—(A.) Communal representation will serve to restrict the Brahmin element; but one feels at times that a separate Brahmin electorate, as is insisted upon by the South Indian Liberal Federation, is necessary for the Brahmins to stew in their own juice and select men from among themselves to represent their own views, their own sentiments, and their own character, instead of a mixed electorate being manipulated by most disreputable means to send men on the principle, 'the worst Brahmin is better than the best Sudra,' to represent the views, sentiments, and the character of the non-Brahmins as well."

It was represented before your Committee that Mr. Kesava Pillai wants only a reservation of seats in plural constituencies, but now, from the statement he has made, he is for communal electorates.

In discussing questions of Indian reform it is often said in this country that social equality will follow as a matter of course, political liberty or independence. Political liberty or independence can be achieved only by people who have got mutual trust, mutual confidence, and a spirit of self-sacrifice, and a spirit of give and take. When custom tyranises over people with the force of law, without giving liberty for the individual to act according to his own conscience, when the caste system is eating away the vitals of the nation, establishing that a certain community alone is superior, without giving liberty for the other castes or communities to rise both in education and in influence, when the slender sex are penned in the zenanas without giving liberty to them to enjoy the free air and free surroundings, when a selfish priesthood tyrannises over the people with their Bulls of excommunication; when society is in such a deplorable state, I feel that people have not the consciousness to understand what liberty is. So it is necessary, before political liberty is granted, that a consciousness should be roused in the people for liberty. In every day life social liberty is not enjoyed, and politics affect men only on occasions. Thus, under Indian conditions, under Indian circumstances, it can be seen that if political liberty or independence is granted it means only political liberty to the selfish upper class or community. Political liberty will not go down to the masses. It is also warranted by all historical facts. It is stated in Ranade's well-known book on the rise of Mahratta power that before Savaji established the Empire in the Mahratta Kingdom there was a reformation in society and in religion which paved the way for the establishment of the Empire, and as soon as the Mahratta power came into the hands of the Chitpawan Brahmins then the Mahratta Kingdom fell to pieces. So, in these circumstances, I beg to state that political advance should be gradual and cautious; and further, that communal representation for backward majority communities also should be granted, so that an oligarchy may not be established in India, especially in the Madras Presidency.

I thank the members of the Committee for having granted us the privilege of making our statements and submitting our memoranda on behalf of the vast millions of the Southern Presidency.

Chairman.] We are much obliged to you.

(After a short adjournment.)

SIR WILLIAM MEYER, G.C.I.E., K.C.S.I., is called in; and Examined, as follows:—

Chairman.

6721. Sir William, you were a member of the Indian Civil Service?—Yes.

6722. And your last appointment was Finance Member of the Government of India?—Yes.

6723. Which Presidency was most of your service in?—I belonged to the Madras Presidency.

6724. You have been good enough to send answers to the questions which were sent to you, for which we are much obliged?—Yes.

The questions and answers are as follows:—

1. Do you accept the proposition that it is desirable to bring about the progressive realisation of responsible government in India, and, if so, how do you define the expression "responsible government"? And do you generally accept the proposition contained in the Preamble?—I accept the proposition here stated, and by "responsible government" I understand a form of administration such as prevails in Great Britain and the Dominions, under which the Governments in British India shall ultimately be responsible to and controlled by the Indian Legislatures. I accept the proposition contained in the Preamble to the Bill, on the understanding that its first sentence implies the eventual realisation of "responsible government" in the Central Government as well as in the Provinces.

2. Do you think that the realisation of responsible government in the provinces involves the establishment in provincial Legislatures of a substantial elected majority (Clause 6)?—Yes.

Chairman—continued.

3. Do you think that the non-official members of the provincial Legislatures should possess power to control the actions and policy of the executive? Do you think they possess such power at present?—My answer to the first part of the question is "eventually, yes," but that the time is not ripe for full and immediate application of this proposition, and there must be a preliminary stage, as proposed in the Joint Report by the Secretary of State and the Viceroy, during which there will be a discrimination between subjects "transferred" to the administration of Ministers responsible to the Legislature as well as to the Governor, and those "reserved" to the Governor in (Executive) Council. But even in regard to these latter, the increase of the elected element in the Legislatures, and the much more representative character proposed for them, must give great weight to the resolutions which they may pass in regard to reserved subjects, and accentuate the necessity for acting in accordance with their wishes as far as possible in the matter of legislation. They will also control the Provincial Budgets subject to the special powers reserved to the Governor in the provisos to Clause 9 (2) of the Bill. Lastly, the institution of Standing Committees proposed in paragraph 235 of the Joint Report is, to my mind, a very desirable and legitimate way of bringing the Legislative Councils into closer touch with administration. As regards the latter part of the question, the non-official members of the Legislature as at present constituted cannot be said to have any direct control over the Government, but they exercise much indirect influence by means of interpellations and resolutions, while Bills are framed so as to avoid friction in the Legislative Council as far as possible, and the non-official members of the Select Committee on Bills often obtain material modification therein.

5, 6. If you accept the propositions stated under Questions 1 to 4, do you think that the dual form of government embodied in the Bill is the best means of securing them? If not, what are your objections to that feature of the Bill, and by what other means would you attempt to secure the objects in view? If you have any other method to suggest, does it (i.) provide possibilities of advance by stages and facilitate the "progressive realisation of responsible government," and, if it does, in what way? (Clause 2, 3, etc.). and (ii.) does it afford means of judgment, (a) to the electors, and (b) to the Statutory Commission which is to examine and report on progress, of the success or failure in results of the control exercised by the Legislature, and those who represent it in the Executive?—When, as a member of the Viceroy's Council, I was first faced with the proposal for a dual form of Government, subsequently embodied in the Joint Report, I approached it with considerable reluctance. But on further consideration I came to the conclusion, which I still hold, that, given what I regard as the two basic propositions governing the situation—that India must progress towards responsible Government, but that circumstances do not permit of her doing so per saltum—the dual scheme, by which a material beginning is made in the Provinces in respect of the transferred subjects, with the promise of further transfers as time goes on, and satisfactory results have been achieved with the subjects already made over, was the most practical method of dealing with the situation. You thus avoid undue precipitancy on the one hand and undue delay in satisfying legitimate aspirations on the other. The criticisms which have been levelled at this system on the ground that it is cumbrous, will lead to friction, and so forth seem to me to lose much of their force if it be remembered that the scheme is ex hypothesi merely a temporary halting stage on the route between bureaucratic and responsible government, during which it will be to the obvious interest of those who want fuller powers to make out a claim for those by the way in which they have made the best of the first instalment. The alternative scheme put forward by certain Heads of Provinces, which aims at preserving a unified administration without at the same time making a plunge into responsible government, seems to me fully open to the criticisms bestowed on it in paragraphs 20-24 of the Government of India Despatch of 5th March, 1919. I also concur with what is said on this matter in paragraph VIII. of the Secretary of State's Memorandum on the Bill.

7, 8. If you consider a dual form of government acceptable in principle, are there any points of detail the modification of which you regard as necessary? If so, what are those points, and what modifications would you suggest? In particular, do you think (i.) that Ministers should hold office "during pleasure"—i.e., should be liable to removal if they are unable to support the action decided upon in their department by the Governor, or, if they fail, to retain the confidence of the Legislature? (Clause 3 (1)), (ii.) That the Governor should have power to disregard the opinion of his Ministers if he considers that action in accordance with that opinion is inconsistent with the due discharge of his responsibilities? (Clause 3 (3)). (iii.) That the executive council should in all provinces normally consist of one official European and one non-official Indian? (Clause 4). (iv.) That the Governor should have power to dissolve his Legislative Council? (Clause 7 (4)).—My answer to the queries in question 8 is in the affirmative. As regards question 7, (1) I should like to lay stress on the desirability, where there is more than one Minister, of supplementing the close relations which must necessarily exist between the Governor and individual Ministers by consultation on important questions arising in respect of the transferred subjects between the Governor and the Ministers collectively, such as takes place in the Executive Councils. Also on the desirability, as indicated in paragraph 246 of the Joint Report, of stimulating joint deliberation between the Council and Minister wings of the Government. These are essential steps towards a complete responsible government system later on. (2) The proposals of the Joint Report have been whittled down in the Government of India Despatch of 5th March, 1919, in certain directions, in regard to which I do not agree with the changes proposed. These are: (a) That there should be no present change in appointing civilians to the Governorships, as they will hereafter be called, of the United Provinces, Punjab, Bihar-cum-Orissa and the Central Provinces. The Governor, under the new scheme, will play such an important part as arbiter between the two wings of his Government that he will carry much more confidence with the popular section if he is appointed from outside; and the United Provinces at any rate, on the occurrence of the next vacancy, might well claim to be put on a level in this respect with the Presidency Governorships. (b) I do not agree with the Government of India's proposal for a separate purse system. I concur with the arguments in favour of the Joint Purse arrangement set forth in paragraph 10 of the Memorandum put before the Joint Select Committee by the Deputation of the Indian Moderate Party. I adhere, therefore, to the proposal in paragraphs 256-7 of the Joint Report. (c) With the maintenance of the Joint Purse arrangement, and taxation the act of Ministers as proposed in the Joint Report, there is no case for the putting of taxation proposals before the Grand Committee as suggested in paragraph 73 of the Despatch. (d) I am glad to see that the Secretary of State is against the proposal that resolutions of the Legislative Council on financial matters should be mere pious opinions. (e) I agree with paragraph 17 of the Moderate Delegates' Memorandum that it would be desirable to maintain the suggestion, in paragraph 260 of the Joint Report, allowing for some modification of the initial distribution between transferred and reserved subjects after five or six years. (f) I think the original proposal for Standing Committees (paragraph 235 of the Joint Report) was very valuable, and I do not like the cutting down of it suggested at the end of paragraph 92 of the Government of India Despatch. The same remark applies to their minimising of the Joint Report's proposal for Council Under-Secretaries (paragraph 93 ib.).

9. Referring back to Questions 2, 3, and 4, if your answers to the first and third of these are in the affirmative, and if you think that the Legislatures should be given greater powers of control and influence than they possess at present, do you regard the limitations imposed generally by clause 9 of the Bill upon their financial and Legislative powers as (i.) suitable, or as (ii.) unnecessarily severe, or as (iii.) inadequate to safeguard the responsibilities which the government owes in the last resort to Parliament (Clause 9)?—Subject to my answer to question 10, I think the provisions of Clause 9 of the Bill are suitable.

10. In particular, (i.) do you think that the Legislature should have power with whatever limitations to vote supplies (Clause 9 (2))? (ii.) Do you accept the plan of Grand Committees as the means of giving to the Government the power to secure essential legislation in the event of their failure to carry their propositions in the Council? If so, have you any modifications of detail to suggest? If not, what other method would you suggest to secure the object in view?—(1) Yes, it being understood that: (a) The whole Budget—receipts provisions, as well as expenditure—will be put before the Legislative Council. (b) It will be open to the Council to propose reduction of revenue, whether derived from taxation or otherwise. But resolutions to this effect would be open to rejection by the Governor if their result would be to affect the provision for essential services to such a degree as to bring the matter within the purview of the provisos to Clause 9 (2). (c) Subject to the same provisos, it will be open to the Council to propose transfer of expenditure from one Budget Head to another. (d) Re-appropriations between Budget Heads which are found necessary after the Budget has been passed will, if of considerable amount, be submitted to the Council for approval in the shape of supplementary estimates. But here again the provisos to Clause 9 (2) should apply. (2) Yes, I think the Grand Committee plan is desirable in present circumstances.

11. Do you accept the position adopted in the Bill (Part II.) that the time has not yet come to give the Legislative Assembly a similar measure of control over the Central Government as that given to Provincial Legislative Councils over Provincial Governments?—Yes, but I think that steps should be taken at an early date—say, after five or six years—to consider a beginning of control in the Central Government also. By that time evidence will be available as to the success or otherwise of the delegation to popular control of the transferred subjects in the provinces, and if the system is found to have worked well on the whole there, an early beginning should be made in regard to its application in the Central Government. Otherwise you get the risk of the idea spreading that the scheme is not intended to popularise the Central Government for a long time to come, and this would materially impair its acceptance as a satisfactory instalment of responsible government. The subjects which might be so transferred within a few years might, generally speaking, be those of the character indicated in paragraph 18 of Sir James Brunyate's Statement attached to the Report of the Committees on the Home administration of Indian affairs, subject (on my part) to doubt as to whether this first transfer should include the scientific and technical services mentioned in Sir James' item (iv.). I may add that I would maintain the proposals in paragraphs 275 and 285 of the Joint Report in respect of Council Under Secretaries and Standing Committees in the Government of India.

12. Do you agree that it is advisable none the less to provide for a substantial elective majority in the Indian Legislature (Clause 16)?—Yes.

13. Do you accept the plan of a bicameral Legislature as arising out of this, as constituting both a satisfactory machine for the ordinary purposes of legislation and as affording the means to the Governor-General in Council to secure legislation which he regards as essential (Clauses 14, 15, and 16)?—Yes.

14. Do you accept the provisions of the Bill as to the course of legislation in the Indian Legislature (Clause 20 (3) and (4))? Or do you regard them as unnecessarily restrictive on the popular will, or as an inadequate means of ensuring to the Governor-General in Council the discharge of his responsibilities?—I accept these proposals as desirable in present circumstances.

15. Do you accept the changes made by the Bill (Clause 21) in the constitution of the Governor-General's Executive Council. If not, what are your reasons, and what modifications would you suggest?—I accept the changes here referred to.

16. Do you think that the development of Provincial autonomy on the one hand, and of self-government in the provinces on the other, involves any modification of the provisions of sections 2, 33, and 45 of the Government of India Act (Clause 23)?—I am in agreement with the underlying idea of Clause 23, that power should be taken to enable the Secretary of State to transfer control to a larger extent than would be otherwise admissible under the Government of India Act. But I think that unless it is more clearly indicated at the outset in what directions it is proposed to decentralise, there may be suspicion in India that the Secretary of State is in no hurry to shed any of his existing powers. Accordingly, I think that some indication should be given in the clause as to the principal matters in regard to which the Secretary of State may by rule devolve powers of control which he now exercises—e.g., in respect of legislation, administration and finance.

17. Do you agree that the gradual realisation of responsible government involves periodical examination of progress by independent authority, and that the provisions of Clause 28 of the Bill are well designed to afford such examination?—Yes, subject to the suggestions made above (on Questions 7 and 11) that power should be taken to enable further devolution to popular control in the Provincial Governments, and a beginning of this in the Government of India, at an earlier date than that prescribed by clause 28.

18. Are there any matters which it is proposed in the Bill to deal with by rule which you would suggest should be provided for in the Bill?—See answer to Question 16. I would add that in respect of rules which involve important questions of principle the Governments and Legislatures in India should have opportunity of criticism and representation before these are passed.

19. Have you any observations to offer in the Reports of Lord Southborough's Committees and of the Committee on the Home Administration of Indian Affairs?—(1) Franchise Committee.—(a) I am strongly in favour of direct election—as opposed to election by the non-official members of Provincial Legislative Councils—for the Central Legislative Assembly and the Council of State. A relatively high franchise, which would be quite legitimate in present circumstances, would obviate the objections that the size of the constituencies would be unmanageable; and if direct election in both cases is not deemed practical, I would rather see it applied to the Assembly than to the Council of State. (b) I would not modify the allocation of seats to Mohammedans proposed by the Committee in respect of the Provincial Legislatures. That allocation followed the agreement arrived at between the Indian National Congress and the All India Muslim League, which had reference to the circumstances of India as a whole. If you alter it in one or more provinces (e.g. in Bengal as the Government of India suggests) you open the whole of this thorny matter to fresh discussion and agitation. (c) For the sake of peace and co-operation between Brahmans and non-Brahmans in Madras, I would, if the non-Brahmans will accept this as a satisfactory settlement, follow the proposal in paragraph 26 of the Government of India's Despatch of 23rd April, 1919, that a certain proportion of seats in plural constituencies would be reserved for non-Brahmans, and the same analogy might be applied in other provinces in which there is real or imagined divergence of interest between important classes of the Hindu community, e.g. in respect of Marathas in Bombay. (d) I do not agree with the Government of India's proposal (paragraph 14 of Despatch of 23rd April, 1919) to abolish University seats, the retention of which was proposed by the Committee. (2) Functions Committee.—(a) I am inclined to agree with the Government of India (paragraph 12 of Despatch of 16th April, 1919) that it is not necessary to ear-mark certain Transferred subjects as "subject to Indian Legislation." (b) I also agree with them (paragraphs 116-120 ib.) as to the desirability in present circumstances of reserving a certain amount of control and initiative in respect of industrial development to the Central Government and of keeping Industries at the outset as a Reserved subject in the Provinces. I may add to the arguments adduced by the Government of India the point that it is necessary, in pursuing a sound policy of departure from the old laissez faire attitude of Government in respect of industrial development, that this should not be prejudiced by exaggerated provisional "particularism" in respect of industries which already exist or can be more expediently developed in other parts of India. (c) But I agree with the Committee and not with the Government of India in respect of making education as a whole (other than European and Anglo-Indian education) a Transferred Head. (3) Committee on Home Administration of Indian Affairs.—I agree generally with the views and proposals embodied in Sir James Brunyate's Minute of Dissent and Statement, and I am particularly anxious for the maintenance of the proposal for a Parliamentary Committee on on Indian affairs set forth in paragraph 295 of the Joint Report, though personally I should prefer a Joint Committee which would include Peers as well as Commoners.

6725. Perhaps you would like to say something in supplement of those answers—to make a statement on the general position?—I would rather, if I may, await the questions you and other members of the Committee may wish to put to me.

6726. You have nothing at all you would like to say?—The only thing at present I should like to say is that I am in entire agreement with the opinion expressed by Sir George Lloyd, that delay is dangerous, that the most dangerous thing of all is to sit still, and that it is better to get on with a scheme which may be theoretically imperfect than to delay matters until you can find a theoretically better one.

Lord Sydenham.

6727. I think you agree that the present Councils as they now stand exercise much indirect influence on Government?—Yes, I have said that in my preliminary replies.

6728. You have said that Government Bills are now so framed as to avoid friction in the Councils as far as possible?—That is so.

6729. Therefore you admit that non-official members coming on Select Committees often materially modify the Government Bills?—They do.

6730. If the Provincial Councils are now enlarged with elected majorities, and if their sphere of influence is immensely extended by the decentralisation which is to come, would you not say that that is a substantial step in the direction of self-government?—It is a step in one of the directions that leads to self-government, but it still does not directly associate the Legislatures with administration. It merely gives them a greater power of criticism.

6731. It also gives the power of moving resolutions which they now have, and moving them with greater force than they had in the past?—That is so.

6732. If a unitary Government remained under those new conditions, and if the new Councils proved to be really representative bodies, would there not then be a very good foundation for what is technically called responsible Government?—You would, on the hypothesis you put, some time or other have to come to responsible government, but you would have to do it per saltum, and I think that state of things would be more embarrassing than the dualist scheme of the Secretary of State and the Viceroy.

6733. On the other hand, if what you have called in your note a temporary halting stage were to produce friction in every Province, and to undermine the authority of government and put nothing in its place, would not the attainment of the goal of responsible government be retarded?—If it were worked in that way so as to produce, as you put it, friction in every department of government, undoubtedly; but I would submit that the very fact that it is a halting stage, and that it will get on to a further stage the quicker from the way in which those entrusted with powers work the first stage satisfactorily, will be a direct inducement to them to work on a rational system—to get to work and not block things.

6734. You hope for smooth working at the outset of the system that is proposed in the Bill?—Yes, because, if I may emphasise the fact, it is ex hypothesi the way to further development. If it was not for that promise of further development, and it were meant as a definite halting stage, then I should say that it would produce friction.

6735. You know that in all cases in which what is called responsible government has been given in the Dominions it has always been given as you say, per saltum?—I submit to your authority upon that, but take South Africa—I think there was an intermediate stage in the Transvaal between a full responsible Government and the military Government which took place after the war.

6736. There was a military Government, undoubtedly, but the actual grant of full control of the executive by a representative body was given as a whole at one time. The present executive Governments, as we know, make mistakes, all Governments do that, but do you not think that these Governments have in the past acted only with a single eye to what they believed to be the interests of the people?—Undoubtedly.

6737. You have occupied responsible positions in the Government of Madras and in the Government of India; did you ever in those positions think of anything else except the good of the masses of India?—No, I certainly in my fallible way tried to work in the interests of the masses of India.

6737A. Is it not the fact, therefore, that the unitary governments so far have stood generally above sectional interests and have shown impartiality?—They have done their best to do that, but we are all fallible, and they may have failed every now and then.

6738. Do you know of any instance in any country in which one part of the Cabinet is made independent of the other part?—No, it is a novel experiment in that way; but the joint scheme deliberately provides for it only as a temporary measure, and it provides for bringing the two wings of the Cabinet into as close connection as possible, which is the reason, as I said in my preliminary statement, that I disagree with some of the Government of India's later proposals, which seemed to me to have the effect of separating them.

6739. Do you think really that joint consultations between two mutually independent halves of a Provincial Cabinet are likely to lead to unanimity?—I think, very often; take our experience in Select Committees on Bills under the present system, you there have the two different elements, the official element and the non-official element, and we have often found that when we did agree our unanimity was wonderful.

6740. Those meetings of Select Committees in which unanimity, as you say, very often results, take place in camera, do they not?—Yes.

6741. Which makes a considerable difference?—Yes.

6743. In case of differences between the popular and the so-called official members, would not the popular members obtain all the support of the National Congress and all the Press which it controls?—I should hope that these differences would not be ventilated in public so frequently as you suggest, because if the joint consultations lead to modification by each of the opinions from which they started, there is no need of ventilating them.

6744. Would you go so far as to say that we are asked to make what is a great experiment, untried in any other country?—The method of the experiment is different from what has been, so far as I know, tried in any other country, certainly, but the conditions of India itself are peculiar.

6745. Do you think an inflammable country like India, where there are large masses of ignorant people who can always be worked up to violence by propaganda of falsehoods, is a safe field for a great political experiment?—From that point of view I should say that it is safer to have the people who may upset the coach, inside it.

6746. You hope to get them inside it?—I should in time.

6747. I see that you say that in the United Provinces, at any rate, you think the next Governor should be appointed from home?—Yes.

6748. Like some of us who have come from home, they will at first, will they not, require the best expert advice they can get?—Certainly.

6749. How do you propose to give that best advice to those Governors from home?—The Governor will have his Executive Council, he will have his Secretaries, he will have the Heads of Departments, and he will be able to send for anybody whose opinion he may think specially useful. He will also have his Ministers, who by that time will have had experience of a sort in their subjects.

6750. At first is there any guarantee that the popular Minister will have had any experience whatever in administration?—He need not have any more than a Minister here.

6751. You understand that a Minister here practically in every case, unless he is appointed as an expert for a special purpose, goes through an apprenticeship; you know that?—I do not quite follow what sort of an apprenticeship you refer to.

6752. Nobody gets into the Cabinet here, as a rule, unless he has made his mark in some way as a Parliamentary Under-Secretary?—But there are surely cases to the opposite effect; take the present Prime Minister, he came into the Cabinet without any previous official training, and Mr. Chamberlain did the same, I think.

6753. I think Mr. Chamberlain held office?——

Chairman.] No.

Lord Sydenham.

6754. I see you approve of the Joint Purse system, and you are opposed to this divided purse, on which we have taken a great deal of evidence?—Yes.

6755. What measure of control do you propose to give to the elected majorities over finance?—The control proposed in the original joint scheme, that outside certain charges which would be fixed definitely on the Provinces, the whole of the Provincial Budget would be liable to debate by the Legislative Council, and the modifications they might introduce would stand unless under special circumstance the Governor thought fit to disallow them as provided in the Bill.

6756. So that they would have really complete control other than any veto which the Governor might impose afterwards on their decisions?—Yes.

6757. What powers of taxation would you give to the elected majorities?—Their powers of taxation? Of course you would want to take the Provinces——

6758. I am thinking of the Provinces?—The Provincial powers of taxation would be limited to what has been proposed in the Joint Report, but there would be certain matters, such as an extra cess on the Land Revenue, and so forth, in which the Provinces might act by themselves, and there would be other matters which might affect Imperial Revenues in which they would have to go up to the Government of India.

6759. If the majority in the Legislative Council decided on increasing taxation, that taxation would go through unless the Governor decided that it was impolitic or undesirable that the additional taxation should be imposed.—It is proposed in the Bill, surely, that any additional increase of taxation or additional charges must be moved by a Member of the Government, so that I submit no private member could move for extra taxation.

6760. Of course, a popular Minister, whether you call him a Member of the Government or not, would have that power, would he not?—The idea of the Joint Report, which is mine also, was that the Government should act together in these matters; the two wings would act together; there would be what the Governor considered necessary provision for reserved subjects, and then you would get to the transferred subjects over which the larger demands for expenditure generally arise, and the Provincial Cabinet would have to consider whether they could get along as they were, which would depend on whether they had large balances to draw on; or whether they would go in for taxation. But if I may say so here, it seems to me that the separate purse system is based on the fallacy that everybody will want to rush into taxation and that the Members of the Executive Government as opposed to the Ministers will say "we do not care a blow for education, sanitation, and so on; we must have our full provision for our reserved subjects." Taxation, as you know, Sir, is a very awkward matter to take up in an Oriental country, and I think that no Government would take up taxation unless they thought it absolutely necessary; and as for the reserved and transferred subjects, the members of the bureaucratic wing of the Government are also interested in education and sanitation, and would be very glad to promote them.

6761. In municipalities controlled by election, is there not often a great reluctance to increase rates, even when the municipality requirements demand it?—Very much so.

6762. Do you think that the popular Minister and the elected majorities would impose increased taxation in a way generally understood by the public at large, and finally responsible for it?—I think that the danger would be not that taxation would be imposed unduly, but the other way round, that people would not have the courage, as the outset at any rate, to impose taxation when it might really be justified.

6763. Do you think that for many years the new electorates, which are very large and largely illiterate, would be able to discriminate between the action of the popular Minister and the action of what is called the official Minister?—Not at the very outset, perhaps; but I think the intelligent element among them would soon learn.

6764. I see that the Government of India proposes to retain the well-known phrase, "Governor in Council." Will that be strictly applicable when the half of the Council may strongly disapprove of what the Governor does in his capacity as Governor in Council?—It is perhaps not a very happy nomenclature for the new state of things, when part of the Government will consist of people outside the Council; but still, unless somebody can think of a better one, it is there.

6765. It may lead ultimately to the dropping of the phrase altogether under the new conditions?—One would hope that by the time they had got to consider a re-christening they might be getting on to a stage at which this dual system would become unnecessary.

6766. May it not be that the general trend of these reforms in practice will be either to diminish the authority of the Governor or to force him to exercise much more authority than he has ever wielded in the past by his veto?—I should say that the general trend would be to increase the personal weight of the Governor.

6767. Will not the question of which of these tendencies prevails depend very largely on the personal characteristics of the Governor?—Undoubtedly; but you might say that that element would be important under any system.

6768. Then would it not be to some extent a matter of chance, as Governors change rapidly, and may not that produce instability in the working of the new constitution, if it depends so much upon the personality of one man?—The Secretary of State would have to be very careful in giving his advice to His Majesty as to the Governor to be appointed, but I think that the additional responsibilities thrown on the Governor would, even in the case of an untried man, tend to develop character.

6769. I think you wish to keep industries for a time as a reserved subject in the Provinces?—Yes.

6770. You also wish the Government, I suppose the Provincial and the Central Government, to take a hand in the development of industries?—Yes, I think it essential at the beginning, with these new departures proposed, that the Central Government should have a good deal to say to it.

6771. You know that we are constantly accused of doing India injustice in our own interests. Do you know of any restrictions on Indian enterprise, or where any individual is found to have adequate business knowledge and organising power, is there any restriction to prevent him starting business?—No.

6772. Has not the mill industry of Bombay passed almost entirely into Indian hands?—It has.

6773. Has not the Government always encouraged sound Indian enterprises, even although it has not at present put public money into them?—It has encouraged them in the abstract, but the Indian feeling is that it might have done a good deal more; and the Indian feeling again (I do not pronounce as to its rightness or otherwise, but I am giving it as I understand it to exist) is that where Indian and English economic interests come into collision there may be a tendency at home to give it in favour of the home interest.

6774. Do not the existing British-managed industries in India attract a very large amount of Indian capital?—I do not know about a very large amount—it would depend upon the particular industry—but, speaking generally, there is a good deal of Indian capital invested.

6775. Has not Indian capital sometimes shown shyness in lending itself to Indian-managed industries?—That depends on the industry. There has been no difficulty on the part of the great Indian firm of Tata and Sons in getting the capital they required.

6776. I suppose you know that they got capital for the Hydro-Electric Company entirely because of a certain speech I made; they got it within a week after that?—They ought to be very grateful to you.

6777. At the Congress meeting last year, in Bombay, the President said this: "When the transference of rule from the Company to the Crown took place the greed of wealth and the lust of power abated not one jot in the inheritors, the only difference being that tyranny became systematised and plunder became scientific. (Loud cheers.) The people know it, they feel it, and they are asking for a reparation for the incidents of the past. (Continued cheering.)" Is not that a gross libel, not only on the Government of India, but on the Parliament of this country?—Absolutely.

6778. You are aware that statements of that kind, including certain allegations that we are responsible for famine and epidemic, are often used as the basis of the demand for Home Rule?—Yes, but I do not think India is unique in that. I have seen some rather wild speeches by English politicians on the subject of things which they demand.

6779. The meaning of it is that under a purely Indian Government, under Home Rule, an immense increase of prosperity and progress would take place. Do you gather from your experience that those expectations are likely to be realised?—I think in every big political reform—for instance, in the first Reform Bill here in 1832—there is a tendency to make the people believe that a new heaven and a new earth will follow, but it does not; things go on very much as they did before.

6780. If all that the Home Rulers are now demanding and are holding out as their promises to the people—that is, an enormous increase in educational, a very large development of irrigation, and an enormous expenditure upon sanitation—do you think that all that must depend upon either economies in the present administrative expenses or on a great increase of taxation, or, of course, upon administrative capacity infinitely superior to what there has been in the past? In the first case, do you think any great retrenchment in existing expenditure in administration can be arrived at?—I do not—I think what one generally learns is that the more democratic a country gets the more extravagant it is.

6781. I suppose you also think that it is not easy to impose any great increase of taxation upon India at the present time?—No, it is a thing one has to be very careful about, but the Indian politician says, "You have to be very careful, because you belong to an alien race. We could impose taxation much more easily."

6782. Do you think import duties will provide the large increase of revenue which the Home Rulers require to carry out their policy without injuring the interests of the consumers of India?—In the first place, a scheme of import duties would be Imperial, and it would require to be set on foot by the Government of India; but, apart from that, I do not think that under any rational system of finance you could get the money straight away that the Home Rulers talk about. That is one of the reasons, is it not, for trying to make these people responsible instead of being able to shout loudly about things they do not know?

6783. Presuming that the fiscal control—which, as you know, is demanded—were granted, do you think that, even with fiscal control, such sums could be got as would fulfil all these large new reforms?—Not by itself, certainly.

6784. You have seen an estimate of the cost of the proposed reforms; do you think it covers the whole ground?—Which estimate do you speak of?

6785. The estimate which has been circulated of the cost of the reform proposals?—I have not seen that.

6786. One more question. I think you are particularly anxious for the establishment of a Parliamentary Committee on Indian affairs: What duties and powers would you impose upon that Parliamentary Committee?—It is, perhaps, a little presumptuous that a man outside Parliament should suggest things to those who are inside, but, speaking generally, one would say that they would have Indian Bills referred to them, and that the Secretary of State would keep them informed on questions relating to the Administration; and one advantage which, it seems to me, would accrue is that there are constant questions now asked in the House of Commons about India, some of them with very little real knowledge at the back of them; and one would think that a Committee of this sort might "shroff"—as we say in India—or analyse these questions, and get a better residuum; because so long as members of Parliament can ask questions about anything and everything relating to India you will find it rather difficult gradually to relax Parliamentary control.

6787. You think that it would be possible to prevent the asking of questions in Parliament, because of the existence of this Committee: do you think Parliament would submit to that?—I think it would depend upon the sweet reasonableness of the members of the House of Commons.

Sir J. D. Rees.

6788. Sir William, in your answer to Question No. 1, and in your answer to Question No. 11, you refer to the necessity, in your opinion, for introducing some responsible government into the Central Government, and to the risk of the idea spreading that it is not intended to popularise it, unless something is done at once. I want to ask whether you consider that it is not practically popularised by the changes proposed to be introduced into the Provincial Government, inasmuch as the Government of India is a factor in the administration of all India, the Provinces included?—The idea of the Reform Scheme is that the control of the Government of India over all Provincial subjects should be very largely relaxed, but at the same time there is to be a pretty clear line of demarcation between the functions of the Central Government and those of the Provincial Government, and the functions of the Central Government include many things, such as income-tax, for example, and stamps which the Indian politicians say they ought to have some popular control over.

6789. In so far as the control of the Government of India is relaxed, as you have just said, does not that mean its being popularised?—In one group of subjects, the subjects to be transferred to the Provinces, you may say that the things are popularised by being made over to Provincial Ministers, and so on, but that does not affect the group of subjects which the Government of India will keep as part of the Central Government.

6790. Upon that, would you say that in regard to the transferred subjects, which are roughly half, it is popularised or would you not?—That half being the transferred subjects?

6791. As regards the transferred subjects, is not the Government of India popularised insomuch as it is transferred to a Government in which there is a popular element of control?—We are using the term Government of India in two different connotations; you mean, when you say the Government of India is popularised, the Government in India is popularised because you take the Provincial Governments in. When I said that some beginning ought to be considered five or six years hence with the popularising of the Government of India, I meant the Central Government.

6792. Well, the Government of India is in some sense the Government in India; you can hardly altogether distinguish them?—In the old days the Provincial Governments were the agents of the Government of India, just as the Government of India in its turn was the agent of the Secretary of State, and the idea now is to change all that.

6793. In your answer to Questions 7 and 8, you indicate that you think Governors from England should be sent out to all the great Provinces; is that so?—Well, that should be the general system, but I follow the Joint Report in looking to an Indian civilian being made Governor when it was thought he was distinctly the best man for it.

6794. Would continuing the present system of appointing Civil Servants to Governorships of the Great Provinces make the introduction of these reforms and their working very difficult, or more difficult?—I think the dual system, with the two wings of the Government, and the Governor sitting as arbiter between them, would be more easily worked if he were regarded as an impartial arbiter from outside, rather than as a man who perhaps might have come himself from the Executive wing.

6795. In your answer to No. 17 you say: "Subject to the suggestions made above, power should be taken to enable further devolution to popular control in the Provincial Governments, and a beginning of this in the Government of India at an earlier date than that prescribed by Clause 28." What period have you in mind—something shorter than 10 years?—As I said in the answers to these questions, I adhere to what was originally said in the Joint Report—that after five or six years the Government of India, with the concurrence of the Secretary of State, might have power to alter the transferred subjects in the Provinces, and then I added on my own account (that was not in the Joint Report) that I thought that about the same time it might be considered whether you should not make over certain subjects under the Government of India itself to more popular control.

6796. In your answer to 19 (c) you say: "For the sake of peace and co-operation between Brahmins and non-Brahmins in Madras I would, if the non-Brahmins will accept this as a satisfactory settlement, follow the proposal in Paragraph 26 of the Government of India's Despatch of the 23rd April, 1919, that a certain proportion of seats in plural constituencies would be reserved for non-Brahmins." Are you willing to have as large a proportion as 50 per cent. reserved in that behalf?—Considering the great numerical predominance of the non-Brahmins, I do not think it would be unreasonable.

6797. Do you find that there is a diversity of interest between Brahmins and others?—I think there has been always a certain amount of caste jealousy in Madras. You may remember that in the Standing Orders of the Board of Revenue, for instance, it used to be laid down that the two principal ministerial officers of the Collector should be of different castes; and I remember about 20 years ago there was an acute feeling in a great educational institution in Madras—Pachaiyappa's College, a non-official Hindoo college—between non-Brahmins and Brahmins.

6798. What you say, when I ask if there is diversity of interest, is that you refer to a certain caste jealousy; but would you say there was a real diversity of interests between the Brahmins and others? Can you divide them in that way?—In those days the interests were gauged chiefly by the appointments, and over that there was a certain amount of jealousy, but I take it that the non-Brahmin attitude at present may be put something in this way: "In the old days we could look to the Government to help us. Now the Government is going to abdicate very largely, and we shall be at the mercy of the Brahmins." I do not associate myself with that view, but it is the view that a lot of non-Brahmins do, I think, honestly take.

6799. Do you not recognise that the most intelligent should have the majority of the appointments? Is it not a competition?—I think you have got to qualify that; if you have got the intelligent very much of one section of the population, there would be some jealousy on the part of the others.

6800. In your answer with regard to the Functions Committee, under Question 19 on the last page, you want to reserve a certain amount of control. You say: "I also agree with Paragraphs 116 to 120 as to the desirability in present circumstances of reserving a certain amount of control and initiative in respect of industrial development to the Central Government, and of keeping industries at the outset as a reserved subject in the Provinces." Do you not think that reserving that control to the Central Government will be exceedingly unpopular in Madras, for instance, and that they will resent it?—I am afraid they may resent it, but you have got to start a very new experiment; you are to depart from the old laissez faire attitude. There is not so very much money to spend, and you have got to see that that money is laid out to the best advantage, and you have also to guard against Provincial particularism.

6801. Evidence has been given about the wrangle which will happen if there is a single pool, and that you think that wrangle would be very serious, but would it be so different from what used to happen—

the wrangle over the allocation of the contributions to the Government of India by the Provinces?—Under the Joint Purse system?

6802. Yes?—Not a bit. There is always in every Government a bit of a wrangle when the Budget time comes round. There are the collective demands of the various Departments to be met out of what can be spared, and there is a little jostle as to which shall get their hand into the purse first.

6803. You spoke of the growth of nationalism somewhere in your evidence; do you think that Madras has less a taste and less desire for democratic advance than other Provinces, so far as you know?—No, I should think Madras has been more captured by the extremists than most Provinces.

6804. Would the adoption of this scheme—this being a matter of which you would have special knowledge—tend to prejudice—Lord Sydenham touched upon this, but I did not quite understand whether you thought the adoption of this scheme would prejudice the employment of British capital in India or commerce in general?—Not a bit.

6805. Would it tend, on the other hand, possibly to bring out the hoards of which we hear so much?—If the hoards come out—it is always a moot question what the extent of the hoards is, but if they come out—it will be owing to the development of commercial and banking ideas, rather than any particular political departure.

6806. Would it affect the position of the Soukar who finances the ryot, or would it help him?—I think the relation of the Soukar to the ryot is much more determined, or will be, by the progress of the co-operative credit movement.

6807. And this will not affect it particularly one way or the other?—No.

6808. Reference has been made on the Franchise question to the illiteracy of the population; did you consider the ryot, as you knew him in your early days in camp, as a person capable or not capable of judging what is to his own interests and which candidate would be most likely to serve those interests?—I found him quite capable of judging of his own interests in the matter of cultivation or a village well, and things of that sort, and if you had a system of village councils he would be quite capable of judging of those, but it would take a little time to make him a good judge of the relative merits of A and B for the Provincial Council, and still more for the Imperial.

6809. At the same time, did you notice any signs of oppression of the lower castes or classes by the upper classes generally in the villages of the country?—In parts of the country, in Tanjore, for example, you had the Padyals, who were largely serfs at the beginning, and there was individually some oppression of them by the landlords.

6811. Would not the appointment of a second official member possibly tend to impair the position of the Governor, as being the arbiter under the new system? Might it not represent him as being in leading-strings?—Are you suggesting the policy of two Europeans and one Indian in the Executive Council?

6812. The Government of India, while accepting one member as the normal thing, would prefer to see a second official member of Council attached in the event of the Governor being a stranger to India?—I think, in the first place, if there were to be two European officials and one Indian only, Indians would say this was over-weighting the European element, and if there were two Europeans and two Indians I should say it was pure waste.

6814. If a Provincial Governor, such as the Madras Governor, were asked for his opinion on any matter in your time when you were Under-Secretary, was it understood in the Madras Secretariat, or by the Madras Government, that that meant the individual opinion of the members of the Government, without regard to the public opinion so far as they knew it or had any means of ascertaining it?—I think in the days when I was Under-Secretary most of the references were treated as departmental bureaucratic references, but there might be cases in which the public was involved. There was, for instance, the Ilbert Bill agitation, but most questions were such as in those days were not deemed to be of very much concern to the outside public.

6815. But now when matters other than political matters are concerned, would that be the view taken in the Secretariat?—I think certainly; for instance, when I was Finance Member and making references to the local Governments about financial or currency questions one generally asked them to consult their Chambers of Commerce and other non-official persons whose opinion would be valuable, and they would do the same in other departments. The tendency is certainly greater nowadays to call outside people into informal consultation.

6816. Sir William, Lord Sydenham, asked you some questions about the position of our Dominion Governments, and stated, I think, that in all known cases it had taken place per saltum, and not gradually. In one sense every transfer of the kind must proceed per saltum, must it not, in the sense that the time comes when somebody has the last word, and if you change the possession of that last word the complete change has taken place?—Yes, technically the complete change has taken place, but you may have been working up to it, of course.

6817. Do you know anything about the various constitutions of the very different administrations which are lumped together under the name of Crown Colonies and Protectorates?—Not very much. I had an opportunity of studying the Philippine constitution when I was in the Philippines a few months ago, and one has read, sometimes, about deadlocks which have arisen in Jamaica, Malta, and so on; but I do not profess to be any authority on Crown Colony constitution.

6818. You know, I daresay, that those constitutions vary immensely in the degree of power which is possessed by the representative assemblies in different colonies?—Quite.

6819. There are some, for instance, where the power of the bodies is absolutely in the hands of the Assembly, even although it be called a Crown Colony and not a Dominion?—I did not know they had gone quite so far as that.

6820. There are one or two in which that is the case. Therefore you would be rather afraid of proceeding gradually, although it is on an entirely new path, by this principle of divided control, or what is called diarchy. As regards the Government of India, you think with the power left a somewhat similar step ought to be taken in dividing control in the Government of India itself?—I think so.

6821. Do you think there would be any risk in announcing now that in five or six years—which is the period you mentioned—some such step would be taken? And I ask you that question, if it is found desirable to make a change so shortly, might it not be better to make it at once?—I said, in my preliminary answer, that after five or six years the question should be considered; and I said that by that time we should have very valuable experience of the results of what had been done in the Provinces. It might be that the system—I hope it will not be so—had worked unsatisfactorily in the Provinces, and in that case you would not want to extend it to the Central Government; but anyhow to extend it at once seems to me to be taking too much of a leap.

6822. Do you think the Provincial analogy would supply, in fact, enough material to enable you to make a change within that short time?—I think the chief criticisms are that you are conducting a composite Government, and that the Ministers will not get on along with the Council members, and vice versa, and that there will be confusion and friction. All that can be tested, I think, in five or six years.

6823. In the meantime, as we have already heard from various quarters, there is a strong feeling, I gather, that something more ought to be done now to the Central Government?—There is strong feeling; but I think that feeling would be to a certain extent satisfied by a definite promise that within a few years you would take up the question of the Central Government. What the people who have expressed that feeling now hold is that there is no definite pledge that after a few years the powers that be will take up the Central Government at all.

6824. Do you think that would best be done by a Commission of Inquiry on the spot, such as is foreshadowed in the Joint Report?—I do not think it would be necessary to have a commission for that; the Government of India could thresh it out with the Secretary of State, and rules, I suppose, could be put upon the tables of both Houses. I daresay a Select Committee on Indian affairs might help, too.

6825. It might require another Bill, of course?—It might.

6826. If there was to be any extended transfer?—I, personally, should like to see this Bill so framed as to admit of it without having to go to Parliament for fresh legislation.

6827. You think that it should be done by Regulations, presumably laid on the tables of both Houses, and with the acquiescence and consent of Parliament, although without the long operation of a Parliamentary Bill?—That is so.

6828. You mentioned a Parliamentary Committee, which I understand you favour; you favour a Joint Committee of both Houses?—Yes.

6829. You know that the argument which weighed with the Committee—of which I was Chairman—was the precise opposite to that which you used in reply to Lord Sydenham's question, namely, that the continued existence of such a Committee would be apt to encourage excessive interference with Indian affairs, rather than as I understand you to argue, that it would tend to the discouragement of vague and casual questions by Members of Parliament?—It is my view that you would have the criticism more informing, and one would hope that the transition period would not last long enough to enable the Select Committee to develop traditions of administrative usurpation. This always takes a certain time.

6830. You think it would be content to do that as the further advance proceeds towards responsible government, because obviously where responsible government exists or anything like it, Parliamentary interference tends to diminish?—Yes; if and when the time came at which India could get complete self-government, Parliament would remain theoretically controlling, as it does in Canada and the Dominions, but as a matter of practical convention India would secure the government for herself.

6831. Nobody has ever suggested forming a Canadian Committee, for instance?—No, but at the time of the Durham Report, for instance, that might have been useful.

6832. Therefore, I am to understand that the argument is, that 20 or 30 years ago this Committee might have done extremely valuable work, but it is slightly belated?—I see the point, but I reply to that, that the bulk of Indian opinion seems to be in favour of it, so why not give it to them?

6833. As regards the Home industries; I see you generally favour the suggestions put forward by Sir James Brunyate in his memorandum?—Yes.

6834. That involves the continued existence of the Council, with the creation of something of the diarchical system as between the Council and the Secretary of State in Council and the Government of India?—I do not quite follow the diarchical system. It would be the present system, would it not?

6835. It would be the present system, but with an agreement not to deal with a great number of subjects with which the Council deals at present?—That is so.

6836. It would practically be a division into reserved and transferred subjects?—The Council would have to restrict its field of operations, certainly.

6837. And that would have to be done by rules, I suppose?—I take it so.

6838. If that were done, would you favour the retention of the present Council with its powers, rather that that the creation, which was recommended of a purely advisory body?—I think so. I think the Council looks better, if I may say so; it tells more in the public eye.

6839. Which public eye?—The public eye of India, and the public eye of those in England who are interested in Indian affairs. There is always a feeling, among the latter especially, that you might have a new Secretary of State, who is rather swept away by impulses and has not enough administrative experience to draw from.

6840. That is an argument for the retention of the Council and against its complete abolition, whereas, as you know, its abolition is the goal and desire of a large body of Indian opinion?—They want it abolished in order that they may reign in its place, but as long as you have a considerable amount of bureaucratic government in India, you must have control at the India Office, and it is merely a question whether you will have the control by the Secretary of State sole, or by the Secretary of State with a Council.

6841. But there is still this choice, is there not, between the Council, with its present statutory powers, including that of complete technical veto, if it chooses to exercise it, and an advisory body composed of very much the same people, but not able to have its way in the last resort?—I think it was some Irishman who said that the beauty of an advisory body was that you never needed to take their advice, and a rather autocratic Secretary of State might get into that position, and say: "It is very nice of you to offer this advice, but I am not bound to take it."

6842. You know that it is pledged to meet twice a week all the year round?—That might be altered. As for the veto on expenditure, Sir James Brunyate was not particularly keen on keeping that up, and I am not specially keen either. It does occur to me, however, that although it is never actually exercised, it might be useful when there is pressure put on the India Office by the War Office or some other Department of the Home Government for the Secretary of State to be able to say: "I could not get this through my Council, you know."

6843. You mean that the Secretary of State might retreat behind the bulwark of his Council?—Yes, which is very useful sometimes.

Sir Henry Craik.

6844. You contemplate, Sir William, I think, that the ultimate goal should be responsible Government on the model of the Dominions?—Yes.

6845. You agree in accepting the declaration of the 20th of August, 1917; you accept that in full, but you do not agree with those who would count as a subordinate and negligible part that the British Government must not be the judges of the time and measure of each advance?—No, I fully concur with the declaration of August, 1917.

6846. You are aware that there has been some expression of opinion contrary to this latter part of the declaration; to that you do not attach much importance?—No, I think the British Government is the trustee, and must decide when to make over its powers.

6847. Do you think you can find a comparable analogy between the Dominions, which are entirely British, composed of all parts of the British race, and a country like India?—Of course the position is very different in many things. Still, the Dominions are not entirely homogeneous; you have got English and French, and immigrants of other nationalities, in Canada, you have British and Dutch in South Africa, and so on.

6848. Surely the bulk of our Colonies are parts of our nation and our race?—They are.

6849. Do you think it would be possible to have responsible Government in a race divided from ours as India is, and yet to make sure that the bond with the British Empire would be preserved at all?—The view of British statesmen of the Victorian era, like Macaulay and so on, was that the time would come at which India would be fit for self-government, and that when that time came she should not be retained unwillingly; but I think, in the present state of world politics at any rate, that most Indians realise, that they cannot stand alone, and that if we were to walk out somebody else might walk in.

6850. You are thinking of two things; you state that Macaulay and many of his contemporaries had the idea that India might some day pass away altogether from the British Empire and go alone?—Yes.

6851. Then you very quickly changed Macaulay and his contemporaries and substituted the Indian people; but is it possible to suppose that the Indian people might not if they had government on the model of Dominions, insist upon separation?—Conceivably they might.

6852. Is it in the least probable that they would not?—I think that to-day there is a certain Far Eastern power which they regard with very considerable apprehension, and the feeling, I know, among many of them who are reckoned extremists, is that it is far better to have the British connection than that.

6853. You think there might be grounds on arguments of expediency which might render it necessary in their minds to retain that connection?—It would be very largely expediency, because, as you have brought out just now, there is not the sentimental tie of blood.

6854. Passing from that, you look to the dual system as a pathway which will lead to responsible government?—Yes.

6855. Is not the best way to make that a clear line of attaining to responsible government to make the Ministers responsible for that part of the government which is placed in their charge?—But that will follow from the dual scheme, will it not?

6856. Why? You are going to have a Government joined together in which you know there will be two divergent tendencies?—Yes; there will be the two wings, as you say, the Ministers' wing dealing with the transferred subjects, and the Executive Council wing dealing with the reserved subjects, and above both will be the Governor. And I say, as regards the transferred subjects, the Governor would ordinarily defer to the advice of his Ministers, although he might occasionally have to over-rule them. Similarly, in the case of the reserved subjects, he would ordinarily defer to the advice of his Executive Councillors, although he might sometimes have to over-rule them. The advantage of consulting together is that there are many points, of course, in which reserved and transferred subjects will touch each other, and where the Ministers and the Councillors will get a better knowledge of each other's difficulties.

6857. Will it not diminish and separate the individual responsibility of the Ministers?—I do not think it would do so unduly.

6858. I do not wish to pursue that further. I am just asking your opinion?—Remember that you are starting from no responsibility at all.

6859. At present they have none?—Yes.

6860. If you are to create and strengthen that responsibility, is not the financial element the very first element in it, and if you are to take that responsibility, is it not better brought about by the separate purse?—I do not think so, because that will lead to constant bickerings.

6861. How can you help bickerings, and what harm would they do if they only represent a real divergence of opinion? Why should you try to prevent them?—The argument put forward by the Government of India in favour of the separate purse is that it would diminish friction. There would always be a contest under the joint-purse system as to who should get most out of the pool. My answer to that is that you will have even more friction under the separate purse, because whatever friction is going will be reflected in the Legislative Council with increasing force on the ground that the allotment is not fair to the transferred subjects, and you would have very much more difficulty if the Minister had to come and ask for taxation for the transferred subjects while the reserved portion of the Government were basking in a surplus.

6863. You are against it?—I say these fights, as you put it, round a table will often be quite friendly, just as Budget discussions have been in the Government of India, the Cabinet Budget discussions, I mean.

6864. I pass from that. In one part of your evidence you speak of the representation of the non-Brahmin and other interests. I do not quite understand, and I ask solely to get the information, whether you are in favour of doing this by reserved seats or by communal representation?—I would not have communal representation because it seems to be a mockery to give communal representation for a huge majority of the population. These non-Brahmins are in a great majority; in the electorates they would be, at any rate, four or five to one is compared with the Brahmins, and to say that they must be treated communally as a minority seems to me to be rather absurd; but as they profess themselves very frightened that the Brahmins, with their superior inherent ability, will get most of the seats, I would not at all object, if it would satisfy the non-Brahmins, to say, "We will have plural constituencies, and say there are six seats going, three shall go to non-Brahmins."

6865. You would allow the communal representation as regards other interests, Mussulmans, for instance?—Yes.

6866. But for the others you think the reserved seats would be better?—Yes.

6867. You say that you disagree with the view of the Government of India with regard to the operation of University seats. What are those University seats, as they are called in the Bill?—At present they are rather close boroughs.

6868. Are they really University representation at all in the proper sense of the word? Does it not really mean that you are to represent a small governing body of nominated persons?—The present men are elected by the Senates, which are relatively small bodies, and I should not myself object to widening the franchise and giving the vote to all masters of arts and bachelors of, say, five years' standing.

6869. Would any University representation in this country that did not at least include that be listened to for a moment?—No.

6870. We would never give University representation to the governing bodies of Universities?—No, but still nowadays you rather favour University representation in that wider sense. The last Reform Bill——

6871. But not in a case of this sort; it seems to me to be a perfect farce?—I would like my answer to your previous question to be read along with my preliminary replies, and when I say I favour University seats I mean University seats which have a real constituency behind them.

6872. Which these do not?—I admit they do not, but they have been useful in time past.

6873. With regard to education, you say that you want the whole of the education transferred?—I cannot find any clear line of demarcation. I am like the Functions Committee.

6874. Do you think the same principles and the same qualities are required for administering University and primary education?—The teaching of primary classes and lecturing to University classes are, of course, very different things.

6875. I am not talking of teaching primary classes and lecturing to University classes. I am speaking of administering primary education and holding a proper relation to the government of the Universities. That has nothing to do with teaching, and surely they require very different qualities?—Still, there is a connected staircase. There was, I think, an Education Committee in the United Provinces some time ago, and they found that the University education was unsatisfactory, because of the inadequate way in which the boys were sent up by the high schools, and in turn the high schools complained of the middle schools until you got back to the primary.

6876. You would not think that we ought to contemplate the administration of the whole of education as one thing, University and primary schools, in this country?—No, but you have it all under one Department.

6877. The Education Department has no hold over my University?—I accept the correction as regards Universities, but the tendency is, is it not, to put the mantle of the State over Universities also?

6878. I am very sorry to hear it indeed?——

Mr. Montagu.

6879. I would like to repeat to you a question which I asked Sir Claud Hill when he was in that chair. In the Government of India letter, dated the 5th March, 1919, occurs this sentence, "The members of the Government of India were indeed kept in close touch with the deliberations, and no important conclusions were arrived at without reference to them." That refers to the Montagu-Chelmsford Report?—Yes.

6880. With the exception of that part of the Report which deals with the Native States, was not every proposal discussed with the Government of India?—Repeatedly; there were numbers of proposals discussed and some emerged.

6881. Were not the proposals under discussion repeatedly modified in order to get unanimity?—So repeatedly modified that the position sometimes got a little bewildering.

6882. At that time—things have varied since—the Government of India was in general accord with the decisions which had been taken?—Speaking for myself, I should emphatically answer, Yes, and I think one may say that the Government of India as a whole was in general accord.

6883. Since then, after reviewing the working of the system and the criticisms which have reached them they have come to the conclusion that there should be certain modifications in the scheme, and perhaps the most important of them are the proposals for the separate purse and the proposals for the modification in the composition of the Grand Committee. May I ask a few questions about both of those? It is conceivable, is it not, that under the joint purse system the two wings of the Government would find themselves incapable of coming to an amicable agreement, and might always find each other unreasonable on the Budget statement?—It is possible.

6884. It has been suggested that a joint purse might be inaugurated, and if that position of affairs became intolerable in any Province, as two people who said: "Well, we cannot agree; let us submit to arbitration in order to get this thing settled one way or another," is that an addition to the scheme which would find favour in your eyes?—Under the joint purse scheme, on the hypothesis you mention, the final decision falls on the Governor, he has to decide, and if the Governor were to come to you and say: "The position is really intolerable, because I cannot get my two wings to agree, do let us have a separate purse," it would be worth considering, but I would not do it unless the joint purse proved a practical failure.

6885. What would happen under the Joint Purse System if increased expenditure was required for the reserved services, and the Ministers refused to submit to the Legislative Council proposals for new taxation?—It would be their own loss, because the reserved subjects have priority, if necessary, under the joint scheme, and if the Governor was convinced that this additional expenditure was necessary for some reserved subject, say, Police, he would say: "We can't cut this down, and if you Ministers will not tax you must consent to the cutting down of the sums which would otherwise be at your disposal."

6886. I hope you will acquit me of expressing any views of my own, but I am just trying to get the benefit of your experience in answering some of the objections that have been raised. May I put this case to you. Supposing there was no balance to the credit of the transferred subjects, supposing, that is to say, they had no surplus, and supposing the position of affairs I have suggested had arisen, is it certain that the reserved half of the Government could take any part of the transferred subjects funds. They could not, for instance, leave people without salaries, and they could not close down schools, could they, practically?—It would be difficult, certainly, but I think, if I my say so, that is an extreme case, and what really would happen would be that they would not be able to get on with development, especially under education, I would say. Normally the provincial revenues are expanding revenues unless some unforeseen incident like a famine occurs, and that is much less serious in its effects now than formerly. It is not so much a question of cutting down expenditure that has already been sanctioned, as of allocating the growing surplus.

6887. So that on the whole you think the system as it stands is the best system?—As proposed in the Bill, certainly it is the most effectual 6888. I think the general trend of your argument, if I do not state it unfairly, is that diarchy has a better chance of working the more united you can make the two halves of the Government?—Yes.

6889. Do you know any subjects for which joint deliberation would be a mistake?—I cannot think of any. Of course you distinguish between joint deliberation and final responsibility?

6890. Yes?—I can conceive no subjects in the Provincial Governments in which it would not be to the advantage of either wing of the Government to have the views of the other wing.

6891. The final responsibility, I suppose, you would distinguish in order to get the electorate to learn ultimately where the responsibility lies?—Yes.

6892. You have been questioned as to whether you are not shocked by the fact, or whether you are not impressed by the fact, I should say, that there is nothing like this system in any other country, and it was suggested that we were going into an unknown experiment. May I put this question to you: Of the two experiments you might try in the Provinces, diarchy or complete responsible government, which exists as you are aware, in many other countries, which would you regard as the more risky experiment?—Under present circumstances the latter, complete responsible government.

6893. So you are less afraid of the novel than the familiar in this particular instance?—Yes.

6894. The next point of great importance which the Government of India make is the suggestion that they make for altering the composition of Grand Committee. Would you give me your opinion of the avowed lack of water-tightness, if I may use that expression, in the Grand Committee as it is constituted in the Report?—I do not quite follow the expression lack of watertightness. I might, perhaps, explain that I do not know quite what the Government of India proposals to which you are referring are.

6895. It has been much criticised in this Committee that the Local Government would have no certainty of getting its reserved legislation through the Grand Committee as proposed to be constituted, because of the fact that they would have to get the support of the seven members that the Government nominated?—I should say if they cannot do that there is probably a prima facie case for thinking that the legislation is not required.

6896. You would not give, then, a Provincial Government the power to get legislation through in face of the opposition of all the non-official members of the Legislative Council?—No.

6897. You see no necessity for that?—The only case in which I can conceive that might be reluctantly taken up would be if the country were in a state of serious disorder, and then there is the Governor-General's power of Ordinance.

6898. Would you give the Governor the power of ordinance?—I do not see that it is necessary to arm him with fresh powers.

6899. The Government has never been secure of getting fresh legislation since the Morley-Minto scheme?—No.

6900. And you do not see where it could be made use of now?—No, it has always got to take a certain amount of risk.

6901. Now I go from the Grand Committee to the Council of State. The Council of State is watertight, by which I mean there is an official majority which gives the Government of India a certainty of getting its legislation. Do you like that part of the scheme, or have you any observations to make upon it?—I think it is necessary at present, because you are not going to democratise the Government of India ab initio, and that being so, the Government of India must have the power to get through its legislation. It has that power in the existing Legislative Council; you are going to take away that power by the constitution of the Legislative Council, of which two-thirds would be elected, and therefore you must have a reserved body of much the same composition as the present Council in which the Government of India can get essential Bills through.

6902. What about an Ordinance as contrasted with that form of legislation?—There is all the difference in the world; an Ordinance is an autocratic act of the Government. There is no necessary discussion on it, whereas in the Council of State a Bill will be put forward, there will be a Select Committee, there will be discussion and debate and amendments, and very often, as happens at present, the Government may find that it is advisable to accept some of the amendments. That would not arise at all in the case of Ordinances.

6903. What about an ordinance after discussion?—After discussion in the Legislative Assembly? I think the Legislative Assembly would at once, like Oliver Twist, ask for "more"; it would say "you have allowed us discussion, but not allowed us to vote; you pass the Bill over our heads."

6904. Is not that what you do, in fact, on the Council of State proposal?—There you switch it off to another body in which the non-officials are to a certain extent represented.

6905. My last question is this: What do you think would be the effect of those proposals if they become law, on the Civil Service? It is suggested that it will be very prejudicial to recruiting, and it is also suggested that many of the Civil servants would prefer to leave India when these reforms become law? What is your view on both those propositions?—I think the Civil servant of the future will have very large fields of power; he will not rule so openly as he does now; but he will have very great influence as a permanent Civil servant. In the districts he will retain his position very largely. I was talking only yesterday to an old friend, who had been a civilian in his time, who asked me about his grandson; he said that his grandson rather wanted to get into the Indian Civil Service, and would I advise his going, and I said "most certainly. There may be a certain number of men in the present cadre who have got so used to the existing system that they will not readily adapt themselves to the new one, but I think they will be the minority, and that the younger men will prove themselves quite adaptable.

6906. It is said that a large number of ex-civil servants and civil servants want to leave, and would, if they were asked, give precisely the opposite advice to a grandson or a young boy?—Well, that is a matter of opinion; but there has never been a time which I remember at which there was not some "grouse." I remember when I first came out the Statutory Civil Service had just been invented, which permitted of Indians becoming collectors and judges, and one heard the senior civilians of that day say that nothing would induce them to send their sons out to this country, but they came all the same.

Lord Sinha.

6907. In answer to question 11, you emphasise that it is desirable to avoid the risk of the idea spreading that the scheme is not intended to popularise the Central Government for a long time to come. Should you recommend that there should be a promise that that would be taken up after five or six years?—That it should be considered.

6908. With the same object in view, would you be prepared to recommend, or is it your opinion that it would serve the same purpose, if there was an addition to the number of Indian members of the Executive Council of the Viceroy from two to three?—No, I do not like that, because keeping the Government as it stands you are keeping the bureaucratic Government, and at the same time you would be increasing the numbers of people who regard themselves as rather more responsible to the Legislature, say——

6909. Taking

6909. Taking the thing itself, would you think there was any danger in that?—I should rather, as long as you have a bureaucratic Government, let the bureaucratic Government be sure of its majority inside. The two members will represent exactly the same proportion as now obtains in the Provinces.

Lord Islington.

6910. In answer to question 16, you are speaking of Clause 23, and you say that "power should be taken to enable the Secretary of State to transfer control to a larger extent than would be otherwise admissible under the Government of India Act; but I think unless it is more clearly indicated at the outset in what directions it is proposed to decentralise there may be suspicion in India that the Secretary of State is in no hurry to shed any of his existing powers." Do you mean by that that some of these regulations should be embodied in a schedule to the Bill?—I think under Clause 23, as it stands, the Secretary of State in Council can do anything by rule, etc.; but it does not give you any idea of what the scope of the rules is to be. I should be quite satisfied myself to make the position more plain by stating that the Secretary of State shall delegate some of his powers in respect of legislation, administration and finance, the extent to which the delegations were actually made being determined by rules, which might, of course, require modification from time to time.

6911. So that that particular measure would be laid on the table of both Houses of Parliament?—Yes.

6912. Then you say, you think that for some time to come the Government of India should have a considerable control over Provincial industries. We have had witnesses before us who have strongly urged that industries should be handed lock, stock and barrel over to the Provinces?—If I may say so, "Provincial industries" is a question-begging epithet; I say that the industries are Indian industries, whether regulated by the Provincial or the Central Government as a matter of expediency.

6913. You regard them as a central question, although they, of course, must be developed in the Provinces?—They must be developed in one paticular Province, or more than one, but what is present to my mind is that at the outset there would be rather a tendency to Provincial particularism. Perhaps I might give an instance which I think has some bearing on the case. Some years ago the Madras Government were very much perturbed by the fact that Bombay salt was penetrating the western districts of Madras, the reason being that the Bombay salt was light, and salt there was locally sold by measure and not by weight, and it was cutting out the heavier Madras salt. The Government of Madras were greatly perturbed by this, and came up to the Government of India and said: "You must do something, you must make the sale of salt by measure penal," and so on; but the Government of India replied: "Salt is an all-Indian matter; if the people in the Madras district prefer the Bombay salt we are not going to interfere with them; it is open to you to make light salt, too, if you can." That is an instance showing Provincial particularism. and you will get it, I think, unless it is changed, in the Provinces when there is development of industries. A Province will say: "We want to have a match factory," and you may say to them: "There is a match factory in the Province next door; try producing pencils," and their answer might be: "No; that is not the same thing."

6914. You would give the Government of India power to turn that down?—Yes; say that it was Madras that wanted a match factory, and Bombay had one; you would be able to say to Madras: "It would be much better to turn out pencils, or one thing or another; do not bother about matches, because Bombay is producing all you want."

6915. Would you be prepared to give power to the Central Government and to the Central General Assembly over the fiscal policy in India?—I do not see how you could possibly give full control over fiscal policy, involving, as it does, inter-Imperial and international relations, until you have got full self-government in India. As long as the Government of India is mainly bureaucratic, I think the fiscal policy is one of the things the Secretary of State as responsible to Parliament must keep control of; but, of course, that does not prevent his giving as great weight as he can to such representations as the Government of India may make, especially if they are backed by public opinion in India.

6916. Is that a question that you would say is very keenly felt by Indian opinion in India?—There is a considerable cry for fiscal autonomy; but I do not think a lot of the people who raise that cry have thought it out, or that they know exactly what it means, because a number of these very people at the same time say that so long as the Government of India is bureaucratic you must have control by Parliament. The two propositions are incompatible. If you have fiscal autonomy you have practically shaken yourself loose from control by Parliament.

6917. I know whatever fiscal policy is laid down for India, it would have to coincide with the policy decided on for the whole Empire?—If there was an inter-Imperial fiscal policy India would, naturally, have to fall in; but India should be consulted.

6918. I think you say in your answers that you would agree with Sir James Brunyate's Note?—Yes.

6919. Do you also agree as regards his proposals about the future relations of the Secretary of State with the Government of India and the Provinces?—As embodied in his statement, yes, I am in general agreement with those proposals.

6920. That scheme practically proposes the removal of the power of veto from the Government of India, does it not?—Yes.

6921. And transfers it to the Secretary of State?—Yes.

6922. And you generally agree to that?—Yes.

6923. Would you agree to the India Council having a larger Indian representation on it?—It would depend on the size of the Council. If you are going to reduce the present size, I should say that three Indian representatives are enough. If you are going to increase the size, or to keep it to the same size, there might be a case for more.

6924. Would you agree with this, that perhaps there will be 50 per cent. Europeans and 50 per cent. Indians?—I do not think that is necessary. It may come to it eventually, but, after all, what you want to get at the outset, if the Council is to be of real use, is a body of experts to advise the Secretary of State.

6925. But you would like to see a fully adequate Indian representation on it?—Certainly. I would go so far as not less than one-third Indian at present, and I would be prepared to add to that proportion later on if the Council remains in existence; but I am in agreement with Sir James Brunyate in thinking that after 10 or 12 years its existence should be considered.

6926. It should be given consideration. Do you agree with those who suggest that the personnel of that Council in future should be composed of younger men, men in the middle of their career rather than men at the end?—That is rather a difficult position. Of course, in favour of it you may argue that India is changing so rapidly now that the men who have left India tend to get fossilised; but, on the other hand, it seems to me that to bring in men in mid-career is open to considerable objection. You are putting them into a position in which they will be taking part in the highest stage of authority; then you are going to send them back to a stage where they will be much lower; and it seems to me these men, when they come into the India Council, will not have the ripe experience and knowledge of India as a whole that is gained by the men who come from India at present—ex-Lieutenant-Governors and ex-Members of the Viceroy's Council, and so on. On the whole, I think, as long as you make it clear that you will not appoint men unless their Indian service is pretty recent, the present system is better.

6927. You prefer the present system?—Yes.

6928. Would you like to see the staff of the India Office more interchangeable with the service in India?—I think occasional changes would be quite useful.

6929. You have occasional changes now, but it has been suggested to us that it should be extended to a much greater degree?—I do not know that that would be of such great advantage. Each lot would be working ing in a non-familiar atmosphere at the outset, and I think it is just as well to keep them apart, but send picked men over now and then.

6930. As regards the Parliamentary Advisory Committee, you are strongly in favour of that?—Yes.

6931. Composed of Members of both Houses?—Yes, composed of members of both Houses.

6932. Do you see any danger of it becoming the recipient of every kind of agitator's desires and faddist's last wish?—I think, no doubt, you would have copious correspondence from India, but you have also got wastepaper baskets.

6933. You would not look with any apprehension to running the danger of being wrongly advised from India in that connection?—After all, any individual Member of Parliament or individual Peer can now get letters of this sort from India, and some of them may act upon them. I think it would be a greater safeguard for men of that sort to come into the Select Committee and hear how matters really are, very often from their colleagues.

6934. One more word about the Government of India. You are not in favour of democratising the Government of India for the next few years?—No.

6935. You would be prepared to do it in five or six years' time?—I would be prepared to consider it. A great deal would depend on how the experiment had worked out in the Provinces.

6936. Do not you think there would be a danger, even in that short period, with a large elected majority, of the General Assembly becoming a centre of discord?—Do you mean under the existing system?

6937. Yes; giving it a large majority, a two thirds elected majority, and withholding any responsibility from it?—That is why, among other reasons, I want to get a certain measure of responsible Government as soon as possible, but if the spirit of your question is why should not you have it at once, I should say that you are putting too much into the boat, and that you may swamp it if you overload it. It is much better to begin with the Provinces and see how that will work.

6938. That would be putting a lot into two boats?—Well, two boats that are closely linked together.

6939. As regards the electorate of the General Assembly and the Council of State, the members will be drawn as under the proposal, will they not?—Under the Southborough Committee's proposal?

6940. Yes. Do you see any objection to that?—Very much. I have indicated in my preliminary memorandum that I do object to it. I have said that if possible there should be direct election for both the All-India Chambers, but if it is not possible to have both, then have direct election for the Legislative Assembly and indirect election for the other House, the Council of State.

Mr. Acland.

6941. I have heard you and other witnesses make the suggestion that it would be well to give a definite promise to consider the extension of popular control or representation for the Central Government of India in a few years' time. Have you thought how that promise could best be given, because it is not easy to put promises into Bills?—Could the Bill not be so framed? I am not a draughtsman, and it may possibly be so framed already; but, at any rate, could it not be so framed as to admit of such a policy being carried out by regulations which would receive the tacit assent, at any rate, of the two Houses?

6942. Yes, but although further powers might be given without further legislation, that would not be anything in the nature of a promise that anything of that kind would be taken into consideration at a certain time?—The difficulty, I take it, you would put to me is that the Government of to-day cannot bind the Government of five or six years hence.

6943. Yes, that one must accept, but one or two of the witnesses from India have stated that certain sections of opinion in India might be satisfied if there were a definite promise in the Bill. Although I think very likely there would be no difference of opinion, and a promise given in any way would be loyally and properly and fully carried out, I have seen the difficulty of putting a definite promise into the Bill, and I wondered if you had thought of any other way which might seem to those sections of opinion equally satisfactory?—No, I thought the promise would have to be given by the responsible government of the day, and they would have to trust to their successor, to honour it.

6944. On the question of the joint and separate purse, do you agree that the advocates of the separate purse have based their arguments to some extent on the idea that there would be separate revenues for the separate purses, and that you would in practice collect more or less from the service you administer, the funds necessary to administer it? I have had something to do with the financial administration of four or five different departments here, and, of course, that idea is entirely foreign to our system. As Financial Secretary to the War Office, I never thought of raising the money from military sources naturally, or in education or in other departments, and therefore that idea seemed to me to be an extremely difficult one, even in the realm of the reserved and transferred services. It seems to me in education, or sanitation or health or poor law, and so on, it is a very difficult principle that you should raise from certain services the money necessary for their administration. Is that so, in fact, in India; is that idea that the persons who are responsible for administration might raise from the services they administer the funds necessary for the administration a tenable one at all?—I think what is at the bottom of the separate purse proposal is that they want to continue the system that is adopted now between the Central Government and the Provinces, Forests, for example, is entirely a Provincial subject. The receipts are Provincial, and the expenditure is Provincial. Education is a Provincial subject. Primarily the receipts are Provincial and the expenditure is Provincial, though the Government of India may give grants in aid. That is really a Budget classification which is convenient, but it does not actually solve the question. For instance, in the old settlements between the Government of India and the Provinces, having classified a certain number of subjects, you found that the Province was either unduly in surplus or in deficit, and you had to make arrangements to meet that. It would be just the same under the separate purse. Take land revenue, the sheet-anchor of Provincial finance, because land revenue is judged to be fitly at the outset a reserved subject, it is proposed, I gather, by the advocates of the separate purse to hand over all the land revenue to the reserved wing of the Government, subject to their giving back something later on. That, if I may say so, seems to me an absurdity, because after all land revenue is general administration.

6945. Taking one of your illustrations, just as in the United Kingdom, where we are starting a forest service, that service may draw for many years on Imperial funds, but will perhaps, later on, be self-supporting, or more than self-supporting, so it will be a service in general in India that may pass through different stages, and anything in the nature of working on an assumption that you must find from certain services the money necessary for their administration you would regard as an unsatisfactory system?—Yes. I do not think it can be really seriously put forward. It would be only a beginning of the sort of thing you would have to take into consideration in mapping out your reserved and transferred revenue. Even the adherents of the separate purse in the Government of India, do not I think, really propose that. I think they merely started on that with the idea that there would have to be further adjustments.

6946. You mentioned, I think, that you had recently been in the Philippines?—Yes.

6947. Did you find there that some Ministers were responsible to one power in the Government and other Ministers were responsible to the Governor-General for their particular departments?—They have had a very large measure of autonomy in the Philippines since 1916, but they follow the American system, and so make the Ministers responsible to the Governor-General. In fact, of half-a-dozen Philippine Ministers I should say only one sits in either Chamber, and even that is rather an accident. At present the majority of the Ministers are outside the two Chambers, and there is also an American Minister—the Vice-Governor, who is ex-officio, the Minister for Education and Public Health. The Americans regard those, to use our nomenclature, as the very last subjects to be transferred.

6948. Some subjects then are kept by the American authorities to themselves, and others are left to the administration of the Ministers?—Yes.

6949. Then there is some precedent for this unprecedented device of the diarchy?—To that extent, and it may perhaps be interesting to you to know that in important matters they also bring into the Cabinet ad hoc the President of the Senate and the President of the House of Assembly, who are, in fact, really more important people than the Ministers.

6950. That is instructive. You refer to Sir George Lloyd's brief dispatch, in which he spoke of the terrible danger of delay in dealing with this?—Yes.

6951. To put it in a word, would you say that it would be something like a disaster if, through the exigencies or an accident of Parliament, or through competing claims of other legislation, this session were closed without the Act being passed? Would you regard that as approaching a disaster?—I would.

6952. That is not too grave a term to use?—I think the effect in India would be most regrettable.

6953. You spoke with approval of a Standing Joint Committee of the two Houses. Have you thought out how the service of information, so to speak, for such a Committee would be organised? Would it be organised at this end or in India?—At this end. There would be a Committee to assist the Secretary of State, not to deal with the Government of India direct at all.

6954. How would you supply them with the necessary information, and what kind of information would you give them?—For instance, they should have all the papers relating to the Indian Budget and the Provincial Budgets. They should have the papers regarding legislation, and I think the most important resolutions of the Government of India on matters of general interest, and the more important pronouncements of a Provincial Government. I think some judicious person at the India Office would have little difficulty in knowing how to feed his Select Committee.

6955. Have you thought of the difficulty that an ordinary Member of Parliament would have in doing that work and at the same time attending to his constituents? Also, I have no doubt you have thought of the great disadvantage it would be; the harm, in fact, that would follow if he only half did his work. It must be thoroughly done or it had better be left alone, would not you say?—Of course, the time of Members of Parliament is much more occupied now than it used to be; still, you do find Members of Parliament who have time to interest themselves in Indian affairs, and I should say they would take a more rational interest if I might put it so, and a more informing interest, through this Select Committee.

6956. Do not you think a little too much has been made of the assumption that there would be mutual antagonism between the two halves of the Government?—Very much.

6957. You think that has been exaggerated?—Absolutely. I think, for instance, this whole idea of a separate purse is based on the untenable supposition that the two halves would always otherwise be at one another's throats. I think, as a matter of fact, in most cases the two halves would work quite amicably.

6958. You do not recognise that there are divergent tendencies and divergent interests necessarily at work in the administration?—There must be a certain amount of divergence. There is a divergence in any Cabinet. There are divergencies occasionally in the Viceroy's Council, for example, although that mainly consists of sun-dried bureaucrats.

6959. We have heard of the Minister being careful of his popularity with the Legislature, and as being anxious to get on with the Legislature. Would it also be to his interest to get on with the Governor, seeing that it is during his pleasure that he retains office?—Certainly.

6960. And as a reasonable man he will endeavour to get on with both?—He will endeavour to show what an extremely reasonable man he is.

6961. Has it struck you in reading criticisms upon this scheme that many of them are based on the assumption that it will be one set of unreasonable men dealing with another set of unreasonable men, and in constant antagonism one with the other?—I think so, certainly.

6962. Have you seen too much of that?—One may add, perhaps, they all talk as if this was going to be a definite stable scheme, whereas it is only to be a halting stage, and the very fact that it is a halting stage and that the popular wing will be judged according to how they make use of it will in itself tend to harmony.

6963. You have spoken of the liberalising of the Central Government. Would you regard the adoption of the recommendation of the Crewe Committee, that when the Government are in agreement with the conclusion of the Legislature, their decision should ordinarily be allowed to prevail? Would not you regard the acceptance of that principle as a very definite advance towards a more liberal tone in the Central Government?—Yes; but I think that is qualified by the fact that in all important matters the Government of India are to have a preliminary consultation with the Secretary of State. The result is that the Secretary of State would turn them down if he did not agree with them; so, as Sir James Brunyate points out in his minute, it really amounts to very little. On the other hand, there may be cases in which the Government of India and the elected majority in the Assembly might be in agreement, and yet the Secretary of State would feel it his duty to hold out. I mentioned just now, when I was cross-examined in regard to the fiscal policy, that so long as Parliament has control it must be undoubtedly responsible in a large measure for the fiscal policy. I do not think Parliament would allow the Secretary of State to wash his hands of it and say: "What can I do; here is the Government of India in agreement with the Legislative Council."

6964. Do you approve of the joint purse for this, amongst other reasons, that it would be an element contributing to unity of action and feeling in the Government?—Certainly; the two wings will learn each other's difficulties and each other's aspirations.

6965. Would you say generally the more two sides of the Government do things together, to put it in that way, the better the machine will work?—Absolutely.

6966. You have had a good deal of experience in the Imperial Legislative Council. Have you, in looking round that Council amongst the unofficial members, seen men who would be likely to make competent speakers or Presidents of the Assembly?—I think one could pick out one or two.

6967. Men who do their work well and have the confidence of the Assembly?—I think so.

6968. You would not feel that you were confined to the official order in the Assembly to get a competent person?—No; personally, I should be quite prepared to make over the Presidentship of the Assembly to a non-official. I would allow the Assembly, in fact, to elect their own President. Possibly they might prefer an official to begin with, or they might prefer a nominated non-official, or they might prefer an elected non-official; I would leave it to them.

6969. You see what is contemplated in the Bill?—What clause of the Bill, may I ask?

6970. Rules can be made as to the choice of a President; I cannot find it at this moment, but I think you will find that is so. Have you seen a reference in the functions papers to feeder railways; that branch railways should be made a transferred subject; do you agree with that?—I see no objection.

6971. Do you see any advantage in it?—I think anything that makes branch railways more popular in the sense of getting more money for them is an advantage. A lot of Madras districts taxed themselves in addition to their land-tax and normal local cess, in order to get railways, and then they have been held up with one thing and another—quarrels between the South Indian Railway and the Railway Board, and so on—and they are naturally getting rather disheartened. I think anything that would tend to expedite that and to allow feeder railways to be run locally would be an advantage.

Chairman.] Thank you, Sir William.

(The Witness is directed to withdraw.)

6972. You

MR. NABIN CHANDRA BARDALOI and MR. PRASANNA KUMAR BARUAH are called in; and Examined, as follows:—

Chairman.

6972-3. You gentlemen come representing the Assam Association?—(Mr. Bardaloi.) Yes.

Chairman.] The Secretary of State for India, Mr. Montagu, has something to say.

6974. You hand in this document to the Committee and not to the Secretary of State?—That is so. (See Appendix A.A.)

6975. Is there anything you wish to say in supplement of it?—Yes. When we started from India at that time we had not seen the despatch of the Government of India and the official proposals. It is only to-day that we saw it here now. Looking at the recommendations of the Government of India, I certainly say that we object to it. We do not want any different treatment from other Provinces; as a matter of fact, I beg to submit that when our Province was separated and we got a Legislative Council we had an assurance that we would go along the line we were going at the time, and so we got the Legislative Council. Now, in the recommendation of the Government of India we find that the ground on which the suggestion that different treatment shall be given to Assam is, first, that the major part of Assam is hilly, and only one-third of it, the plains, is peopled by intelligent people or forward people. They treat two-thirds of it as hilly, and therefore the greater part of the province being peopled by simple hill people such a structure cannot be built upon it. So far as that is concerned, we find that those two-thirds, being hill people, does not apply. It does not at all affect our position. In those two-thirds there are only seven lakhs of people, and as a matter of fact, the plains pay the larger portion for the maintenance of these two-thirds, so that the reason assigned by the Government of India does not stand here. Secondly, what I beg to submit is that if really these hill tracts are excluded from the reforms I do not see why we should be made to pay; because I know that in tracts like the Naga Hill tracts and the Lushai Hill tracts, a few of the people have been educated by missionaries, and they are quite wild and savage; only in the Khasi and Jaintia Hills are the people advanced. In the Garo Hills there are some converted people, and the rest are as savage and wild as possible. If they are kept in Assam they ought to be under the Assam Legislative Council; and if they are kept out of Assam, as recommended by the Committee, then I beg to say that Assam should not be made to pay for that. We pay, as a matter of fact, 14 lakhs extra for that from our revenue. I find, from the recommendations of the Southborough Committee, that the Government of India accepts the recommendations of that Committee regarding the subjects, and also almost all the reasons. The main are that these tracts are hilly, and that the people are simple, and that they may be affected. That being so, certain subjects that can be transferred in other Provinces cannot be transferred in Assam. We have submitted in this representation that that is not so, if you will permit me I will take them one by one. For example, the subject of Excise has been exercising the minds of the people a great deal. Excise brings in about 54 lakhs of revenue. The system of Excise administration is this: That the Government brings in the opium—I am particularly referring to opium—and sells it to retail sellers, and the shops of the retail sellers are sold by auction every year at a certain time. The highest bidder gets the shop, and then he sells it to the people. We find that some shops have decreased; but the revenue is not decreasing, neither is the consumption decreasing very much. As a matter of fact, we feel that the consumption has not much decreased, although it may be seen from the Treasury Account that some portion of the opium consumption has decreased. I suppose it is due to smuggling. We feel, as people of the country, that the consumption of opium is not decreasing, and particularly the selling system—that is, the system of the Government bringing it and selling it does not at all decrease the consumption. Then the Government of India says that the Minister ought not to get it. As I understand, from the reasons given in the Despatch of March 5th, the people are generally addicted to opium, and if it be given to a popular Minister he might relax the rigour. I say that the facts do not support that statement at all. If that be the reason for not giving the Excise Department to the popular Minister, I submit that the reason is untenable. I believe, as the people are very much affected by it, this subject should go to the popular Minister. Then the Public Works Department is a Department which spends much, and in this Department the reason given by the Government of India is that there are roads which pass through the Hill districts, and therefore this Department should not go to the popular Minister. I beg to submit that there are only a few roads which pass through the Hill districts. The rest of the money in the Assam Valley is spent in the two valleys, so that ground also does not seem to be tenable.

Then, regarding the Fisheries. In all other Provinces of India Fisheries are treated as a transferred subject. The Assamese people proposed some measures for conserving the Fisheries.

One fact is stated in this Note, and it is this; the Brahmaputra River is a very big river, and in that river there are alligators. It was notified that alligators ought to be killed; and for the killing of each alligator a reward of ten rupees would be given. Certain adventurous people who killed alligators by hundreds drew thousands of rupees and as it is a vast river, extending over many hundreds of miles, the alligators did not lessen in number. After spending much money, it was not seen that the fish have increased in the river, so the people opposed it in the Legislative Council, and on account of the opposition that measure was withdrawn, and so, if that be the reason for saying that the people opposed, I beg to submit that is also another untenable ground. Now, about the forests also the reason given does not seem to be tenable. The reason given is that the greater part of Assam is forests, so that the question does not arise at all; but on a comparison of the figures I find that the income from the hilly districts is about seven lakhs net, and the gross may be 12 or 13 lakhs, whereas the net income from the whole forest is about 40,000 or 50,000; that being so, the bulk of the income from the Forest Department is derived from the plains, so that it is not seen why, on that ground, it should be denied to the popular Minister. Then, about the other matters, it is put down shortly on the last page those are the questions which affect the other Provinces of India as well. As I said in the beginning, we want to be treated along with the other Provinces of India just as they are treated. I will not go into details on those matters, but if you want to ask me anything, of course I am ready to answer. These are the main objects at present, and we are taking our stand on that fact—that we should not be differentiated from the other parts of India. In the present Despatch I find that the reason assigned is that it is backward socially and politically; that is why the Government of India thinks that the same treatment cannot be meted. As a matter of fact, I feel great difficulty in understanding the word backward as applied to Assam. I have considered over it very carefully. If it means that the people have not got education enough, I beg to submit that the figures show that is not so. If the proportion of educated men to the population is taken, Assam, I think, comes third or fourth in India. Socially, I do not know how Assam is considered to be backward. On the other hand, I believe it is more forward in many respects than all the other Provinces of India. With regard to education, I do not see that we are backward. About social customs, I do not see how we are backward. Had it not been for that fact, possibly the recommendation that Assam should be included among the major Provinces ought to be followed, and it ought to have the same treatment as the other major Provinces of India. There are backward tracts, the three tracts that I mentioned just now, and as far as our opinion is concerned, we do not mind if they are excluded. Those three are quite different. They are as different from the Assamese people as any other race in India, and as they are frontier tracts they may be politically important, and they may be brought into the Government of India as some other tracts have already been. So far as the Plain districts of Assam are concerned, I beg to submit that they ought not to get a difference of treatment. That is what actually exercised the minds of the people who have read the Government of India Despatch of 5th March. After seeing those recommendations of the Government of India, I feel that the recommendation that was originally made by Sir Beatson Bell in his first scheme would have been much better than what is now proposed by the Government of India. Of course, we do not agree with all that is said, but if I may be allowed to refer to that, I find in his scheme one suggestion that the two Ministers ought to be elected by the Administrative Council and two members ought to be Government officials. I think that proposal of the Chief Commissioner of Assam is much in advance of the present proposal made by the Government of India. This is, in short, what I can say in addition to what I have said.

6976. Did your deputation appear, or was your association represented before the Functions Committee?—Yes.

Chairman—continued.

6977. But you left India before you had seen the Government of India's Despatch?—Yes.

6978. You have only seen that to-day?—I have only seen it to-day.

6979. When you go away, and study it further, if you wish to put in any further memorandum to this Committee on that subject you will be quite at liberty to do so?—Yes, I will do so.

6980. I understand that the point you want to make, and which you are sent here to make, is that there is no reason why the Province of Assam should be treated differentl in the matter of reforms from any other Province?—Yes.

6981. You admit that there are very peculiar characteristics of the country in the existence of these backward tracts?—Yes.

6982. And you say exclude those tracts?—Yes, if necessary.

6983. And leave the rest as any other Province?—Yes.

6984. That is your position?—Yes.

Chairman.] We are very much obliged to you.

(The Witnesses are directed to withdraw.)

MR. A. RAMASWAMI MUDALIAR is called in; and Examined, as follows:—

Chairman.

6985. You have been warned for this afternoon; but we had rather more time this morning, so we took your colleagues when you were not here through no fault of your own. You come here representing the Madras Dravidian Association?—Yes.

6986. Especially with a view of presenting the case of that section of the non-Brahmins?—Yes.

6987. You have put in a statement already. (See Appendix S.) have you not?—Yes. I desire to draw the attention of the Committee primarily to the fact that, so far as the Madras Presidency is concerned, not a single non-Brahmin has come forward and said that the scheme of communal representation which we are asking for is not necessary for the Presidency. I am using the word "communal representation" in a rather larger sense than the special sense of communal electorates. I am leaving out for the present the idea of communal electorates, but, speaking broadly and generally, every section of the non-Brahmin community of Madras is entirely agreed that some sort of protection ought to be given to the non-Brahmins of the Presidency. You have heard various shades of opinion from Madras, and your Lordships' Committee has also heard several non-Brahmin representatives, and I believe I am right in saying that not a single non-Brahmin from my Presidency has stated that, for theoretical considerations or for practical reasons, a scheme of communal representation will do harm to the Presidency. On the other hand, I think every one has insisted that the only practical way of getting over the difficulties of the Madras Presidency, the special difficulties under which the non-Brahmins of that Presidency are labouring, is the granting of some scheme which will provide adequate facilities for the non-Brahmins of the Presidency to be properly represented in the Councils of that Presidency. That in itself, I respectfully submit to your Lordships' Committee, is a sufficient reason why, without any further considering of the theoretical objections, or any other objections that may be brought forward, the principle of communal representation should be granted to the non-Brahmins of our Presidency. Even to other sections of the non-Brahmins—the reasonable section of non-Brahmins, as they have been termed—in my own Presidency have come forward and made the suggestion that they do want communal representation, not in the technical sense in which we put it forward, and which we urge is the only right sort of communal representation. While they do want what is called reservation of seats in the actual proposals that they have put forward, I find that they are not very different from the scheme which we have ourselves put forward. For instance, the delegates of that Association have told your Lordships' Committee that they would like the Madras Presidency to be divided into twelve electorates, each electorate to send in nine candidates, of whom not more than two should be Brahmins. That, in effect, works out in this way, that in the 108 seats which will be given to Hindoos in general, twenty-four will be given to Brahmins. They were assuming that the strength of the Council would be 200. If we reduce those figures to the proportion fixed by the Southborough Committee we find that out of the sixty-one Hindoo seats or non-Mohammedan, as they have been called, the proportion would work out to something like thirteen Brahmin seats, whereas we have suggested that twelve seats should be given to the Brahmins and the rest to the non-Brahmins, so that both wings of the non-Brahmin party, the reasonable and unreasonable wings, which I represent, are agreed as regards the definite number to which the Brahmins may be entitled under this scheme of reform. So that the unanimity of opinion is something striking when it is remembered from what different points of view we lay our case before you. I should also like to address your Lordships very shortly on these two points of view. I say that the Brahmins, for various reasons, which I do not wish to go into, do exercise an unwholesome influence in the elections of any Presidency; that we are simply crushed by the clannishness of the Brahmins. They also want the same result, namely, adequate protection. Though they may speak in terms of praise of Brahmin philanthropy and good nature, and all the rest of it, in the result, the actual working out, I do not see any difference at all between the ideal which we aim at and the ideal which they aim at; whereas we say we are crushed, they say that we are simply smothered by the kindness of the Brahmins. Beyond that I do not see any difference at all between the two different points of view. There is only one other point I should like to put before your Lordships in this connection. It has been said by the delegates of this other Association, the non-Brahmin Association, that they have actually entered into a pact with the Brahmins, and that they have come to a certain compromise with them in Madras, and that it was the result of this compromise that was put forward in their scheme, namely, when they asked for twenty-four seats out of 108 to be given to the Brahmins. Your Lordships' Committee is aware that several Brahmin witnesses from my Presidency have gone behind the compact in this country, that whereas in their political associations in Madras they did accept this compact, that they would be willing to give to the non-Brahmins special facilities, whereas even the Conference held in Bombay passed a resolution that special facilities should be given to the large majority of non-Brahmins in Madras, your Lordships' Committee

Chairman—continued.

Committee finds that gentlemen when they come over here have gone behind this compact. The delegate of the Presidency Association said that it would be a breach of political faith. I do not want to characterise any of their views at all, but I would seriously suggest that it is a really important question which could not be weighed by the evidence given by Brahmin witnesses in this atmosphere, where they have not got all the considerations bearing on their minds which they undoubtedly will have in the atmosphere of Madras itself. I should like to draw the Committee's attention also to the objection that has been put forward that the granting of communal representation militates against the formation of an Indian nation. I would seriously ask the Committee to consider whether it is possible that this large population of non-Brahmins of all sections of opinion really want not to develop the idea of an Indian nation, and it has been given only to the same community of Brahmins to have this lofty ideal of an Indian nation. I would seriously ask further whether it is possible to develop an Indian nation at all if 36,000,000 of them refuse to be developed into an Indian nation except by one policy and one means. I would further ask whether it is at all in our interests to prevent the formation of an Indian nation, and whether it would in any way help us if we were wantonly and wilfully placing obstructions in the way of an Indian nation. I really feel that it is one of those odious suggestions that are so lightly and easily made, and I believe who make these suggestions really know that we are at least as anxious to form a united Indian nation as any other section of the Indian public in fact. I would strongly suggest, and my association would urge, that we want communal representation because we say that that is the surest way of making a united nation. This particular point of view has been so admirably put forward by Sir Stanley Reed the other day in his evidence that I do not think I can improve upon that, and I would only urge in the language that he has used that communal representation is a national and democratic and unifying influence in the transitional stage in India. It has further been stated to your Lordships' Committee by some witnesses that as we are in a majority we are certain to have a large number of the elected members, and one witness went the length of giving the numbers in a particular constituency showing the enormous majority of non-Brahmins in that constituency. I would only appeal to your Lordships' Committee to consider why, if that were so, we should come all the way here and earnestly appeal to your Lordships for the grant of communal representation. Why do I come here to admit that we are not educated in such large numbers, that we are not organised, that our voters are illiterate and do not understand the value of the vote; they were coerced by the officials, and that they are a poor, helpless lot who can be driven like sheep by the Brahmin official? My association feels, and I, too, feel, certainly the humiliation and shame of making these confessions, but we have to make them. Sentiment cannot stand in the way of subordinating the very vital interests that our community has in the coming reform scheme. It is because we feel that, in spite of the humiliation in making these admissions, especially with an adverse audience behind me, that I have to make them to your Lordships' Committee, and that I have to seek protection for me and my community at your Lordships' hands. It is really a very vital matter for us, and it is not in any spirit of lightness that we have come forward and said that this is one of these things which cannot be got rid of by mere platitudes. My association would like to lay emphasis on one other aspect of this question of communal representation. We ask for communal representation only as a temporary expedient. It is said that the reforms themselves are only for a transitional period. We do not ask for communal representation for all eternity; we only ask for it for a transitional period, so that, for instance, when the next Parliamentary Committee meets and goes over the whole question it will be quite within its powers to say that communal representation is no longer necessary; that doubts were expressed and fears were expressed by non-Brahmins at one time, but those fears are unjustified in the light of experience, and we do not think that communal representation is necessary. Our own people may come forward and say that within the decade that has passed we have got some power into our hands and we are able to better organise ourselves; we are able to get our own representatives in the Councils, and the fear of the Brahmin influence is not so bad as it was before, and we would rather throw our lot in with the rest of India and have general elections—it is just possible—and we do not want it as a permanent or enduring measure, but only as a temporary transitional, if short-lived, measure. If the Parliamentary Committee find, after ten years, that this communal representation has worked harm to the State, if it finds that it has outlived the period of usefulness, if it finds it is no longer necessary, if it finds that the non-Brahmins themselves are prepared to give it up, certainly by all means let communal representation be taken away from us; we would be quite willing to give it up, because as a matter of fact we give to the Brahmins 12 seats in excess of the number which they deserve. It is only because we take into consideration the vast predominance that they have had that we assign 12 seats. Certainly our people ought to get many more seats. Therefore we are ourselves not interested in keeping this communal representation longer than it is necessary. I do feel that this question ought to be considered in the light of this legislation also. It has been suggested to your Lordships' Committee again that there cannot be any question of separate interests between the non-Brahmins and the Brahmins. I should like to say in the first place to your Lordships' Committee that, apart from this question of separateness of interest, it is essential that all sections of the community ought to be represented in the councils of the Empire, the deliberative assemblies. We find, for instance, in the English Parliament various sections of the English people represented whose interests are opposed. I would say that in my Presidency, in certain circumstances, the interests are diametrically opposed. No doubt there are a great number of subjects in which the interests are identical, in which there cannot be any difference of interest between the Brahmin and the non-Brahmin, but there are several subjects in which their interests must clash. For instance, you have large questions of communities, of vernacular education, of Sanscrit education, and of the reform of Universities in which the Brahmin view is all on one side and the non-Brahmin view all on the other side. I only take a discussion that was held the other day in the Provincial Legislative Council on the subject of transferred subjects. The Madras Presidency Council met, and the non-official members were allowed to discuss as to what subjects should be put on the transferred list and what subjects should be put on the reserved list. It will surprise your Lordships to find that on the question of civil justice all the Brahmin civil members voted for transfer and all the non-Brahmin members, including Mohammedans and Christian, voted against the transfer of civil justice. Only the Brahmin members wanted it to be transferred, and the non-Brahmin members, including non-Brahmins and Christians, said that it ought to be a reserved subject. No doubt they did not put the argument that it was because the Brahmin interests were opposed to non-Brahmin interests. That is not the way they put it, and they would certainly not put it in that way; but I would seriously suggest to your Lordships' Committee that on that question opinion was divided, not by the fact that the member was a Home Ruler or an anti-Home Ruler, or that he was a rational or an advanced politician, but opinion was divided by caste, the Brahmins all voting for civil justice and all the other castes voting against it. That is a living example of how caste interests do diametrically differ in our Presidency at any rate. I have referred in my memorandum to the argument that there will be a fissiparous tendency introduced by the grant of communal electorates. I am not a learned man myself to put it in such language, but what I understand by the argument is that because there are 153 communities among non-Brahmins therefore communal representation cannot be granted to them because every single community among the 153 may afterwards come and claim communal representation. I really think that that is too disingenuous to be accepted. It merely comes to this, that just as because there are 153 communities among the non-Brahmins it is better that the Brahmins should represent them than that they should as between themselves. It is not a fair argument. It has also been suggested by one witness that Kshatriyas might not like to come into this scheme. I do not know this statement, and on what authority this statement is made. I have in my association many a Kshatriya member who is pledged to this policy of communal representation, and the Madras Presidency Association claim some Kshatriyas who are also for communal representation, though in a private form. Apart from that, the population of the Kshatriyas, or fighting classes, as they have been called, are no longer fighting classes. Fighting classes come from all sections of the population. The Kshatriyas as a fighting class in the Madras Presidency is an old antiquated thing; it does not exist now. The Kshatriyas are only a lakh and a half, men, women and children included. It is a population of 37 millions of non-Brahmins. So I do not think it is a fair argument to say that the Kshatriyas are against communal representation, and therefore do not give communal representation of non-Brahmins at all. In my Memorandum I have touched on one other subject which I should like to elaborate a little with your Lordships' permission. It is suggested that in the list of transferred subjects only elementary education should be included, and that secondary and University education should be made reserved subjects, and my association strongly feels that it would not be proper at this stage to transfer secondary and University education. My association, therefore, feels unable to understand what administrative difficulties there will be in making one Department administer elementary education, and another Department administer secondary and University education. I do not see how the administration of those branches is so vitally inter-connected that it could not be done by two separate authorities. It is really a position in which I, not being in the inner councils of the administration, feel unable to explain; but I do feel, taking a common-sense view of the case, that administration of primary education does not necessarily conflict with the administration of secondary and University education if it is carried on by two separate bodies. The objection which my association would place before your Lordships' Committee in this connection is this: At present, in my Presidency, very nebulous ideas are in the air with regard to how secondary and University education ought to be organised. We are none of us in a position to say in what direction educational reform should proceed. We are all for reform; we all feel that some sort of progress ought to be made in the question of educational reform, and we feel that the present educational policy may not be all that is desired, but the difficulty is that no constructive programme has been before us as to the direction in which educational reform ought to proceed. We have just had Dr. Sadler's Commission on the Calcutta University, and though they do not touch on the Madras University scheme, it is very likely that some of the recommendations of Dr. Sadler's Commission will have a very direct bearing on Madras University educational progress. But apart from that, we have all sorts of wild and faddist notions prevailing in our Presidency in regard to higher and University education. The Government of India and the Government of Bengal, I believe, some time back found that the total absence of any religious education in these Universities and schools had something to do with revolutionary crime in Bengal. I believe that is how they put it, though I am not perfectly certain. Just now the idea of religious education in these schools is very prominently put forward by some of our people. Mrs. Besant, for instance, in my Presidency has been pushing forward very vigorously a scheme which she calls national education. We have national education weeks and national education bazaars, and all sorts of national education things, at which funds are collected for what is called the national education system. Mrs. Besant proposes that mathematics, science, and several other subjects ought to be taught nationally, and not denationally, as is being done now. My association feels that it is unable to understand how a subject like mathematics should be nationalised on denationalised, and how in the teaching of such subjects there should be a national system of teaching, as opposed to the present system of education. Apart from that, Mrs. Besant has started a national school, and in that school, it is stated, the deleterious influences which at present prevail in other institutions are not prevailing. It is a sort of Utopia, in which the best education, the most national education, is being taught. I was trying to pursue that a little, and I find that in that school the system of teaching is, in fact, much worse than in missionary schools. I have myself been educated at a missionary college, the Christian College of Madras, and I certainly prefer the education that I got in the missionary college to the religious education which is being given at this national school. In this national school, which is managed by a trust called the Theosophical Educational Trust——

6988. You are giving us an argument for dividing the two spheres of education. I do not want to go into the general subject of education?—No; I am only giving an argument to show why secondary education ought not to be transferred just at present, and I hope my reason will have a direct bearing on that. What I said was, very nebulous ideas of reorganising the educational system are just now in the air, and if Ministers are to be given the power of administering this secondary and higher education, a cheap form of popularity can easily be gained by making changes in the system of education which are not conducive to the welfare of the State. As I was saying, in this National Education, instead of an open Christian teaching being taught which everybody knows, and every Hindoo knows is the Christian system, and against which he is warned, it is a teaching of a different religion. Every Hindoo knows the Christian religion to be the Christian religion, and we do not go there to become converts. We know it is another religion, and if some of us follow it, we follow it in a philosophical spirit, and not with the idea of absorbing the religion itself. But in this national system, instead of the Christian religion being taught, or instead of any other religion, they teach what they call Theosophy, which in other words means absorbing the White Lotus Day, the Besant Birthday, and the Arundale Birthday, in which different people are being worshipped as the saviours of the world. I distinctly object to that sort of teaching for our boys. I very much fear that if this secondary and University education is transferred to Ministerial control, that is the sort of system which will come into existence in our schools. There is also this agitation about what is called the conscience clause; that is to say, Hindoo students ought not to be allowed to listen to the teaching of Christian missionaries on subjects like that. I have been in the Christian College myself, and I know in what manner the Bible is taught. It is not taught by faddists; it is not taught by uncompromising Christians; it is taught by reasonable men in a reasonable and philosophical way, and the students are not obliged to listen to everything that is taught, neither are they obliged to study the subject carefully. I know of heaps of students who have got no marks at all in these subjects, and against whom no complaint has been made by any professor at all; it is left to the good sense of the student whether he follows the teaching or not. The advocates of the conscience clause do not wait to see what the effect of that will be on missionary education, for instance. I have authority to say, and I have spoken to several Christian missionaries, that if that conscience clause is insisted upon the effect will be the closing of many a missionary institution, and that would be a disaster, from the point of view of my Association, to higher education. Therefore, I do feel that only primary education should be a transferred subject, and secondary and higher education ought not to be a transferred subject; that is all I have to say.

Chairman.] Thank you.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THE EARL OF SELBORNE, in the Chair.

SIR JAMES MESTON, K.C.S.I., is re-called; and further Examined, as follows:—

Chairman.

6989. We asked you to be good enough to come back because there are several matters we should like to hear further the views of the Government of India upon. Last time you had not time to refer at all to the question of rules, which will play such an important part in amplification and clothing the bones of the Bill with living flesh. Perhaps you will be kind enough to say something to us about that?—Even before the Government of India had seen the final form of the Bill they had set to work to prepare rough drafts of a number of regulations which they felt certain would be required in order to carry out the executive and legislative details of the proposed measure.

As I mentioned to your Lordship on the last occasion when I was here under examination, I brought several of those drafts home, and I found that the India Office had also been at work, in a Special Committee that has been dealing with those subjects, in preparing similarly sets of rules under the more important rule-making powers. I was associated with that Committee, and to put the matter briefly we, that is to say, the Indian Office and the Government of India between us, have collected a number of draft rules which purport to be prepared under the powers of making rules, which are given in the first two parts of the Bill. Those rules, as they at present stand, are mere drafts; they have not been approved by the Secretary of State, and many of them have not, I think, even been seen by him; and certainly a number of them, particularly those which have been framed in England, have not been seen by the Government of India, although in some cases it would be the Government of India who would be the primary rule-making authority. But as they stand it did seem to me, and I think I have the general authority of the Secretary of State for the statement, that they would indicate in a rough sort of way the sort of regulations that the Government of India would be prepared to frame, and that the Secretary of State would be prepared to look at favourably. The advantage of bringing them up, even although they may be embarrassing in their present rough, unauthorised form, the advantage of submitting them to your Lordships' Committee now, or at least those of them which the Committee wish to see, is, that they do fill up parts of the picture which are not apparent in the Bill itself. They may even assist the Committee in coming to a decision on some of the principles in the Bill, because very obviously if a principle is stated, as it must be in a measure of this sort, in very general language, the authority which has to pass a decision upon it would desire to see how the principle will actually work in practice. Those rules are intended to assist that object. For example, the principle of diarchy or dualism, which has hitherto been the subject of much evidence before your Lordship's Committee, is a principle which is so novel that one who is unfamiliar with it might naturally desire to see how those who have attempted to visualise it do see it in its actual working; they might desire to see that before they even arrive at a final decision as to the propriety or otherwise of the principle itself. From that point of view I have prepared a list of the more important rules, which will have to be made under Part I. and Part II. of the Bill. If your Lordship's Committee wish to see them there are a number of those rules which are now in draft. It would be taking up far too much time to attempt to read through them, and some of them would require probably a little editing before I actually submit them, but I am ready to put them in in a day or two if your Lordship will indicate the rules which you think are likely to be most interesting and helpful. I have here a list of about 20 sets of rules. If I might run through the list it might meet the case.

Under Clause 1, rules will be required for the classification of subjects into Central subjects and Provincial subjects. What is required here is a simple formal rule giving cover to lists which Mr. Feetham, in evidence, has already submitted. I might take the opportunity of saying that I think those lists may be taken subject to two important exceptions, as agreed lists, that is to say that the Government of India would be prepared to endorse those lists.

6990. You mean the revised lists?—Yes; not the illustrative lists in the Report. I think the Government of India would endorse the first list. I think there is no difference of opinion with regard to the first list. The next rule-making power is the devolution of authority over Provincial subjects to Local Governments. That I think will be purely formal, but we have the rules ready. Next comes the allocation of revenues for Provincial subjects. This is under Clause 1, Sub-Clause (1) (b). This is a matter to which I should perhaps be allowed to revert later, because it deals with the distribution of the whole of the revenues of the Indian Empire, if I may use the expression, between the Central authority and the different Provinces. In regard to that there is also no difference of opinion.

Then comes the transfer of subjects to the administration of the Governor acting with Ministers. This also will be a formal rule giving cover to another list which Mr. Feetham put in evidence, and in regard to that list the Government of India wish me to press again upon your Lordship's Committee very earnestly the propriety of reserving, and not transferring, the subjects of higher education and industrial development. Perhaps I may have an opportunity of coming back to that point.

The next rule-making power of importance deals with the allocation of Provincial funds for the purposes of the administration of transferred subjects. This touches on the old controversy of the joint versus the separate purse, and in the meantime certain rules are being drafted in accordance with a via media, which has been suggested, and to which reference has been made in examination before the Committee.

6991. A via media?—Yes; the via media being that the joint purse should be the initial arrangement in each Province, but that each Governor should be empowered if he found that unworkable to move on to the separate purse. I do not put forward this on behalf of the Government of India, because they stand by their guns as regards the desirability of beginning with the separate purse, but it is a via media which has been worked out in the India Office.

The next set of rules of importance would be those fixing the contributions payable by the Provinces to the Central Government. These rules will touch on the appointment, on which the Government of India lay great stress, of a Committee on Financial Relations for the purpose of making the contributions in time more equable, and distributing the burden of the Central

Central Government more evenly between the different Provinces.

6992. When is it suggested to set up that Committee?—As soon as the proposal is approved by the Secretary of State. We have done all the spade work in India, and we are ready for the appointment of that committee as soon as it is sanctioned.

Then come rules for the constitution of the Finance Department and its duties. Those are very simple and they are ready. Then come rules for the authority which a Local Government will exercise over members of the Public Services in its province. Those are also ready. Then come rules defining the powers of the Governor-General in Council in relation to both reserved and transferred subjects. Those are ready. That deals with important matters under Clause 1.

Under Clause 3 the chief question is the procedure in the event of a vacancy occurring in the office of a Minister. That is a very simple set of rules, and they are ready.

Then, under Clause 6, there will be an elaborate set of regulations defining the constitution of the Provincial Legislatures. Those cannot really be put forward until a decision has been arrived at in regard to the recommendations of Lord Southborough's Committee; but they are matters which can very easily be dealt with, because it is simply a question of recording the constituencies, the manner of voting, and the handling of election petitions, and so on. They present no difficulty, and we have already very useful models in the existing rules.

Then, under Clause 8, will have to be framed, amongst other things, rules for the protection from Provincial Legislation of certain laws or certain subjects, without the previous sanction of the Governor-General in Council. These are not ready; it will take a very elaborate examination of the whole of the Code of law of British India. I do not think it is a matter in which substantial controversy can find a place.

Under Clause 9 will have to be listed the permanent charges on all Provincial revenues. That list is ready in its draft form. Under the same Clause will have to be described the course of business in the Provincial Legislatures. Those regulations are ready. But in connection with them there would also have to be framed a set of Standing Orders supplementary and subsidiary to the statutory rules of business, and as the Bill stands the first of those Standing Orders are to be made for the Council, although it will have subsequent liberty in varying them. We propose, therefore, to get ready a draft of the sort of Standing Orders which we contemplate would be useful for the initiation of the new Legislatures. Those Standing Orders in draft are also ready.

Marquess of Crewe.

6993. 6 and 7, is it not?—Yes; sub-Clauses 6 and 7. It may be that, on closer examination, some of the rules, some of the things we have prepared as rules, would be more suitably placed among the Standing Orders, and vice versa; but that is a matter of subsequent domestic discussion, so to speak

Then, under Clause 10, we shall have to prepare rules which are not yet ready, because the principle has not yet been decided as to the reservation of Bills by a Governor. There, also, I think, there is no field for dispute or difference.

Then coming to Part II., under Clause 19, there will be rules for the constitution of the Indian Legislature. Obviously it would have been premature to prepare those until the form of that constitution is finally settled. And there will be, under Clause 20, rules for the course of business in the Indian Legislature, and whatever I have said with regard to them and the Standing Orders, and the relations between the two with reference to Provincial Legislatures would apply here mutatis mutandis. Those are the more important statutory rules with which either the Secretary of State or the Government of India are immediately concerned. But under Clause 5 there is provision for rules and orders which in some respects are of the very highest importance. They will define the whole of the relations between the Governor, and, if the dual system is accepted, the two halves of his Government, and the relations between those two halves inter se.

In order to clear their minds, and to try to make the case for dualism as clear and convincing as possible, the Government of India had framed a set of rules and orders which might be described as a model, that is to say, they would be a draft which would be put before the Governors for their assistance. Those are ready. When one comes to look at them in the light of the discussions here one is rather afraid that they will be regarded as somewhat too lengthy and elaborate, and if the Committee desire to see them in their present form I should like to make it clear that they will be very closely examined again from the point of view of reducing them, shortening them, and simplifying them. Or, what might be more convenient to the Committee, I think I could very easily throw them into the form of a narrative of suggested procedure, something in the nature of a short manual, which would be handed to Governors for their assistance and guidance.

Finally, again a matter of very grave importance, is the draft instrument of instructions to the Governor. A draft of those instructions was prepared by the Government of India; it has been very thoroughly criticised and discussed in the India Office, and a new draft has been prepared which, I think, meets with very general acceptance by those who have been working on it, but it has yet to be seen both by the Government of India and by the Secretary of State. That is the position as regards the rules and regulations.

Chairman.

6994. In order to prevent any misunderstanding—I think you and I are perfectly clear on the matter—these drafts have no authority at all?—No, none.

6995. And you merely offer them to us as a picture of the kind of thing which may eventually emerge?—Quite so.

6996. With full authority?—With full authority, yes.

6997. As such, I think they will be useful to the members of the Committee for their private information, and I should like you to put them in?—Yes. (The same are handed in (See Appendix Y.).

6998. They are merely in the nature of memoranda to assist us in visualising the kind of thing that will eventually emerge?—I quite understand.

6999. They are purely provisional, temporary, without authority, and merely suggested sketches?—Quite so.

7000. Have you anything more to say to us on the great question of dualism, on diarchy, especially in relation to the financial side of it, and of the work of the Grand Committee?—Yes. I should be most grateful to attempt again to put before the Committee certain considerations which it was difficult to state on the last occasion, because I felt that my examination was then mainly confined to the Bill and the chief methods of giving effect to the policy which it embodies. The Government of India feel, and I did try to express their feeling, that the means of securing compliance with the policy of His Majesty's Government is inextricably associated with some form of dualism in the Provinces, but I did not attempt to lay before the Committee all that dualism involves to the mind of the Government in India. It seemed to me it would be premature to pursue the matter into details until the Committee had heard the case for and against the broad principle. That case has now been stated from every possible point of view, and by many various schools of opinion, and I think it is now of very considerable importance to try to explain exactly how dualism, as it has been visualised—to use your Lordship's word—by the Government of India, can be worked as a successful piece of administrative mechanism. The whole essence of dualism as it is seen by the Viceroy and his colleagues, indeed the main and almost the sole justification for it in theory, is that it provides a field in which the new popular Government will learn to do the work of administration by actually taking it into their own hands, and in which also the first elements of responsibility will be brought home to the representatives of the people in Council, to the Ministers who are their mouthpiece, and eventually, we hope, to the people themselves.

And

And further, this is the only way, as we see it, in which the fitness of the new popular Government for an extension of its powers can be judged. There is no other means of gauging capacity except by seeing the work that has been done and the manner in which it has been done, in other words by holding the new authorities accountable for the results of their work.

Now, in order to fulfil these conditions, if these are the true conditions, there is a clear duty devolving on the Government of India, and on the official Government in India generally, to allow the popular Government the widest possible liberty within the field that has been allotted to it, the liberty of doing its work in its own way, working out its own future, making its own mistakes, proving its own capacity, and so on. That being accepted, the Government of India do press most earnestly that the official half of the Government has a corresponding right to be left alone in the field which is reserved for it, the field which is not transferred. We, the official half of the Government, are wholly responsible for the reserved field; we have not, and do not expect to receive any mandate to relax materially the standards of administration in our own field. We feel very strongly that it is impossible for us to fulfil our responsibility to Parliament unless we are permitted to carry on our own work in our own way.

Now, it is perfectly true, as has been pressed on your Lordship's Committee, and it is perfectly essential as an example of the new spirit in which we begin all this work, that our policy must in future be very much deflected into closer accord with popular views. We shall have to relax a great deal of the old rigidity of our so-called efficiency, and we shall have to give a great deal more weight to what is often called sentiment, and generally we shall have to prepare the way in the reserved field for a form of evolution which will probably shape very differently from anything that we know or can possibly pretend to forecast. While we accept fully and wholeheartedly this growing influence of the popular view upon our work, we urge that it does not affect the principle of dualism, it does not affect the essential conditions of the experiment on which we are now engaged. We feel that that is an entirely separate matter, and we are really most anxious to guard against any possible confusion. The clear conditions of the experiment, I would again submit, are that each half of the Government should have its own work, and should be allowed to do it unfettered by control exercised by the other half. Now, this is not what has been put before your Committee by many of the witnesses that you have heard. They ask quite frankly, not only that they should be given their own field of administration, but they also ask that they should receive very considerable powers, what we contend are new powers, in the reserved field of administration, and those powers we submit amount to the virtual control of the policy in our field.

The case was very frankly put to the Committee by Mr. Srinivasa Sastri when he was examined. Perhaps I might be allowed to refer to it. I do not want to deal with controversial matters; I only refer to this for the purpose of making clear the position of the Government of India, because this gives a text on which I think I can hang our case better than if I left it in vacuo. On page 232 of the printed evidence Mr. Sastri used these words: "The power of the purse, the power of determining the revenues to be raised, and the way in which the revenues should be expended, is one of the elementary powers recognised in the English Constitution." I omit certain unimportant words. "That elementary right has yet to be conceded. . . . Many years have elapsed, and it is high time, when you are inaugurating a great experiment in self-government, that you gave us the power of the purse outright. Without the power of the purse responsible government can only remain in a very inchoate and unsatisfactory condition." That, I think, is a perfectly fair quotation. It is an exact quotation, and I do not think the omission of the intermediate words garbles it. That is the plea which has been put before you very powerfully, very strongly, for giving to Ministers the power of the purse in regard to reserved subjects.

7001. Ministers or the Council?—The Council, and the Ministers, I fancy, as their representatives. Then the second point also in the same evidence is in the first column, on page 234, in which Mr. Sastri is discussing the constitution of the Grand Committee. "In the Grand Committee under the Joint Report the elected members and the nominated non-official members together would still be in a very considerable majority over the official members, and therefore there is preserved this right—it may be academic to a large extent, but a legal right—of refusing Government measures as presented to us in the Grand Committee." Those two quotations, I think, state fairly the attitude of our Indian intelligent critics towards the consequences of dualism. In other words, they ask for control over the legislation for reserved subjects, a power to refuse Government measures, and they ask for control over the finance of reserved subjects. Both those points the Government of India authorise me definitely to contest. They feel that those two contentions would be fatal to the idea, to the spirit of the scheme, and they are certain that they would be fatal to the success of the scheme.

In putting this case I should like, if I may, to get right away from the Report, and from all the hopes that have been built up on the Report, or the arguments which have been based on the wording of the Report. What we ask is that this Committee should consider, as a plain business proposition, the absolutely cardinal issue—namely, whether it is possible for a Government to do its duty if in the last resort it cannot make its own laws and cannot control its own finances. It was from that point of view that I pressed the unpopular scheme for a separate purse. I could, I think, meet some of the points, if it is considered desirable, which have been brought against the scheme of a separate purse; but I ought to ask also that I may be allowed to beg you to consider the constitution of the Grand Committee, because the matter is one which has not really come under close scrutiny yet, and some of the comments which have been made upon it I think are a little misleading, quite unintentionally. The separate purse and the Grand Committee are, in the eyes of the Government of India, the two greatest issues to be settled if dualism in the Provincial Government is accepted. Before touching upon this again, perhaps I might just refer to one very symptomatic point which has come out in the course of the evidence, and that is the status of the Minister. It has been urged very plausibly, and very fairly, that the Minister should be put in exactly the same position as regards status, pay, and powers as the Member of Council. The Government of India, I am sure, have no possible objection to his status and rank and pay being made the same as those of the official Member of Council. But the fallacy that they wish to avoid is that the Member of Council should become a Minister; that is to say, how they view the new situation is, that the existing position remains, subject to such influence as the more powerful will exercise, the present position of the Executive remains very much as it is within the reserved field. But you have cut off a very substantial field, which you hand over to Ministers, and in regard to which Ministers have to enter into an entirely new position. They have got to take up a situation which is not that of the old Member of Council; they have to initiate constitutional democratic methods in dealing with their own field. We, left in charge of our field, contend that we ought to be left to manage it pretty much on the existing lines, and that the course of the evolution of this scheme consists of gradually reducing our field, transferring it period by period ——

7002. Subject by subject?—Yes, to the custody of the Ministers; but in the meantime, if for no higher reason, in order to cause as little dislocation as possible, the existing methods of procedure, subject to the growing influence of popular opinion, should remain unaffected in our own sphere of work. That is speaking generally, the general argument that I should like to put forward for the great consequences of dualism. I do not know how far you wish me to develop the subsidiary points by themselves. I can do so very briefly—the finance and the Grand Committee.

To begin with finance, might I, at the outset, try to clear up some little confusion which, I think, exists in the minds of some of the witnesses who have appeared before you as regards our general scheme of finance?

We

Chairman—continued.

We contemplate two divisions. Just as there are two divisions of subjects, we contemplate two divisions of finance. I think the expression "divided head of revenue" has been responsible for a certain amount of slight misunderstanding. I want to get rid of that. Of these two divisions of finance the first is the division between central finance and the Provincial finance. The Government of India accept the view that the Provinces should be left to the entire use of their own revenues, that is the revenues, speaking quite generally, which they assess and collect and administer themselves. The only exception to that under the scheme in the report, a scheme which the Government of India fully endorse, were the heads of income tax and general stamps. They occupy a somewhat different position from other revenue heads, inasmuch as it is sometimes very difficult to say whether they are really central sources of revenue or local. For example, the income tax of the great manufacturing interests of the Tata firm and other firms which are growing up alongside of them, the income tax of those firms is all paid in Bombay and becomes an asset of the Bombay Presidency, whereas the factories themselves are very largely located in the territories of Bihar and Orissa, and the Government of Bihar and Orissa would be responsible for the administration of the area, the Black country, which is growing up within their boundaries. That is an example of what I mean as to the difficulty of localising income tax. It is familiar to every country that assesses it. Consequently I do not think that any reasonable objection could be taken to throwing income tax and general stamps, to which similar arguments apply, into the category of central revenues. Having given the Province their own revenues, and having kept for the Government of India the revenues which it assesses and administers, plus income tax and general stamps, the report found that the Central Government was not left with enough money for the conduct of its own affairs, more particularly the general defence of the country, and it decided therefore that the Provinces should be asked to pay contributions, which in popular parlance you may take as contributions towards general defence. Some critics have suggested that we might go at once a great deal further and divide off the heads of revenue which are inherently Central from the heads of revenue which are inherently Provincial, and expect the Central Government to subsist on its own revenues, without the annoying procedure of having to levy contributions from the Provinces. I want to suggest that that is an ideal which, at the present moment, at least, is perfectly unattainable. In the first place it is very difficult to see why any particular source of revenue, or at least many sources of revenue are inherently either Central or Provincial, and any allotment of revenues which may be made must to some extent be artificial of necessity. Take land revenue, for example. It is true that land revenue has by tradition and custom become a provincial asset, but the origin of land revenue was the right of the State to levy either a rent or a tax—there is bitter controversy as to the proper term to be used—from the occupier of every piece of land within the Imperial dominions, so that it might be held that land revenue is a Central asset. I mention this as a danger of laying down any dogmatic line of division, but we have tried to lay down a line of division which roughly corresponds with the actual facts and is also in consonance with our past traditions. I do not think, speaking generally, that we could annex any other heads of revenue as Central. That being so, there is unquestionably a deficiency in the Central revenues as compared with their necessities. You were told the other day that this deficiency could be, and would be, filled up by the efforts of the Central Government itself. It may be true that in time—we have looked into this matter very fully—we shall be able to get less dependent on our Provincial subsidies, but there are many factors which are operating in very much the reverse direction. Our revenues from irrigation works, for instance, are now becoming subject to the law of diminishing returns, and that is bound to go on. The new irrigation works which are being planned and constructed are not likely to pay anything like the net return on the outlay that their predecessors did, and possibly so with railways. Then Customs, the whole question of expanding our Customs revenue is inextricably associated with the question of whether we are going to become a great protective country, and also the question of Imperial preference, so that it would be foolish to say at the moment that from Customs or Railways or Irrigation we are going to get, in a few years, enough money to enable us to dispense with Provincial assistance. Salt again is a head of revenue which is extraordinarily unpopular, and I should think the tendency would be gradually to diminish it, and probably in time to get rid of it altogether. Behind all lies the growing cost of defence. Within the last eight months we have had enormous additions cast upon us, through no views of our own, in regard to the military expenditure of the country, and everything points to an increase in that head of outlay; so that the Government of India have to press that the system of contributions should be allowed to stand, and they ask that the most impartial tribunal that can be devised should be set to work as soon as possible to make those contributions, as I said before, a great deal more equitable. They realise the difficulties attached to the present preliminary and tentative scale of contributions, and they want to have the matter put on an equitable basis, with as far as possible the concurrence of the Provinces, especially those which will have to impose fresh taxation in order to come into line with the others.

Then we come to the second aspect of the financial division, that is the division of Provincial revenues into two parts for the services of the two halves of the Government. That point has been argued before your Lordship's Committee, ad nauseam, and I do not want to waste more time upon it, but there are one or two points which perhaps I might be allowed to clear up. It has been suggested in some of the evidence—in fact, I think it was suggested by a note put in by my own colleague, Sir Claude Hill—that the issue is in some way dependent on the decision which the Committee and Parliament arrive at with regard to the method of dealing with the Budget in the Provincial Councils. As you know, the Government of India advise that resolutions passed by the Legislature upon the reserved part of the Budget should be advisory and not binding. But what I want to say is, whether the Joint Committee and Parliament accept this recommendation or reject it, it makes no difference to the separate purse as a proposition on its merits. I mean that the separate purse can be worked equally well even if the Budget resolutions are made binding in the reserved field and that the case for the separate purse is equally strong.

Here again one has to come back, I think, to first principles. There has been a great deal of discussion as regards two alternatives, but very largely of a subsidiary kind, very largely dealing with incidental merits or demerits. Some of your witnesses, for instance, have considered that the joint purse is more educative than the separate purse. Some of them think the joint purse will cause less friction than the separate purse. Those are really matters of opinion; they are very largely speculation. There are speculations in regard to which the Government of India hold an entirely opposite view, but they do not deal with the essential consequence of the separate purse and the joint purse. Some of the Indian gentlemen who have spoken here have dealt very directly with those consequences, and it is those consequences which govern the preference which they have expressed for the joint purse. They are stated perfectly clearly in the quotation which I just picked from Mr. Sastri's evidence. The consequences that this evidence foresees are that into the hands of the popular half of the Government there is placed, through their handling of the purse-strings, a very large measure of control over the policy in regard to subjects which are not under their administrative control, and consequently for which they are not responsible. Now that seems to me the bare, naked issue which has to be settled. Is it consistent with the scheme that this sort of control should be given, and is there any other question which need be answered if it is found to be consistent? All matters of friction, matters of educative influence, the relative and subsidiary merits of the two alternatives, can all find their place, can all settle themselves, once the broad issue is faced and tackled. I have nothing more to say on the subject, except what has been said so often—that it would be very easy to show by figures how a joint purse and how a separate purse would work—and all that I will ask permission to do is to hand in a paper which I found among my old papers; it is a letter which was prepared by a very important firm in Calcutta, Graham and Company, people of the highest commercial standing and financial experience. This letter was apparently written to the Bengal Chamber of Commerce on the subject of the financial arrangements in the Provinces. I knew nothing about it; it is only by sheer accident that I heard of its existence. I happened to be talking to a partner in the firm, and I asked him his view, as a business man, on the proposition. He replied, "We have already sent in our views, and here they are." It is a brief statement, such as would come from a business office, on a matter which they did not look upon as a technical piece of bureaucratic mechanism, and I think it is a very useful contribution to the discussion. (The letter is handed in.)

Now I will turn to the Grand Committee. Here, again, my instructions are to put the matter forward in the simplest and broadest possible form. The question again is this: Are you going to give the official half of the Government any legislative means of securing the measures which it regards as essential for the safety of the Provinces, and for the fulfilment of its responsibility to Parliament for the good government of the Provinces? Now what the Bill offers is a bare majority. It describes the Grand Committee—this is Clause 9, sub-clause (3)—as being a body in which the majority of the members shall be nominated members. That is the whole distance that the Bill goes. Then, when you turn to the report to supplement this, you find that what is proposed is that the nominated majority shall be a bare majority, that is to say, a majority of one, and that only two-thirds of that number—two-thirds of the nominated members—shall be officials. Now let us take for example a Grand Committee of thirty-five members. Under the Bill, read with the report, eighteen would be nominated by the Governor and seventeen would be appointed ad hoc by the Legislature—the non-official members of the Legislature. Out of these eighteen there would be only twelve who would be officials, so that in a Grand Committee of thirty-five you would have twelve officials and twenty-three non-officials. Now some of the evidence which has been given reads as if what is proposed were a majority in favour of Government. I noticed, in the evidence of Mr. Samarth, on page 159, in the first column, in answer to Sir Henry Craik, Mr. Samarth said: "The Grand Committee therefore must be such that it must be constituted as proposed in the original scheme of a bare majority in favour of the Government." Now I want to submit that that, again I say quite unintentionally, does not convey what is in all probability going to happen. If you have a bare majority of nominated members, and if you have only one-third of the total Committee official members, there is absolutely no certainty that you will be able to get the Grand Committee to pass any law which has been certified for its consideration by the Governor, if that law is disliked by the leaders of non-official opinion in the Legislative Council. There was a time when members nominated by the Governor felt it a duty to support the Government, and did so. That time has long passed. I can speak from my own personal experience. In the Council of which I was president for six years, out of a very considerable number of nominated non-officials, in a crisis—I put it quite crudely—I could only count on the votes of two—two out of, I think, eight or nine. The others very naturally took their own line. They said they had been paid the compliment of being nominated, and that they paid me the compliment of voting according to their conscience. That is a most estimable frame of mind, but what I want to point out is that the mere presence of nominated members—of a nominated majority of the Grand Committee—will not secure that the Government will command a majority on any measure which the leaders of the Legislative Council have decided is to be opposed.

Now what do the Government of India ask? They put forward their proposals in a despatch, the 7th of the series, dated the 28th May. That despatch, I am afraid, is very difficult reading. It is full of figures and deductions, which are not probably very easy to follow; but the essence of their argument is extraordinarily simple. They say: We cannot face a position in which the measures which the Governor has certified as essential for the efficient conduct of his own business are liable to be rejected in the Grand Committee. At the same time we do see the grave disadvantage of asking for an official bloc, such as exists in the present councils, and causes so much irritation. We do not ask that Provincial Governments should be put in a better position in the future then they now are in the present Morley-Minto Councils. We have to take risks now, and in some Provinces greater risks than in others, and we are prepared to take exactly the same risks, if they can be reduced to figures, in the future. And, therefore, what we ask is that the ratio of officials to non-officials in the future Grand Committee should be the same as the ratio which the rules of the Morley-Minto Councils allow us to have under existing circumstances. It is quite true that this will not give us an official majority, and we shall have to appoint and to rely upon a certain number of non-official nominees, but we are prepared to take that risk.

It may seem at first sight that there is comparatively little difference between this and what the Report proposes, and when you go into the figures you will find that in some Provinces the figures are very close to those of the Report. But in others they differ considerably. Speaking generally, the difference is one of very vital and grave importance, we consider. We cannot accept a one-third ratio of officials as being sufficient to insure us in carrying out our own work. We are prepared to accept, in order again to cause as little dislocation and as little variation from the present procedure as possible, the same ratio of officials as we are entitled to have under the Morley-Minto regime, and to take the risk of the nominated non-officials voting against us, but we cannot take a greater risk. I do not think I should be misinterpreting the case of the Government of India, if I said that if we are asked to take a greater risk than what we have attempted to describe in the despatch of the 28th May we should rather prefer a system of permanent ordinances, after full discussion in the Legislature, of the nature that has been indicated in the evidence before your Lordship's Committee.

7003. Is that all you want to say?—Yes, on those points.

7004. I think that is a good point to stop. There are one or two other matters you want to speak on, but they are of quite secondary importance?—Yes.

Mr. Montagu.

7005. You told us, I think, at the beginning of your evidence this morning, that the Government of India wish you to adhere to the views that you have expressed in your first hearing. Of course, they have not heard any of the evidence given before us?—No; I do not think anything except the first few days' evidence has yet reached them

7006. Have they commented upon that, because it was entirely yours?—It was entirely mine, yes.

7007. Do you think it would have affected their judgment? Would they expect this Committee to sit from July 10th to August 26th, hearing evidence every day and not be affected by it?—Oh, no; I am sure they would not. I am sure they would be reasonable.

7008. And they might even have been affected themselves if they had heard it, might they not?—I hope so; yes.

7009. I asked that question because you will remember that you told us at your first hearing that they had made their suggested alterations in the scheme, not so much as the result of evidence that they had heard, or criticism that had been offered, but from their own private cogitations and contemplations?—Only partly that, I think—partly from the very detailed criticism that had been offered upon the scheme by the executive authorities throughout British India. I have no desire to appear impenetrable. I am only trying to-day to supplement evidence, which on the first occasion when I appeared here had naturally to be of a very general character, and to press points which although they were in the mind of the Government of India at the time, it was not possible to put forward in full detail. I do not, for a moment, suggest that if the Government of India had been present during this inquiry they would not have found material for thought and possibly variation.

7010. I think I am right in saying that, except for your evidence, no single witness that has appeared before us has advocated the separate purse?—I am afraid not.

7011. Is not there really a vital difference of principle between your view and the view of the Bill and of the report? I think you stated it quite clearly when you said that you wanted, as far as possible, to hand over the transferred subjects, and you claimed as a corresponding right to be left alone in the reserved subjects. That is your principle?—To be left alone in control, while fully amenable to the modifying influences of popular opinion.

7012. Is it not true to say that the principle of the Bill, and of the report, was that Ministers should decide under the influence and advice of the Executive Council in transferred subjects, and that the Executive Council should decide under the influence and advice of Ministers and the Legislative Council in the reserved subjects?—Yes, I accept influence and advice; I object to control.

7014. But there has got to be a certain control of Ministers inherent in duality, has there not?—The only control that we foresee is the paternal control, if I may use the word, which the Governor exercises in helping and guiding men who have had no previous experience of administration. We certainly did never contemplate any interference or control by the Governor in Council with the action of Ministers.

7015. Is it not a fair counterpart of that sort of paternal control to suggest that the parent himself should be subject to the influence of a growing child whose wishes have been rather largely disregarded in the past?—Oh, yes; but we do not propose that the child should carry the cane.

7016. Let us go a little further with that. Let us test the difference between you and the Bill by your remarks about the Grand Committee. You remember that the Grand Committee scheme, and the proportion suggested for its composition, was drawn up by a Joint Committee of the Government of India as it then was and the delegation which accompanied me to India?—I was not there. I believe that was so; yes.

7017. And it was done deliberately and designedly not to give the Local Government complete power to pass any legislation that it liked. You made that criticism of it, and it is obvious on the face of it?—Yes.

7018. Theoretically, surely, if your arguments were valid against that composition of the Grand Committee, what you ought to ask for is an official bloc?—I quite agree. I tried to explain that we were very anxious to avoid an official bloc, partly because of the inherent viciousness of the system, and partly because we were anxious to ask for no more than we have at present.

7019. As soon as you make that concession, does not the whole of your argument upon principle become vitiated?—It becomes deflected to the extent to which the power of independent control is diminished under the present Morley-Minto system. I ought to have made that clearer than I did. I have always endeavoured to state that we do not desire to go back; we are perfectly content to stay where we are in regard to legislation, finance, and everything else where we have been placed under the scheme which now regulates our government. But as regards the moving forward, we say that that movement ought to tke place in the field which is specially demarcated for the purpose.

7020. Absolutely and entirely, without any sort or kind of progress or movement in anything else but the transferred subjects? That is your position?—That would be the rigid, logical, inhuman statement of the case, I admit, and I tried to modify that by saying that there will be, in spite of that, a very strong psychological movement due to the increasing influence and power of the Ministers and those whom they represent. I do not wish, and the Government of India do not wish, that influence to be insidiously converted into control.

7021. You admit that there must be control of your legislation, because there is control of your legislation now?—Yes.

7022. But you dig your heels into the ground, if I may say so, and say, as the price of getting control in your own transferred subjects you must leave us absolutely where we are to-day in the reserved subjects. That is your case?—That is so.

7023. And you say to people who would like great progress in the transferred subjects, and some progress in the reserved subjects: You must trust to us to pay more regard in the future to your wishes, because you have more opportunity of expressing them?—Quite so.

7024. But do you not think that your whole attitude—I do not mean you personally now, but the attitude of the Government of India—on this matter affords one reason why people would prefer something more definite than that trust of you in the future? Is not it a clue to what will happen?—We are always being invited to accord greater trust to the representatives of the people, and we ask a similar confidence and a similar compliment from them. I think that trust on both sides will gradually solve these difficulties.

7025. But is this attitude which you are putting today doing your share of that mutual confidence?—I think so. I put it on another ground. I would suggest that this is a very great experiment, of which we do not see the results, and that experiment, as I tried to say to-day, will probably work out on lines of evolution which are very different from those which we can now calculate. I do plead that on the scientific ground there are the greatest possible advantages in restricting your experiment to definite factors. We all know when a scientific experiment has to be made you try to eliminate everything except the particular factor which you are testing. That is exactly what is to happen here. If you hand over to the Ministers and the popular voice a very large field of very important functions of government, it is desirable to see how they work, how they administer, how the results come out, without being at the same time embarrassed and puzzled by having to evaluate the effect of their roundabout methods of control over the field in which we try to govern, if only for the purpose of comparison with our own methods.

7026. Let me sum up the situation once more, so that I may be quite sure that I understand it. The principle of the Bill is greater control in the transferred subjects, greater influence in the reserved subjects?—Yes.

7027. Your answer is as great control as possible in the transferred subjects and no machinery for greater influence in the reserved subjects?—The machinery exists. I would accept your statement of the spirit of the Bill as a statement which the Government of India fully accept. But when you come to add a machinery of influence we only ask that that machinery should not be a machinery of control.

7028. I am sorry to press you upon it, but it is, to my mind, of great importance. In either case, if this Committee accepts the Grand Committee of the Government of India, or accepts the Grand Committee of the Report, it is a machine of some control?—Undoubtedly.

7029. But the principle to which you stick is that there should be no more control than there is at present?—No more control than at present.

7030. No new machinery for control?—Quite so.

7031. And you say rather than submit to a step forward in that direction of any kind whatever you would prefer an ordinance such as has been suggested—an ordinance after discussion?—What I said was, rather than submit to the continuous chances and in many cases the virtual certainty of being unable to pass measures which we have a reasonable chance of passing at present, we would go back to ordinances.

7032. Would you agree that no ordinance should be passed without the sanction of the Secretary of State in Council to introduce it?—Yes.

7033. I forget whether you yourself or the Government of India, as at present advised, is in favour of a Select Committee of both Houses?—The Government of India advised that it should be a Committee of both Houses, I think, in their first despatch.

Mr. Montagu—continued.

7034. Would you agree that an ordinance should be submitted to such a Select Committee and to Parliament before it has the effect of law?—I think that is more a matter for the decision of the Secretary of State, the Minister in charge, than for the useful opinion of the Government of India.

7035. Let me just put it in this way to you: If the Government of India or a Local Government, is liable to be overriden on the subject of an ordinance, either by the Secretary of State or by Parliament on the Report of the Select Committee, does it make any difference to them which it is?—Oh, no.

7036. You began your evidence with, if I may say so, a very valuable discussion on rules. The rules under the Bill are to be made largely by the Government of India?—Yes.

7037. Do you approve of that suggestion? Do you think that that is the right way to make them?—In regard to the classes of rules which are so stipulated in the Bill I think it is quite satisfactory, yes.

7038. It is of course, impossible to draft the rules, either by the Government of India or by this Committee, or by the Secretary of State, until the Bill has been passed into law?—Oh, yes, in anything like a final form, certainly.

7039. At the same time it is important to avoid a charge such as was made against the last scheme of reforms in India, that the scheme has been spoilt by the rules?—It is important to avoid that charge. I never quite understood what underlay the charge.

7040. I am not sure that I did either. But I do not want to go into that controversy; I wanted to ask you if you could help us to devise machinery to avoid that charge?—The Government of India certainly have never made any difficulty about the freest criticism and previous publication of rules of any importance, and I certainly do not think they would in this case. Publication, in practice, would take place in India—that is to say, publication before the rules are finally made; but I can see no reason why they should not be similarly published in England.

7041. And no reason, if there was a Parliamentary Committee such as this is, for their not considering the rules?—Quite.

7042. You apprehend no difficulty, proceeding upon the suggestions in your drafts, of this Committee advising on the policy of the rules?—I think in many instances it would be extraordinarily helpful to the Government of India to know in advance what is the policy which this Committee read into the Bill, because it will materially influence and direct the framing of the subsidiary regulations.

7043. You said that you adhered to the your recommendation that part of education should not be transferred. Did you hear Sir Michael Sadler's evidence?—Yes.

7044. Did that move you at all?—In two different directions, yes.

7045. May I analyse that painful process?—Would it be permissible for me to make a short statement on the subject, because it is difficult to piece together the argument from a question such as you put to me? The main issue with regard to the treatment of education, as either a reserved or a transferred subject, was definitely put in Sir Michael Sadler's evidence. That issue, as we read it, is whether education as a whole is an indivisible unit, or whether it is a subject which can be divided between two administrative authorities. Perhaps I may be permitted before attempting to answer that question to take up an argument which has been heard by this Committee, that if education is an impartible subject, the whole of it had much better go to that side of the Government which has to deal with primary education, inasmuch as the primary stages are so much bigger and in many ways so tremendously important. If the whole question could be dealt with as one that had never been approached before, in other words, if we could handle it in vacuo, I think the Government of India would entirely agree, but it would be subject to the very important provision that Sir Michael Sadler laid down, that we should first get our Universities into order. I forget his words, but that was the purport of his main argument. What I have been asked to put as clearly as possible before this Committee is, that we do not believe that in the present conditions in India—I go no further than that—education is an impartible subject. The Government of India have listened, and I am sure will listen, with the greatest respect to expert opinion that is taken on the subject here, but their position up to the time at which I left India was that their own chief expert, the Educational Commissioner of the Government of India (and certainly no one knows the conditions of Indian education better than Mr. Sharp) definitely advised us that education—again I say under present conditions—is clearly a subject which can be divided for purposes of administration; and he went further, and said that it would be divided with great advantage, inasmuch as primary education would then get a reasonable opportunity for development; it would get its own staff and its own policy, much more attention would be given to it, and it would not live as it does now on the crumbs from the table of higher education. Secondly, the actual concrete fact exists that in certain Provinces, my own Provincefor example, University and secondary education are under one authority, and primary education is under another; so that the Government of India had not only expert opinion in favour of partition, but also the fact that partition at the present moment exists. Of course it is quite true that partition cannot be made between the University and the high schools which feed it. If there is to be a line of demarcation, it lies between the Universities-cum-high schools on the one side, and the primary, or, speaking almost in synonymous terms, the vernacular schools on the other side. What we feel is that inasmuch as the control of primary education at the present moment is in the hands of local bodies we must leave it in those hands. But in regard to University and secondary education the matter is very much more difficult owing to two main reasons. One is the state of our Universities, and the other is the very great weakness that has been shown in private effort in regard to secondary education. I do not mean anything offensive by "weakness," I only mean it has failed in its purposes to a very large extent. I have again no desire to wound any susceptibilities, but it is necessary to talk quite frankly about a matter of this tremendous importance to the future of India; and I would like as far as possible to talk from my own experience so as to bring facts rather than theories to bear upon it. It was pointed out yesterday, I think, that the development of high school education in Bengal is very largely the result of private effort. Now that is true in other Provinces, though certainly not to the same extent as in Bengal. I should like to make it perfectly clear that the Government of India have no desire whatever to interfere with it; they have no desire to stop private effort. It would be the most foolish and impossible thing in the world to imagine that we should step in and establish, guide and control every single high school in India. The more we can encourage private effort and enlist local interest and sympathy the better, and our whole policy has moved in that direction. All that we mean when we ask that secondary education should be reserved and not transferred is that it should be the official half of the Government which guides the general policy of secondary schools, provides them with grants, and generally encourages them to take their proper place in a really sound educational system.

Now Sir Michael Sadler (and here, I am afraid, after a long proem, I am trying to answer your question) said that his inclinations were in favour of transferring higher education on two conditions. I have not got his evidence, and I cannot refer to the exact words, but, broadly speaking, the conditions were, first, that Universities in India should first be put on a sound footing, and secondly that there should be a Board of Control over secondary education for the assistance of Ministers. Our whole point is that our Universities are not yet in a state in which they can undertake the charge of secondary education. The lines that Sir Michael Sadler has indicated in his report, with which I think we are all in entire accord, will involve a vast amount of labour and a vast amount of time, and that labour has to be done, and must be done, by the official Government, because they alone have got at present the driving power and the funds to do it, or indeed the command of expert knowledge. So that our clear duty, as we view it, is to get that difficulty put out of the way before any further step is taken in the development of responsible government. When that difficulty is put out of the way—I should like to be perfectly clear about that—when we do get our Universities on to a footing of real genuine democratic responsibility, with a realisation of the tremendous importance of their duties, then I am sure that the Government of India will be perfectly prepared to consider the question of varying from the position which it now takes up. There is another consideration that I should like to put before this Committee, and that is that the University is really only one of the doors through which the high schools at present pour out boys, and a few girls, into the world of business. The University has its own matriculation test, and attracts a very considerable ratio of the students from high schools. But what we are endeavouring to do more and more, and I hope with more and more success, is to make the high school also an entrance to that vast field of middle-class life and energy where a good, sound, all-round education is of the highest importance, even though it is not crowned by a University degree, and for that purpose we are establishing—in some Provinces it has been already a great success—a School Leaving, or School Final Certificate, which at present—again I speak for my own Province, the Province I know—is under the control of the Provincial Government and not of the University. I think we still have to make quite sure whether our Universities are prepared to take over this very important part of the work of secondary education before we can talk about transfers. However, I want to hark back again to personal experience, and just touch upon the weaknesses which I think it is our imperative duty to get rid of before we can think of handing over secondary and higher education to popular control. The two great weaknesses at present with which we have constantly to contend, and in contending with which we are liable to constant attacks, as if we were enemies of education, are first of all the inevitable tendency to drop standards, to be content with lower standards of educational qualifications for school certificates and University degrees; and secondly, constantly very much associated with that, the pathetic attempts to increase the quantity of literati and graduates, without very much regard to the quality. I do not think we can do a greater or more cruel wrong to India than to recognise those two weaknesses or to give any ground for perpetuating them; the whole of our work ought to be to check them, and we can check them with greater power and greater success than Ministers will be able to do during the first stages of their work.

I might perhaps add a third great difficulty which has been touched on in evidence, and that is the constant attempts to bring in schoolboys and University undergraduates into the work of politics. I know very well that Mr. Gokhale strongly resented this, and did his very utmost to prevent it, and that those who are carrying his mantle feel exactly in the same way. But still the fact remains, that scattered about the country, out of control of the Central agencies, the local politician is constantly tempted to bring in the boys of the neighbouring schools or the boys of a college, if it happens to be near, to form his gallery, and we all know from practical experience in India that that constantly happens. There is no reason why boys should not amuse themselves with amateur politics if they like, but what has happened is that politics has become an obsession to the extent of crowding out much of their other work, interfering very seriously with their scholastic work, and I think the temptation to that in every direction is one which is tending to grow, and which may become a very grave evil, and against which I think it would be very much more more difficult for Ministers to set their faces than it is for us. That is an example of where the present tendencies lead us. I would simply mention two concrete difficulties which are always being felt by us, as people who try to administer education. One is that we have always endeavoured to limit the number of students who may belong to one class in a school or in a college. We are constantly being pressed to increase that number, from 30 to 40, from 40 to 50, and so on in the interests of quantity versus quality, and if we acceded to those requests, if we gave way one inch over certain definite lines we have laid down for ourselves, we should arrive at a state of affairs in which no student would ever get anything like personal attention from the lecturer or teacher under whom he is sitting. That is one difficulty.

Another difficulty which I have found myself constantly up against in the United Provinces was the impossibility of getting private colleges to concentrate at all. As you know, the Universities in India have a very large field of options for their degrees, a large number of groups of subjects which can be taken, especially for the Arts degree. Now, the tendency for every little college scattered all over the country is to try to teach all these groups. It means having an enormous number of subjects, and it means having an enormous number of underpaid teachers, because their funds do not go round; they do not provide efficient teachers. I have actually seen in quite a reputable college, a lecturer who was imported as a specialist in physics and set to work to teach physics, and for some reason, owing perhaps to the failure of some of the students who had gone up from that college to the University, to get a creditable degree in physics, the college decided to drop the subject, and they sent for this gentleman and asked him if he would mind lecturing in philosophy. He said he had seen a few books on philosophy when he was an undergraduate, but that was the extent of his acquaintance with it, and he had to set to work. That sort of thing is absolutely fatal to real collegiate education, and what we have been endeavouring to do, what I certainly endeavoured to do in the United Provinces was to get colleges by agreement to take particular groups of subjects to pay men who could teach those groups sufficiently, and to refuse steadfastly to deal with a vast variety of options which students ask them to coach them for. In that we have had the greatest possible opposition from parents, and I know that in private colleges the authorities are unable to face that opposition. I say that is the sort of opposition which the official Government is in a much stronger position to deal with than Ministers will be for the present.

I do not think it is necessary to adduce evidence of how disappointing in many ways private effort has been, with the best possible intentions. You see evidence of it all through the Bengal District Report; you see the saddest possible evidence of it in the Rowlatt Report, and I think you find very considerable evidence of it in Sir Michael Sadler's lengthy Report. The Government of India asked me to put before this Committee two striking cases which they had to deal with. One was the Dayaram Jethmal College in Sindh, where the Government had to come in and take over the control in its most drastic form to save a very important educational institution from collapse and ruin. Another is the great Khalsa college of Amritsar, which is the centre of orthodox Sikh education. Here also things had got so bad that the Government had to come and give the Lieutenant-Governor personally the power to step in, suspend the rules and direct the administration of the trustees. In my own experience we made a most excellent start with what was going to be the great Benares Hindoo University, and by the time I left India the position had turned from the rosiest to the gloomiest. As long as we had one extraordinarily capable and very exceptional Vice-Chancellor the thing was held together; since he died there has been a succession of catastrophes, and I understand quite recently the present Vice-Chancellor resigned and four of the leading Indian professors resigned. They found it impossible to get on. The last example I would mention is that of the Mohammedan Anglo-Oriental College at Aligarh. I have watched that college from the days of its founder, and it has been a melancholy tale in recent years of steady decline owing to the fact that the trustees allowed political agitation and a very distorted form of Mohammedan nationalism to interfere with the whole administration of the college. It took away practically all power of discipline from the instructional staff, and the matter came to a head the other day by the resignation of every European member of the staff of the college. The future, to my mind, is extremely gloomy.

I said

Mr. Montagu—continued.

I said that I do not want to tread on any susceptibilities, and I am sorry if I have done so, but I have pointed out frankly that those are the sort of things which are happening in all our experience, that we do not want these things to happen, and that those Indian gentlemen who are associated with us are equally alarmed and distressed that they should happen. But we feel that until we are able to put our Universities into a position in which they will take over the handling of those very difficult and controversial problems we are better able to serve the educational interests of India in the matter of higher secondary and University education than Ministers would be at present. In saying that I do not attempt to look a day beyond the first ten years of this experiment.

7046. That is a very gloomy picture. You suggest it cannot be cured by Ministers—that it ought not to be dealt with by Ministers acting with the advice and influence of their official colleagues, although you have just said that Indian opinion was strongly with you in fearing these results?—Well, what I fear is this. I am sure that the Ministers would do their utmost to correct those evils, just as we should, but I do feel that the pressure of outside, uninstructed opinion upon Ministers in this particular field would be so great, and so insistent, that they would be deflected from their ideals in a manner which, I hope, would not be the case with us.

7047. It is curious, if I may say so, that you derive your experience from the United Provinces, the present Lieutenant-Governor of which, with a comparable experience, comes to precisely the opposite conclusion. I have only two other questions to ask you. I am sorry to have taken up so much of the Committee's time. Would you mind repeating the sentence which you used about the Executive Councillors not being Ministers. What exactly did you mean by that—that they were not to be influenced in their decisions by the discussion of the Legislative Councils?—No. All I was pleading for was that the present statutory position of the Executive Councils should be retained in their own field. I did not mean to go any further than that.

7048. The last question I want to ask you is about the Government of India. A criticism has been made before this Committee of the scheme of the Bill and of the Report that you will not get the best men into the Legislative Assembly unless you give the Legislative Assembly more defined powers, and also that you are by the scheme in the Bill and in the Report inaugurating a system which is open to all the criticisms which have been made of the Morley-Minto Councils. Has that evidence impressed you at all?—What impressed me very much was the criticism that the proposals with regard to the Central Government were not only open to the objections of the Minto-Morley scheme, but that they also contained in them the elements of the heresy of the Congress-League scheme. If I may answer your question perfectly frankly it did impress me; but I am still wandering in the dark for a solution. Might I just try to put the matter as it appears to me—the difficulty as it appears to me, and the possible line of exit? As you know, the feeling in regard to the Government of India was that when you were making very great changes in the Provinces and contemplating making very considerable changes in the Secretary of State's methods of administration, it would be impossible to leave the intermediate grade of the Government of India unaffected, and at the same time it was felt, I think we all felt, that the present Legislature of the Government of India is so small that it does not adequately represent the very varied interests in India which have a right to be heard in that Assembly. So that if you will pardon the presumption, I have always felt that the authors of the Report were led into the position they took by considerations which were rather different from those which have produced the avowedly democratic Legislatures in the Provinces, and that having reached that position, in order to avoid anomaly there was no course open except to superimpose on this Assembly a Second Chamber, which would be a legislative organ, so to speak, in harmony with the needs of the Executive Government.

Mr. Montagu—continued.

What I wish to say is that if it is felt that there is a dilemma inherent in the present situation I do hope that there will be no attempt to solve it by the method of diarchy in the Government of India. To my mind it would be quite impossible—I have to speak without any brief in this matter; I am trying to express what I believe would be the views of the Government of India, but I am not sure of them—what I feel is that you could not put in a Minister into the Central Executive in order to look after, as has been suggested, the development of the popular movement in the Provinces. That is the work of the Governor and of nobody else, and there cannot be a power above and outside him other than the constituted authorities for the special encouragement and surveillance of that branch of his work; nor, on the other hand, can you divide the work of the Government of India in the way in which you divide that of the Provinces, mainly because the subjects are entirely different, and we have not reached a stage at which we foresee the gradual smooth transfer of one important Imperial subject after another to popular control. Nor do I think that a bifurcated Executive in the Government of India is conceivable at the present moment. We do want, while this great experiment is going on in the Provinces, to retain the power of the Government of India, its power for good, we trust, as effective, as clear, and at the same time as flexible as possible; and it would be neither clear nor flexible if you bifurcated it and brought in the diarchic principle. Nor, indeed, do I feel that there is much to be said for the theory that in the Government of India's field of administration there is a class of domestic subjects and a class of subjects of a higher scale. There are no subjects which will in future be controlled by the Government of India that I can think of, which are not either directly or indirectly related to external affairs or affected by international arrangements, or which do not involve great financial and fiscal issues. I do not see any light in either of these methods, and if it is still felt that there is a dilemma and we have to get out of it, my only nostrum is that we should wait until we know something about the fate of the experiment in the Provinces. But, in the meantime, I quite contemplate that a practice—a convention, if you like—will grow up by which measures of a particular type more particularly affecting the social life of India will be thrown open to the Assembly very much more than at present. Officials will be told to vote exactly as they think right, without inquiring what is the policy of the Executive Government; there will be no Government whip. I think a practice and convention of that sort will in time afford very great relief, and will probably be the best way out of any difficulties that you feel at present. One can picture at once certain Bills in regard to which in the past there has been difficulty, and in regard to which it would be of the greatest possible advantage that the Assembly should take full responsibility. I might mention Mr. Jinnah's Bill, which has been referred to in evidence, on Mohammedan Succession. It is a complicated thing, and it is difficult to find a single word in English which describes it. I should also certainly mention Mr. Basu's Marriage Bill of several years ago, in regard to which I think, if I may say so, we looked rather foolish in having to oppose it when it was essentially a matter for decision by the popular voice. That, to my mind, is the only way, at the present moment, I can see out of the dilemma, if it is felt to be a dilemma.

7049. If I may ask you to prophesy, do you contemplate that at some time or other there will be diarchy in the Government of India?—I should think that that would be the natural evolution ultimately.

7050. Would it really affect the stability of the Government of India? I am not now expressing my own view at all, but putting a question arising out of the evidence. Would it affect the Government of India very much if there was a Minister in charge of the supply, development and taxation of salt, that is if the Salt Department were in the hands of a Minister?—I was Secretary of the Salt Department at one time, and the work did not occupy more than two hours a week.

7051. That would be your objection to the Salt Department, but are there not other Departments of that kind which could be grouped with salt?—Possibly there are. It is not a question of finding work for Ministers;

Mr. Montagu—continued.

Ministers; it is a question of the propriety of bringing Ministerial influence into the homogeneity of the Executive Government.

7052. I ask you this question, because it has been made a point of by other witnesses; assuming that Parliament approves of the Council of State procedure and composition such as has been suggested in the Bill, is it likely that it will often be used for anything else but legislation designed to maintain order or the defence of India?—It would certainly be required for those purposes, and it might be required for technical matters of a commercial type; that is to say, company law or the laws relating to banking. I think in those cases it will probably be as well to remove subjects which very vitally affect the commercial world of India from the risk of popular misunderstanding.

7053. As you have now been addressing the Committee in your personal capacity, may I put one last question? After hearing from day to day the evidence, much of which has been directed to increasing the scope of the Bill—to demanding more than the Bill gives—is there any single point upon which you think that that evidence could be met?—I start with a tremendous handicap: I have lived in these conditions for many years—conditions which familiarise me with the constant demand that a gift should be increased—and I am not probably quite so much impressed by the claims for a further advance as others might be. But, speaking quite frankly, if I had to decide, and if I felt, as I certainly should feel, that all this evidence should not be listened to in vain, my disposition would be to adhere to the structure and principles of the Bill; but, if necessary, to enlarge the field of transferred subjects.

7054. Your evidence has been directed to cutting it down?—Only in regard to two particular matters.

Sir Henry Craik.

7055. I have only one question to ask you. You accept the principle laid down by Mr. Montagu as underlying the Bill, that of increasing responsible Government—the popular element of Government?—Yes.

7056. But in the dual system you wish that the Executive should also have free action uncontrolled, although subject to the influence and the advice of the popular element?—Quite so.

7057. Now that does not imply that you, in any way, wish to check the advance of the popular element? Your method of advancing that popular element would be gradually to increase the number of transferred subjects?—Quite so—by gradually increasing its direct responsibility rather than its indirect control.

7058. Rather than by setting up at the outset direct control over those subjects which are not controlled?—Exactly.

7059. You would increase the popular influence by gradually adding to the number of transferred subjects?—That is my plea, yes.

Marquess of Crewe.

7060. With regard to the Grand Committee, I understand you maintain that the Governor cannot absolutely rely upon the support of all the nominated non-officials, and that therefore you would maintain the same ratio that exists at present between the number of officials and non-officials for this purpose?—In the various Provinces, yes. It differs in different Provinces, as you know.

7061. Yes, it differs in various cases. You are assuming all through that all the elected members in a given matter would vote against the Government?—I have to assume the worst. There will be cases in which they probably would.

7062. I remember years ago, when I was Colonial Secretary, similar cases often came to my notice, and I remember saying that I had not a very high opinion of a Governor who did not bring over to his point of view—of course, entirely by constitutional means—some of the elected members of his Assembly or Council. Would you think that that possibility might apply sometimes in India?—I think it will. But one has, in cases of establishing a safeguard, hateful though the word may be, on a very vital issue, to try to make the safeguard effective. I really feel that if the course which your Lordship suggests had been before the Government of India six months ago they would probably have been much more flexible on the subject, but the attempt to reason with, and secure the support of, the smallest number of non-official Indians in regard to the Rowlatt Bill legislation has rather shaken us.

7063. Taking what might be called for this purpose an extreme instance, the Government of India think that there is a definite danger of trouble unless they are secured, at any rate to the limited extent they are at present?—Yes.

7064. Then with regard to the instructions to Governors, you say that a draft instruction was prepared in the first instance by the Government of India?—Yes; it is an appendix to one of the despatches.

7065. Do you know why it was originally prepared in India and not at the India Office?—The Government of India were only anxious to put into some formal statement the points which they hold should be incorporated in the ultimate draft instructions. They did not for a moment suggest that it should be regarded as anything more than matter for discussion.

7066. The main consideration and solution of the question rests, of course, with the India Office—the Secretary of State in Council?—Clearly.

7067. Have the general draft instructions been finally prepared?—Not finally. I have a draft here. I do not think the Secretary of State has approved of it yet.

7068. Have the Government of India asked you to express any opinions on the Report on Home Administration?—They have sent, by telegram, certain opinions to the Secretary of State; they have not authorised me to do anything more.

7069. Therefore, you would not say anything?—I should only be repeating what they have said in a very short series of telegrams, which I think are probably before the Committee.

Sir J. D. Rees.

7070. I ask you as an ex-Lieutenant-Governor when a Provincial Government is asked to report, or was asked with regard to reforms embodied in the Bill, is the opinion of the Lieutenant-Governor only invited thereby or also the public opinion, the opinion of his Province, so far as he can express it?—There are occasionally a few, generally either very confidential or very technical matters, in which the Lieutenant-Governor is asked for his own opinion. I recollect in my period of service only three cases in which I was told not to show the papers to anybody else. But, apart from those entirely exceptional circumstances, the ordinary procedure is to obtain public opinion as freely as possible. It is sometimes done by gazetting, and sometimes by asking district officials to consult the men in their districts on whom they most rely for a good opinion. Speaking quite generally, public opinion is invoked to the largest possible extent.

7071. You would not agree that it is for a Provincial Government to express its own views, and not those of the articulate classes. That was a statement made by one representative of a Provincial Government, whereas the representative of another Provincial Government said that a Provincial Governor would be bound also to state public opinion. I gather you would accept the latter statement?—Oh, yes.

7072. What do you think would be the effect of the reforms, to which the Bill is designed to give effect, upon the £400,000,000 odd of foreign capital now invested in India, and upon the introduction of any more capital?—I have very little apprehension of the effect of this on British capital at present—on outside capital. In the first instance the larger commercial interests are mainly under the custodianship of the Central Government, rather than of the Provinces, and, in the second instance, one has every hope that the interests represented by that capital will come in and take their share in the development of constitutional life as it grows.

7073. In saying that, do you feel that you are saying anything which is contrary to the opinion, let me say, of the commercial community of Cawnpore or Calcutta, to instance two wealthy centres which you know well?—I do not think that either of those two centres are withdrawing capital from India.

7074. Is not the devolution from the Government of India to the Provincial Governments an immensely important point, and do you consider it ought to be left to the rules and not embodied in the Bill?—The difficulty about that—and it has been very fully examined—is that the authority of the Secretary of State is at present very largely exercised under a general formula that can hardly be varied without materially undermining his power. What we contemplate is that when the financial rules, the very rigid financial rules, are relaxed, that then automatically will disappear a great part of the intervention which at present is regarded as somewhat meticulous and probably vexatious.

7075. I am also speaking of the devolution from the Government of India to the Provinces?—That, again, will take the form very largely of altering a vast amount of laws on the Statute Book, rules and regulations, and it would be extremely difficult to formulate the principle in words.

7076. I suppose you realise that granting a rule-making power on a very large scale is not very popular in Parliament?—I am not familiar with that.

7077. Do you know of any Bill which gives so much rule-making power as is found in this Bill?—In the Indian Legislature?

7078. No, in any Bill that you are acquainted with?—No, I do not know of any Bill in my own personal experience which goes quite so far as this, I think.

7079. It is a marked feature of the present Bill?—Yes.

7080. Are not some of these rules vital to the working of the reforms?—I have attempted to say so to-day.

7081. Might it not be said that the whole policy of the reforms in very importnat aspects is left to rules?—A very material part of policy is, yes.

7082. Therefore we cannot really judge the Bill without knowing the rules which are to be made?—I have attempted to say that I think it would be very helpful in judging the Bill to see the rules proposed to be made, and possibly to dictate the main principles underlying some of the rules.

7083. You think the principles could be laid down defining the rules before the Bill is introduced?—I think it is a question between inserting those principles in the Bill itself or giving an authoritative expression of them for the guidance of the authorities who have to make them.

7084. Supposing the rules prove unpopular, will it not be said that they constitute a breach of faith?—I believe something of that sort has been said about the regulations under the Morley-Minto scheme, but as I have said to-day, I am not familiar with the reasons which justify that statement.

7085. But this is quite a new situation arising now. Do you not think it is very probable that there will be a charge of breach of faith if the rules are dislocated?—If the rules do not come up to expectations?

7086. Yes?—It is quite possible.

7087. On the other hand, if the rules are settled in advance, would it not be better to embody them in the Bill?—If the rules were settled in advance they would have the same validity as the Bill; but that is entirely a matter for Parliamentary exigencies, I think.

7088. How do you think diarchy can determine responsibility or define responsibility if the Governor may at any time have to intervene with his veto?—The decision to take responsibility will have been manifested by the time it reaches the stage of a veto. After all, a veto is an exceptional thing; it is not daily procedure.

7089. The tendency of a veto is to destroy responsibility, is it not?—I see your point.

7090. Now, you have said very clearly that the Executive Council proper must not be interfered with in the matter of reserved subjects. You have seen, no doubt, the Memorandum of the Government of Bombay, which shows conclusively that reserved and transferred subjects are closely entangled in all sorts of ways?—I have seen that, yes.

7091. How, then, do you think each half of the Government can act independently, as you said?—In the narrative of procedure, which I have suggested I might be allowed to draw up for the help of the Committee, the mechanism—one can only speak of the mechanism, one cannot forecast the spirit—the mechanism of dealing with those compllicated questions will be set forth. They have been set out in rules, and it is really for the Committee to decide whether they deal with the matter satisfactorily or not.

7092. Out of this mutual independence which you contemplate might not perennial conflict possibly arise?—My view is that with independence and spontaneous collaboration there is much less chance of permanent conflict than there would be under a system of forced association.

7093. I think you told us that there is a demand that the reserved subjects also should be controlled by popular Ministers as mouthpieces of the majority in the Legislative Councils; will not that demand be pressed with all the power of agitation which the Home Rule Party possesses?—I think a decision by Parliament now will go a very long way to steady political feeling on the subject.

7094. Would you agree that it is impossible to hope that the reforms will work smoothly if agitation proceeds on the scale on which you have seen it in recent years?—Yes; I think so.

7095. Tranquillity is the first condition of success in the reforms, is it not?—I think that reasonable tranquillity is essential.

7096. I think you agree, as I have often pointed out, that the official bloc does not really exist now, because the nominated members generally vote as they please?—It does not exist in the Provinces, no.

7097. Now, is this Grand Committee intended to give one-half of the Government the power of passing a Bill, or is it not?—That is what I understand, yes.

7098. It is to give them that power?—Yes.

7099. If it is to give them that power, then the majority must be assured of its majority, must it not?—If every Bill is automatically to pass there certainly ought to be a majority.

7100. Is it not the object of the Grand Committee that the Bill shall pass?—I certainly understand that the Grand Committee was devised in order to give what may be called a reasonable opportunity for the acceptance of measures which the Governor feels he is bound to certify.

7101. But if there is to be a certain majority in the Grand Committee, then any discussion on that Grand Committee must be farcical?—An official majority?

7102. If there is to be an assured majority?—Yes.

7103. It must be farcical. If the Grand Committee is not intended to give the certainty of passing a Government Bill, what is the use of it—

Chairman.

7104. You did not assent to the proposition that it must be farcical, did you?—No; it would not be farcical, because there would be very free discussion on the subject, and possibly an opportunity of moulding opinion.

Lord Sydenham.

7105. Which discussion would only duplicate the larger discussion which had previously taken place in the Legislative Council?—Yes.

7106. Would you go so far as I would go, and say that a Bill should not pass if it were opposed by two-thirds of the elected members?—In the Grand Committee?

7107. No, in the Council—that the Bill should not pass if it were opposed by two-thirds of the elected members?—No, you are going far beyond anything I have suggested.

7108. I know. You think that would not do?—I think that might have the effect of paralysing the Executive Government.

7109. But in that case the responsibility for the loss of a Bill which some Indians might want would be brought home?—Quite.

7120. I think you said diarchy might ultimately be adopted in the Government of India; but, of course, you think that that would depend entirely upon the success or failure which it shows in the Provincial Governments?—Entirely.

7111. There

7111. There have been some very serious riots in the Punjab which might have spread over the whole Province. Do you think that a Government the parts of which are to work independently would be able to deal with a great emergency of that kind?—Yes. We looked into that question very carefully, and I think I have the clear authority of the Viceroy for saying that under the scheme of the Bill there would be no power lacking which he exercised in dealing with the Punjab disturbance. I know he felt that very strongly, and I think he would authorise me to say so.

7112. That is the view of the Government of India, that the two independent halves of any Provincial Government would have as much authority in an emergency which had to be dealt with quickly as it now has?—I think so.

7113. We have had a good deal of evidence that the Universities are already under Indian control. Do you agree to that?—To some measure; not wholly.

7114. But you would agree, I suppose, that all that the Government could do in the way of reforms would have to be done by persuading the present controllers of the University?—As at present?

7115. Yes—by persuasion, I mean?—That is the case.

7116. I only want to ask you one more general question. I think you said in your Budget speech that twelve hundred million rupees had passed out of currency within four years, and principally within the last two years. Am I correct?—I think so.

7117. What does that mean?—It means hoarding and melting.

7118. Both?—Both.

7119. If it means hoarding, must it not also mean fear or uncertainty of what may be going to happen?—It must be remembered that the hoarding began during the war, at a time when the success of the British arms was not assured. It is also closely associated with the rise in the value of silver.

Chairman.] I want the Press kindly to take note of this point, that the evidence as it is printed at present is unrevised, and therefore wholly insufficient for anyone to rely on, but revised copies of the evidence will be issued eventually. I want that great distinction to be made between the final form of the revised evidence which will be issued and the unrevised copies which exist at present.

(After a short adjournment.)

Lord Sinha.

7120. Sir James, with regard to Clause 9 of the Bill, do you adhere to what you said on the last occasion with regard to the allotments in relation to reserved subjects that the provision in the Bill is still unacceptable to the Government of India?—I have had no further instructions from the Government of India, but what I should be disposed to do would be strongly to advise them to accept the provision of the Bill.

7121. That is with regard to the first proviso?—Subsection 2, Proviso A.

7122. So far as you are concerned you would advise them to accept it as it stands?—Yes.

7123. I think you have explained that that had nothing to do with the question of the separate purse or the joint purse?—No it is quite independent of that.

7124. Taking the question of the separate purse, it is more than a question of the allocation of funds, is it not?—Yes, very much more.

7125. There would be the allocation of funds even under the joint purse system; the funds would have to be allocated to the two departments under the joint purse system?—Funds would have to be distributed every year between the two. The separate purse suggests a more lengthy period of allocation.

7126. Under the joint purse system the allocation might either be each year or over a period of years?—I have not heard the latter suggested. I understood under the joint purse it would be an annual distribution of the available visible revenues of the year.

7127. There is nothing in the system itself which would render an agreement for a definite term impossible or inconsistent with the system itself?—Then you would get very near to the principle of the separate purse.

7128. That is what I wanted to get at: Is it very near the system of the separate purse, because the separate purse, as I understand, involves that the Department reserved or transferred collects its revenue from the subjects transferred?—Yes.

7129. The sources of revenue are allocated?—The sources of revenue are already under the control of the two halves of the Government, and the separate purse system contemplates that they shall have full user of the proceeds.

7130. The first stage is that each Department has certain sources of revenue under its control so far as the collection is concerned?—That is essential in the dualism.

7131. When you have got it you may either put it into a separate purse, or you may put the revenue from both departments into one common purse?—Quite.

7132. Having put that into one common purse, you may proceed to divide it according to the requirements of each department?—Yes.

7133. It is the latter you object to?—I object to the latter on the arbitrary basis. What I suggest is that the basis of partition of revenues which has a direct relation to the sources of revenue is infinitely preferable to an arbitrary fractional partition of the total revenues available.

7134. If I may venture to say so, does the basis which you call arbitrary mean that it is an improper system, because the division, I take it, will be according to the requirements of each Department, and not according to the amount it happens to collect from the Departments committed to its charge? I used the word "arbitrary" as distinguished from a method which again I can only say has direct relationship to the sources of revenue in the respective administrative spheres.

7135. What I have in mind, perhaps I did not express it properly, is that the division of subjects has nothing whatever to do with the revenue of the subjects. When you reserve one subject, and transfer another, you do so irrespective of the revenue derivable from either?—You do so without allowing the revenue to be a factor in the decision.

7136. Without allowing it to be a factor at all?—Quite so.

7137. That being so, why should you call it arbitrary if, in dividing the total revenue, that factor does not enter also?—Because in contradistinction to what I have named, and probably misnamed, an arbitrary system, the other system gives to the department to whom administratively a source of revenue has been entrusted a direct and immediate interest in managing the revenues from that Department.

7138. That is the argument used for that purpose, but I have put my point to you?—I am sorry; I do not want to misunderstand your Lordship, and I may not have quite grasped your point.

7139. I suggested that inasmuch as the reserving or transferring a Department has nothing whatsoever to do with the revenue derivable from that Department, the revenue itself ought not to be considered to belong to that Department; the total revenues ought to belong to all the Departments together?—From the purely financial point of view I could not accept that proposition.

7140. You are aware that, so far as Indian opinion is concerned, practically of all points the greatest importance is attached to the purse being joint, and not separate?—Yes; I have heard that from the evidence.

7141. That is one of the points with regard to which the Despatch of the Government of India is considered by Indian opinion to be a whittling down of the scheme?—Yes; but for the reason that it does interfere with the power of control which they had set their hearts upon.

7142. They do not want any more power of control than there is in the clause which you have already accepted—that is to say, proviso A, sub-Clause 2, Clause 9; they do not want any further power of control?—This is a power which is exercised vis-a-vis the Council after the Budget provisions are put before them. The essential power of control will rest at the stage at which the Budget proposals are being framed by the two halves of the Government in collaboration. That is when the point of real control will come in.

7143. You call that control; that is after all discussion and deliberation together, with the ultimate power of decision left to the Government?—I call it control in this sense, that in so far as Ministers may be said, with the consent of the Governor, to deflect revenues which the Governor in Council had desired to apply to their own services, the Ministers are thereby preventing the Governor in Council from carrying out the policy which he originally proposed or meant to make possible.

7144. With great submission my point is that they are not to do that without the concurrence of the Governor, and that is not their control?—The fact would remain that the Governor and Ministers do exercise control over the Governor in Council.

7145. There being the common factor, the Governor, the Ministers cannot be said to exercise control when they cannot do it without the consent and concurrence of the Governor. Therefore, when you say that that would give them control I put it to you that you are probably over-stating the case?—I am using the phrase that has been made by witnesses themselves; they talk of the power of the purse.

7146. The witness may have misused the term "control." I think he qualifies it rather as far as I read it. I always understood that the whole contest was with regard to this proviso A?—No, I do not think so; proviso A is entirely a separate point.

7147. Apart from the words Mr. Sastri may have used, I put it to you that if it is not in the power of the Ministers to influence the division without the consent and concurrence of the Governor, that is not control; would you accept that?—No, I do not think I should.

7148. Why not? They require some outside aid?—What I suggest is that the Ministers, having behind them, as they do have, and will have, the great power of an elective assembly, will be able in the course of the division of revenues, if there is no automatic barrier between the two classes of revenue, steadily to encroach, if they wish to, upon the revenues of the other half of the Government. The Governor will not be in a position constantly to prevent this encroachment, and he must to some extent become a party to it if he wishes to keep his Ministers with him.

7149. That will always be the case, that Ministers will like to have the power always in the Government?—Yes.

7150. And, therefore, to that extent they will be able to put pressure on the Government?—Not so much under the separate purse system.

7151. With regard to the Grand Committee, I am sure that you have read and probably considered before you signed the Dispatch of the Government of India on Grand Committees, where Sir Sankaran Nair points out that in proposing the constitution you do for the Grand Committee, you make various assumptions?—Yes.

7152. You assume that you will not be able to rely upon what the Dispatch calls the more conservative elements in the community among the elected members; assuming they will be elected, you will not be able to rely upon them, the landlords, for instance?—I think there may be gentlemen answering that description who may not be members of the Grand Committee.

7553. They may not be elected?—Yes.

7554. Is there any reason to fear that, having regard to the composition of the Assembly itself?—I think it is quite possible.

7155. There are heterogeneous elements in the Assembly?—I think it is quite possible that in dealing with a measure of a very controversial nature, the members elected to the Grand Committee may almost invariably be those who are committed to the opposition view.

7156. Then there is the further assumption, or rather the proposition which you lay down, that you would not like to rely upon the votes of persons nominated to represent Anglo-Indians, Indian Christians, Europeans, Labour and other interests like the depressed classes, and so on. You exclude those from the nominated members?—We explained that we did not want to make the matter racial. I am not sure that we have a large representation of either Labour or the depressed classes in my own Province, and it refers more particularly to the Anglo-Indians and the European community. We think it would be a real calamity if whenever we had a controversial Bill we had to count upon them as constant supporters of the Government.

7157. On the Grand Committees some of those are bound to come in, are they not?—In Bengal they would, I think, but I am not sure about the other Provinces; the European element is not nearly so strong.

7158. They would have a very good chance. You assume, also, that all the elected non-officials will be opposed to the measure proposed?—As I said to-day, I had to assume that the worst might happen in the particular case.

7159. And you assumed that from the one instance you gave of the Rowlatt Bill?—No; I have had experience of other measures in which the unpopularity of the proposal is limited to native feeling.

7160. I ask you to name one where the bulk of the official opinion was against the views of the Government with regard to legislation?—I think I should be correct in referring to individual provisions of some importance in a Municipalities Bill I had to carry through the United Provinces Legislature. I should like to verify my references before being precise.

7161. The Grand Committee, as the Government of India proposed it, would perpetuate the official bloc so far as that is concerned?—No; we do not propose an official majority.

7162. The official bloc, although not an absolute majority, is very nearly that?—We should have the official element in any variant of the scheme.

7163. A very large element which the Councils which are now proposed will not have?—The actual difference in figures is relatively small.

7164. You also assume that all the officials serving on the Assembly will not be available for Grand Committee work?—That was so.

7165. As a matter of fact, you do not expect that there would be many occasions for having Grand Committees in the Provinces?—But we shall ask for so many fewer nominated members, if you make all the officials available.

7166. Is there anything to prevent them being available?—There might be exigencies of business. If I may say so I do not think that arrangement would help your case.

7167. You suggest they would be available for this reason, namely, that the occasions on which you would want a Grand Committee for certificated legislation would be few and far between?—Yes. Then the only reason for making them available is to increase the size of the official bloc.

7168. Upon that depends the number of the Committee?—To some extent.

7169. Your proposal is that the number should be regulated to the number of officials available?—That was proposed both by the Government of India and by Lord Southborough.

7170. The effect of the Government of India proposals is to considerably reduce the number on the Grand Committee?—Yes; as compared with the Report.

7171. But for particularly important legislation?—Yes.

7172. That is also one of the points upon which Indian opinion considers that the Government of India Despatch is whittling down the scheme?—I can only express my regret.

7173. I do not ask your opinion upon it; I only suggest that is the fact?—I regret that the expression should be necessary, but there it is.

7174. With regard to the question of education, I suppose you made yourself familiar with the evidence which was placed before the Southborough Committee on the division of functions in respect of that matter?—I cannot say I have studied it.

7175. I have not seen it myself, but I am told that by far the larger preponderance of opinion of the educationa educational experts, both Indian and European, was in favour of the transfer of education as a whole?—So I gathered from the Report.

7176. And that most of the Directors of Public Instruction in the Provinces were in favour of the transfer of education as a whole?—I take it from you—I do not know.

7177. Please do not take it from me, because I am only giving you my information?—I have not analysed the evidence.

7178. And it is a fact, is it not, that most of the Local Governments are in favour of the transfer of education, the Punjab, the United Provinces, the Central Provinces, and Assam too, I think?—I think those four Governments advocated the complete transfer of education.

7179. And it is only two who are against, namely, Bengal and Bihar?—And Madras, I think.

7180. And Madras. Of course, Madras was against the transfer of anything; that is the fact, is it not?—Yes.

7181. You gave some instances of where the control of representatives of the people or trustees with regard to educational institutions was not effective and had to be replaced?—Yes.

7182. Taking the Benares University, have you heard of the difficulties which came into existence about the teaching, and they have now been composed?—I am delighted to hear it; I had not heard that.

7183. That is a University which is only two or three years old?—Yes.

7184. You would not expect that there should be smooth working in an institution of that kind always from the beginning, would you?—I should certainly hope for it at the beginning, because it began with such universal enthusiasm.

7185. You would not expect the same smooth working in an infant institution of that kind as you would in Universities which had existed for centuries in this country, for instance, and I am told that it is not always smooth even here?—I was genuinely distressed at the trend of affairs in a University which had begun under such favourable auspices.

7186. It is somewhat natural, is it not, when they have to find their own staff?—I think it has been very disappointing.

7187. Such difficulties exist in the governing bodies of Government colleges, do they not?—I do not think they come to such serious results; I do not remember any.

7188. Because they have got another body to compose it for them; these people have to compose it for themselves when there is a difference of opinion?—Yes, that helps my argument.

7189. With regard to Aligarh, that was due to the creation or coming into existence of two factions, so to speak, with regard to the Mohammedan University question, was it not?—I think it went much deeper than that.

7190. That was the origin of it?—That was only a symptom of it; the factions were due to causes which went deeper and further back in time than the discussions over the creation of a Mohammedan University.

7191. Have they been composed now?—Not to my knowledge.

7192. First, with regard to primary education, you had a Committee, I think, for primary education, presided over by Mr. Justice Piggott?—Yes.

7193. That Committee drafted a certain set of rules which was never accepted?—They drafted a scheme which we accepted; I forget whether they went into formal rules; I think not.

7194. The acceptance of that scheme involved the closing of a large number of primary schools, did it not?—Not a net closure; it meant the closure of certain schools to create others. It was not a net reduction; it was a very large net increase.

7195. That scheme has now been set aside?—I think that scheme has been very largely built upon. I do not understand that it has been rejected.

7196. The scheme has been set aside altogether as hampering the diffusion of primary education, and the educational policy of the present Government of the United Provinces is different from that of the preceding Government?—That was not stated in the resolution of the present Government of the United Provinces, because they referred to the Piggott Scheme as being a preliminary to the further development of the undertaking.

7197. They have considerably modified it and enlarged it?—They have very much enlarged it in regard mainly to the fact (I am not clear what the other scheme was) that what is known as the Piggott Scheme was started during the time when we were absolutely at the knuckle-bone of finance, owing to the requirements of the war. The new scheme which is now before the United Provinces relies upon very large additional funds which the Government of India have enabled them to draw from their balance after the conclusion of the war.

7198. With regard to higher education, that is both University and Secondary Education, is it the fact that the control has at the present moment passed away largely from the hands of the Government to those of the people themselves?—I think, in a varying degree, in different Provinces that is true.

7199. The Mr. Sharp, whose name you mentioned as educational adviser to the Government of India, stated in his note for the Functions Committee that it was no use keeping it reserved unless the control of the Government was to be tightened further than it is now?—Yes.

7200. And that unless you were prepared to tighten the control—that is to say, to exclude popular control such as exists now—it would be better to transfer it?—May I put it to take a larger share in control?

7201. His own recommendation to your Government, as the Government of India is, was that unless you were prepared to tighten the control and to exclude the popular control that exists now, it was no use to keep it as a reserved subject?—I think that is a general indication.

7202. That is the substance of it, is it not?—I should not say that he suggested the possible exclusion of popular control; I think it is a larger measure of Government control in association with present agencies.

7203. And the lessening of the popular control such as exists now?—Yes.

7204. Therefore, if you reserve it you will have to lessen such popular control as exists at the present moment?—Yes. I fear that is inevitable if we are to get rid of the weaknesses in the present system.

7205. Do you advise that, having regard to the state of opinion and feeling in the country?—Nothing could be easier than to say: "Let the popular element in the Government have higher education, and let them make the best or the worst of it." But I am trying to speak, as I have done throughout this case, with a genuine desire for the future welfare of India, which I believe does lie very much in the wise control and development of secondary education.

7206. Is it a fact that higher education has been a very great success up to the present moment?—I think it has done a very great deal for India.

7207. We have heard the complaint made very often that the higher education at present given is devoid of all real culture; is there any truth in that?—There is a great deal of exaggeration in it.

7208. Whatever truth there may be in that complaint, is it not due to the system which puts a commercial and pecuniary value upon each examination, Matriculation, Intermediate, the Bachelor of Arts, the Bachelor of Law, and so on; that without Matriculation you cannot enter into this service, that without the B.A. you cannot enter into that service, without the B.L. you cannot enter the profession of the Law, and so forth?—I must regretfully agree that is a very large factor in it.

Chairman.

7209. Sir James, there are one or two points I want to make quite clear to myself. First of all in respect of the joint and separate purse, do I understand your position to be this: the Legislative Council and the Ministers enjoying its confidence will want to spend much money on the development of the transferred subjects, particularly, you say, education?—Yes; undoubtedly.

7210. And

Chairman—continued.

7210. And they may be reluctant to impose fresh taxation?—I think so.

7211. And, therefore, when the free balance is expended there will be an inevitable tendency to try to reduce the Estimates for the reserved subjects?—That is so.

7212. Even beyond the point which those responsible for the reserved subjects think possible and consistent with their responsibility?—That is so.

7213. And the Ministers and the majority in the Legislative Council will have a stronger leverage wherewith to reduce the Estimates on reserved subjects under the system of the Joint purse than they would have under the system of the separate purse?—That is my suggestion.

7214. Now, I come to the subject that Mr. Montagu asked you a good many questions upon: the scheme of the Bill, and of the Report upon which it is founded is to assign a definite sphere of responsibility to Ministers in respect of transferred subjects, and to the Governor in Council in respect of reserved subjects?—Yes.

7215. Your conception of carrying out that scheme to the greatest advantage is, subject to the reservations you have made here, to transfer as great a number of subjects as possible to the control of Ministers?—Yes.

7216. And, having done that, your plea is that Ministers should be left as free as possible from control in dealing with those reserved subjects, except the control of the Legislative Council?—Yes.

7217. In fact, you say the Government of India and the Governor, if they are wise, will carefully desist from jogging the elbows of Ministers unnecessarily?—I hope so.

7218. How many Ministers do you think will be required to do the work of such a list as the revised list of transferred subjects?—In a normal Province I think two Ministers ought to be able to do it quite well. It is a little difficult to say, because we do not yet know whether it will be possible to find Ministers who will be prepared to make themselves, so to speak, whole-time administrators. One hopes that will be possible, in which case I suggest two Ministers would satisfy the needs of an ordinary major Province.

7219. It had never occurred to me that a Minister would not be a whole-time man?—Well, I trust he will. The future is not quite clear in that respect.

7220. Do you not think he ought to be?—I certainly think so.

7221. Assuming he is a whole-time man, and assuming merely for the sake of our illustration that the revised list of transferred subjects is the one finally adopted which includes all education and University development, as well as agriculture and local government, and a large number of other subjects, do you really suggest that two Ministers could deal with that properly?—I am afraid I was thinking of two Ministers in reference to the list after the elimination of the two very important subjects we wish to remove from it. If education, as a whole is transferred, they will require a Minister exclusively for that Department, and if industries are transferred, I should think that the balance of the subjects would require probably two other Ministers, that is, three in all

7222. Now, passing to the other side of the Government, the Governor in Council, with his Executive Councillors, I understand your plea to be exactly a similar one, that he and they should be left as free as possible from control in dealing with the reserved subjects, except the control of Parliament, exercised through the Secretary of State?—Yes.

7223. And, similarly, you protest that the kind of incursion into their sphere contemplated by Mr. Sastri, in his evidence, would, in fact, result in the perpetual jogging of their elbows in their sphere of responsibility by the Ministers and the Legislative Council?—Precisely.

7224. Do you also fear that the opportunity for the exercise, and the exercise of what you consider undue interference with the reserved subjects, would have the effect of deflecting certain Indian politicians from the concentration of their efforts in developing the administration of the transferred subjects to what you would consider the illegitimate meddling with the reserved subjects?—I think it must inevitably lead to that diffusion of energy.

7225. And that, therefore, if that was the effect it would, to that extent, be marring the experiment in respect of the transferred subjects?—Yes.

7226. You noticed, perhaps, or heard, what Mr. Patel said in his evidence?—I read his evidence; I was not here.

7227. I understood him to say that there would be no cessation of agitation for the acquisition of more power?—Yes.

7228. That is exactly the kind of way in which you expect that agitation to work, is it not—interference in reserved subjects; or am I wrong in supposing that is so?—If the power of legislation and the power of the purse, as we fear, do to a very large extent remain in the hands of Ministers, we certainly apprehend that they would be subject to agitation to exercise their control in a more effective measure than they might otherwise do.

7229. May I summarise your plea thus, that only by a very definite separation of responsibilities can we avoid the blurring of the issue; and only so can the action of both sides be fairly judged by public opinion, both in India and in this country?—That is precisely my suggestion.

7230. Assuming that view of the relations of the two sides of the Government, does that conception at all conflict with the idea that Ministers and Executive Councils, with the Governor, should most freely consult each other in respect of all the sphere of Government?—Not in the slightest; I trust there will be the fullest consultation, mutual help, and advice.

7231. You look forward to the Executive Councils consulting the Ministers in respect of the reserved subjects, and the Ministers consulting the Executive Councils in respect of the transferred subjects?—I certainly do; not only in the formal manner which is suggested by the regular meetings of what has been called the Provincial Cabinet, but by that even more valuable informal agency of a number of men carrying out the common work of administration, and constantly in touch with each other.

7232. As regards Cabinet capacity, the two sides should act as if they were one government, but having so consulted, that they should then come to their decisions separately, so that there should be no doubt in anybody's mind as to where the responsibility lies?—Quite so.

7233. That is a true picture of your idea?—Yes, and if I may say so, that is what I have endeavoured to bring out in the narrative of procedure which I hope to place before you.

7234. Now, turning to other subjects, do you wish to say anything about the attitude of the Government of India towards Women's Suffrage?—Just one word, if I may. The Government of India would be most reluctant to appear to be hostile to the theory or principle, or, indeed, to have taken a partisan side in the theory or principle of the propriety of Women's Suffrage. What they feel about it is the grave difficulty of instituting an effective female electorate in parts of India. I do not speak for Bombay City or any area with which I am not familiar, but I do say that in parts of India, and more particularly the Northern parts, the exercise of the women's suffrage would be very unequal and a very puzzling problem; but in the second place the Government of India do feel that a matter of this sort which touches the root of so many social susceptibilities and national susceptibilities is essentially one of the questions that ought properly to be left to the will of the people themselves when that is manifested under the new constitution.

7235. You would leave that question of women's suffrage to be settled by the Legislative Council of each Province?—Yes.

7236. Or by the Legislative Assembly of India?—I think it ought to be Provincial, because conditions differ so much in the different parts of India.

Chairman—continued.

7237. Do you wish to say anything about the revision of the list of reserved and transferred subjects before the end of ten years?—I only wish to repeat the strong plea of the Government of India that no formal revision should take place until it follows the Report of the first Statutory Commission. They do not believe that it would be politic to hold out any hope of a modification other than by way of correcting, let us say, purely clerical errors and wrongly transferred subjects within five years. They believe that during the operation of the first two Councils there will be very difficult matters in store for everybody, both for the official Government and for the Ministers, and they think it would be a calamity of the worst type, and probably fatal to the whole success of the scheme, if immediately after the inauguration of the new constitution men's minds were to be disturbed by the prospect of being able to secure a further distribution of administrative functions in such a short period as five years.

7238. Do you wish to say anything about electorates?—There, again, I only wanted to emphasise the plea which was put in for a fair consideration of the Franchise proposals in Lord Southborough's Committee's Report, and I should like (I trust I am not trespassing on your patience) to submit a letter which I have just received, which was addressed by the Bengal Government to the Government of India on the 12th July last, in which they make certain very definite complaints against the Franchise proposals of Lord Southborough's Committee. I do this solely because I am anxious to make it clear that the Government of India had not been unnecessarily or fractiously finding fault with the Franchise proposals, as has been suggested. What we want to do is not to break up any agreement or to interfere with any settlement that has been arrived at. All we want to do is to get a reasonable consultation of the interests which are most directly affected by these proposals, and when it is suggested that the Local Governments were carried with the Franchise Committee throughout, we can only point to this perfectly spontaneous protest on the part of the Government of Bengal, in which they complain, without any invitation from the Government of India, that certain action taken, a certain recommendation made by the Franchise Committee, destroys the whole basis of the Local Government scheme in a particular respect. There are other passages in the same letter—I do not want to make too much of it, but I should like to put it in simply as an example of the state of mind which seems to us to call for a further examination, and an examination which I may say will in no way delay the introduction of the new constitution, of some of the detailed proposals with regard to electorates.

7239. Have you anything more you would like to add about the recommendations of Lord Crewe's Committee?—I think not. On the whole, I think I could not add with advantage to the telegrams which have come, and are now coming, from the Government of India to the Secretary of State on the subject of these recommendations.

7240. There is only one last question I want to ask you: Have there been statements of alleged fact made by any of the witnesses before this Committee that you think you ought to correct?—I have gone through all the evidence, but have not done so from the point of view of making difficulties. There are, however, two or three statements in the evidence of one of the witnesses which reflect very much upon the Government of India, and which, I think, in the interests of ordinary accuracy, it is desirable to comment upon. The particular statements I have in mind occur on pages 78 to 82, on the printed record of evidence, and particularly questions 1434 to 1436. The witness in this case, in the first instance, referred to the Land Tax, that is what we call the land revenue assessment, as being much higher than in the Moghul times, and the words are (question 1434) "much larger than then, because in many Provinces it goes to 50 per cent., whereas Akbar took one-fourth or one-sixth." Now, I do not suppose for a moment this is an intentional misrepresentation of very well known historical figures, and I should only like to explain that 50 per cent. is now practically the maximum share of the rent roll which the Government takes in what is known as Zemindari Provinces from the landlord. If this is read, as it might very well be read, as indicating 50 per cent. of the produce of the land, it would be very gravely misleading. I should like to go further and say that, as is clear to anyone who has read the elaborate examination of the subject which was published in Lord Curzon's Viceroyalty, it is not correct that we are taking an increasing share of the produce of the land, but a gradually and steadily diminishing share, which is infinitely less than 50 per cent. In the following question, 1435, the witness says that the Government of India pays crores to railways and starves irrigation. That is an entire mis-statement. Crores of rupees are raised for the extension of railways; large sums are also raised and found for the extension of irrigation, but I do not remember in all my experience of the Finance Department in India any irrigation project being finally approved of from the professional point of view and from the administrative point of view, for which we did not immediately endeavour to find the necessary capital. In the same answer there is a misstatement also with regard to the railways, where it says that the interest on the capital expended on railways goes normally to the companies every year. As is well known, a very large share of that interest accrues to Government, which is by far the largest shareholder in virtually all but one of the railway companies working in India. In Question 1436, the immediately following question, there is reference to the pitiful cases of starvation of widows and women, heads of families, and reading the question and the answer as a whole, an outsider would be inclined to regard this as the chief manifestation of distress due to famine in India. It is a sad enough feature, a pitifully sad feature, in such distress that many of the more respectable ladies in decayed families, in towns more particularly, are very averse to asking for outside assistance when distress comes. Many of them suffer very gravely, and many of them probably die, but, having relation to the vast volume of distress which the Government devotes itself to relieving, it is almost a negligible factor. The work of famine relief, which the witness urges we should transfer on the ground of the suffering of these few poor ladies, is directed to keeping alive and keeping in health hundreds of thousands and in some cases millions of the population, scattered over a vast area, and I should be sorry that answer 1436 should be taken as a description of the work which we try to do in relieving famine in India. I should like those points noted, my Lord.

(The Witness is directed to withdraw.)

DR. TEJ BAHADUR SAPRU, is called in; and Examined as follows:—

Chairman.

7241. Dr. Sapru, I think you are one of the leading advocates of Allahabad?—I have been there in practice for about twenty-four years.

7242. You were appointed as one of the Members of the Franchise Committee of the Southborough Committee?—I was.

7243. I think you have handed in a Statement (see Appendix W), and we shall be glad if you will make any statement to us you would like to put before us on the subject of the work of that Committee, and if you would particularly direct your attention to the reasons which induced that Committee to propose that the whole of the field of education should be a transferred subject?—When we started on our tour the first Province we visited was Behar. In Behar we examined a large number of Indian witnesses, and I may say that without a single exception, so far as I recollect, every Indian member supported the transfer of education. Then came the officials before us. Now Mr. Fawcus, the Director of Public Instruction there, was opposed to the transfer of higher and secondary education, but he favoured the transfer of primary education, and also added that, having regard to the peculiar position of Behar, he would not object to the transfer of middle vernacular education. Mr. Fawcus was examined

examined at great length on the question of the transfer of secondary and higher education, and his whole position seemed to be that he was afraid that there would be a lowering of the standard if education was transferred, and he further pointed out that Behar was a new Province, and that therefore it was not likely that it would be able, in the event of education being transferred, to find the necessary funds. That was the position Mr. Fawcus, the Director of Public Instruction, took. At the request of some Members of the Committee Mr. Jennings, the Official Vice-Chancellor of New Patna University, was called, and Mr. Jennings's opinion was that as a matter of fact he could not say that there was any definite desire to lower the standards, but that he was opposed, or rather his Government was opposed, to the transfer of education, because they had an ambitious scheme which would cost them nearly 92 lakhs of rupees. It was pointed out to Mr. Jennings that if the reform scheme came into effect the Government of India would not be in a position to give funds for the purpose of financing education, and that the Province would necessarily have to depend on its own resources, and that Behar could not possibly meet its ordinary expenditure, and it was put to him how did he expect the money to come forward? I may say, without meaning any disrespect to Mr. Jennings or the Government he represented, there was practically no answer to that question. I may say further that we attached most weight to Mr. Jennings's evidence, because Mr. Jennings had been Principal of the leading college in the United Provinces. It was from there that he went to Behar, and it was also brought out in the evidence of Mr. Jennings that he had been associated with the Allahabad University for about 15 years, and he was never able to see any desire on the part of the Indian Members to lower the standard.

From Behar we moved on to the United Provinces, and we examined a large number of witnesses in Lucknow. I may say that so far as the Indian Members were concerned, they were unanimous about the transfer of education. With regard to the official witnesses, the one important witness who spoke with regard to education was Mr. De La Fosse, Director of Public Instruction in the United Provinces; he was also connected with the Allahabad University in various capacities, and Mr. De La Fosse was distinctly of opinion that education should be transferred. He was cross-examined at great length with regard to the question of efficiency or inefficiency of the education, and with regard to the desire as to lowering the standard which was attributed to the Indian Members, but he was not able to demonstrate that. He agreed with the suggestion that the standard of the Indian Universities was already very low, and that the teaching was inefficient. It is only fair to Mr. De La Fosse to say that he was of opinion that, although education should be transferred, yet the subject of legislation with regard to education should be reserved. Then we examined two other European educationists, one being Professor Stanley Jevons. He was a Professor of Economics in the University of Allahabad, and he was strongly of opinion that primary education should be transferred. He also favoured the transfer of secondary education, but he was not in favour of the transfer of higher education. Upon his cross-examination it was brought out that what was really at the back of his mind was that he desired a Central Controlling Authority for higher education, and he pleaded for the appointment of a Director of Education for all India. Then there was lastly the Rev. Doctor Garfield Williams. His position was that he did not want any reforms such as had been outlined in the Montagu-Chelmsford Report, and he said that for the next 10 years or so the Government should send their men to foreign countries to be trained as teachers, and when these gentlemen returned and improved the educational position of the country, then would be the time for the Government to think of reforms. That is all I can say with regard to the United Provinces.

From the United Provinces we passed on to the Punjab. In the Punjab, I may say, we examined a large number of witnesses, and among them there were two Indian educationists of very good reputation. One of them was Mr. Sundar Das, who had been an Inspector of Schools connected with the Punjab University for nearly 20 years, and he was strongly of opinion that education should be transferred in all its branches. Then there was an Indian Professor, Rai Sahib Ruchi Ram Sahni, a very distinguished Professor, who has done some original work in chemistry, and he was also of opinion that education should be transferred. I am not speaking of non-expert Indians. Then we examined Mr. Richey, the Director of Public Instruction there, and he was strongly of opinion that education should be transferred. His position was also that legislation should be reserved to the Government of India. Then we examined the Registrar of the Punjab University, Dr. Woolner, and he was also in favour of transfer.

In the Central Provinces there was strong opposition to the transfer of education, except primary education. One was Mr. Mayhew, the Director of Public Instruction, who opposed it, and his Government was opposed to the transfer—in fact, the Central Provinces Government was not at all satisfied with or happy over this scheme.

From the Central Provinces we passed on to Calcutta, and in Calcutta I may say that the Indian witnesses, excepting two or three Mahommedans, were practically unanimous with regard to transfer. Among the European witnesses whom we examined was Mr. Wordsworth, the Director of Public Instruction, and he was in favour of transfer. It is only fair to Mr. Wordsworth to say that his opinion was based more on political grounds than on any other grounds. We examined another educationist of the name of Dr. Howells, a very prominent missionary there, who has been connected with the University of Calcutta, and he was very strongly of opinion that education should be transferred, and he illustrated his point with reference to Wales. He was strongly of that opinion. I was not present during the time the Assam Government gave their evidence, and I cannot speak from personal knowledge as to the Assam view.

We passed on to Madras, and, of course, in Madras the question of transfer was a forbidden one; they were opposed to all transfer; and the Director of Public Instruction, Mr. Duncan, told us that no official would think of the possibility of education being transferred under any circumstances.

Then we came to Bombay, and in Bombay we examined Mr. Covernton, the Director of Public Instruction, and he was strongly of opinion that education should be transferred. He did not think that there was any grave risk in transferring education, or that the standard would be lowered. In addition to Mr. Covernton, we examined Mr. Paranjpye, a very well-known Indian educationist, the Principal of the Fergusson College, Poona, who was educated at Cambridge, and he was strongly of opinion that education should be transferred.

From Bombay we passed on to Delhi, where we wrote our Report, and that practically sums up our evidence, which we recorded on our tour.

7244. The summary of that evidence is that, first of all, all the Indian evidence was in favour of a complete transfer?—I should think so, except, probably, one or two men.

7245. One or two Mahommedans?—Two Mahommedans.

7246. Was the majority of the European opinion in favour of transfer, or not?—I have not made the calculation, but I can tell you that there were only three men strongly opposed to it, Mr. Mayhew, Mr. Duncan and Mr. Fawais.

7247. You spoke of an allegation that the Indian members desired to lower the standard?—Yes.

7248. I do not think that allegation has ever been made here. The allegation is that the popular pressure on members and Ministers to increase the bulk of education at small expense would have that effect—that pressure for quantity rather than quality would be brought on the members and Ministers, not that they themselves would favour that choice?—I think that is a very favourite official theory in India; but if you come to examine it very closely there is no foundation for it. My experience, as a member of the University, has been that there is absolutely no such desire on the part of the Indian members; the general public do not want the standard to be lowered, but what they object to is the constant fluctuations in the

the results of the examinations, which can be accounted for on the ground that sometimes you appoint experienced examiners and sometimes you appoint absolutely inexperienced examiners. Sometimes you have 40 per cent. of the students passing and at other times only 18 per cent. passing. It is those fluctuations which give rise to popular agitation, and the official mind is led to the position that our demand is to increase the quantity at the expense of the quality.

7249. You know those fluctuations took place without any change in the standard of examination?—It is quite possible, but, as a matter of fact, the system of examination in India, if I may be permitted to say so, is extremely unsatisfactory. I have myself been an examiner for many years in one of the Universities, and I have myself had to undergo those examinations, and I can tell you the Indian educationists have turned examinations into a fetish. They blame Indians for encouraging cramming, but I do maintain that they are no greater sinners in that respect than the European professors themselves, and I am prepared to substantiate that.

7250. Is there any other point you would like to bring before the Committee?—What I wish to bring out with regard to education is this. In my opinion the system of education that has obtained in India is not so efficient as it is claimed to be by the officials. I say it is inefficient and has been inefficient, but has given you very good public servants, very good clerks, but it has practically killed originality among us, and it has not met the wants of the country in economic matters, nor has it led really to any development of culture. I strongly maintain that the average graduate of an Indian University is very far removed from being a cultured gentleman; he is a very good man for a clerical post, or for a deputy-collectorship, but there is nothing of culture there. The reason is this, that so far as the European professor is concerned, he exercises practically no influence over his pupils; he goes into the class-room and simply delivers a lecture, and he will probably not be able to recognise many of his students if he meets them outside in the college field. There is no contact between them, and no intellectual atmosphere about our colleges there. So far as European professors are concerned, I have to say, with great regret, that in the past men have been sent out from England who could never have had any career in any of the English Universities. I have known men being sent out from England to teach Indian history in the higher schools who started to read their Indian history when they came to India. I have known men sent out to India who were Wranglers, and who were sent out to teach mental and moral science. I think men like that have been failures. I do not wish to give the impression that there have not been very great European educationists there, I have known some of them, of good quality, certainly, and of the very first order. A European professor in India has got to live as a member of European society. There are certain conventions which he has got to observe, and the result is that there is always a great distance between him and his pupils. There is no intellectual atmosphere there. I also maintain that in India educational questions in the past have been decided, I should say, not on educational grounds alone, but on political grounds, and the educational expert has very little chance there against the secretariat. For instance, during the last few years it has been considered to be very objectionable to teach English history, and I have talked with some of the officials, who think that English history would be a very dangerous thing for Indian students to read. On the other hand, I maintain that it would be a very good corrective for many wrong notions. Similarly, there used to be certain authors prescribed, as they were considered to be very valuable reading for the younger generation; but nowadays nobody would think of prescribing any work of Mill or Burke, because it is considered to be very dangerous now. Those questions clearly resolve themselves into political considerations.

Again, you have got the question of the matriculation examination as against the school final examination. It is a long history, and I do not want to trouble the Committee, but while I myself am in favour of the school leaving examination, there is no reason why the matriculation examination should not at the same time be improved. All these questions resolve themselves into politics, whether they are official or non-official.

7251. Is there anything else you wish to add?—With regard to education there is just one more matter I should like to say, and that is to clear up a certain matter with regard to the Hindoo University. I am a member of the Hindoo University.

7252. At Benares?—At Benares. I have been connected myself with every branch of the Hindoo University. Unfortunately, there has been some trouble during the last few months, and I am prepared to confess that we were not quite happy in the selection of one or two men on the teaching staff. But two or three of them have gone, and shortly before I left India this month everything had been restored, or was being restored, to normal conditions. Of course, there was difference of opinion, but I have known greater differences of opinion in the Allahabad University. They do not come to the surface, because it is an old University and things adjust themselves there very easily. With regard to the Aligarh College, I am not connected with that College; but I know it, and I have many friends there. The whole trouble arose—I say it deliberately—because the Indian trustees wanted to assert themselves; the European members of the staff were not prepared to accept their views. I do not say that the European members were wholly to blame, nor do I say that the Indian members were wholly to blame; but, as a matter of fact, the situation there was that the European members were not accustomed to the new spirit which had sprung up there among the trustees. I am not talking of any political considerations. I am told now that new rules have been framed; they were framed by a representative of Patna, and they have been submitted to Sir Harcourt Butler, and I understand he has accepted them. I do not think there is much truth in all these exaggerated statements with regard to the Aligarh College.

There is only one more statement I would like to make with regard to primary education, and especially with regard to my own Province. The history of primary education may be summed up in two words, pious resolves and postponement. When Mr. Justice Piggott was appointed to preside over the Committee he made certain recommendations, but I am not aware that those recommendations have been given effect to in a liberal manner. No doubt something has been done, but they have not been given effect to on a liberal scale. Shortly before I left India I was told that some of the leading recommendations of Mr. Justice Piggott's Committee have been rejected by the present Government. One of the leading recommendations of Mr. Justice Piggott's Committee was that no new school should be opened unless it contained four classes, and that new schools should be maintained by Boards and not by private agencies. It is not with regard to the second that I wish to make any statement, but with regard to the first I was told that the present Government is not prepared to accept the recommendations; so the question is this: There is too much of research work in regard to primary education, and there is really very little result. That is all I wish to say with regard to it.

7253. Sir John Rees wants me to ask you a question on a very different subject. Before I put the question do you want to speak on any other subject?—It is only with regard to education that I was called upon to make any statement. With regard to the question of the divided purse I am strongly of opinion that there should be no divided purse, and I have set forth my reasons in the short statement I have submitted. I entirely endorse the remarks of Sir Sankaran Nair in his minute of dissent with regard to that matter. This question arose, I may say, also before our Committee, and it was pointed out that the Memorandum of the Government of India had been forwarded to our Committee almost at the last moment. It was dated the 3rd of January, and we came back to Delhi to write our Report towards the end of January, or the beginning of February. We had not taken any evidence with regard to that during our tour, and it was pointed out that it was not fair to the Committee that the Committee should have been invited vited to give any opinion with regard to that, although some of the members were strongly of opinion that the divided purse would not work. I may say that I was one of them.

7254. The question Sir John Rees wished me to ask you is in relation to the allegation which has been made by non-Brahmins in respect of Brahmins. I think the expression has been used—Sir John Rees puts it in inverted commas—" priestly tyranny," and he asks me to ask you what proportion of present-day Brahmins are priests?—I could not give the exact figure, but I should think it is not a very large proportion, because most of the Brahmins have taken to clerical work or they are agriculturists, but I would not be quite sure about my figures.

Chairman—continued.

7255. He asks me to point out to you that by the Census of 1911 the number of male Brahmins is given as something over 7½ millions, and the number of priests, ministers, etc., as something over half a million; but he says that the priests and ministers include priests and ministers of other denominations, and not only Brahmin priests and ministers?—Oh, yes, there are ministers and priests who are non-Brahmins.

7256. Therefore, he concludes, the number of Brahmin priests must be under 6½ per cent?—That may be so, but I am not prepared to make a statement with regard to the figures.

The Committee sits in camera for some time.

SIR THOMAS HOLDERNESS, G.C.B., K.C.S.I, is called in; and Examined, as follows:—

Sir T. Holderness.

Prefatory.—I should like to say at the outset that I have no first-hand personal acquaintance with present conditions in India, having left that country as far back as 1901. As to the pressing necessity for constitutional advance such as proposed in the Joint Report and the Bill, the capacity of the mass of the people to respond intelligently to the demands which will be made upon them by an extended electoral system, the ability of the representatives whom that system will send to the Provincial Legislative Councils and to the Indian Legislature to exercise prudently and temperately in the public interest the powers and duties which the beginnings of responsible government will entrust to them—these are matters on which I can only attempt to judge from a distance, so to say, and on second-hand information such as flows from India to the India Office through various channels, or reaches me through private correspondence and conversations with persons, Europeans and Indians, fresh from the Indian scene. I have endeavoured to study, so far as time and my ordinary duties have permitted, the Joint Report, the Bill itself, and the mass of criticisms, suggestions, and representations that have followed its publication, and I have had the advantage of having been a member of the Special Committee in the India Office which, under the directions of the Secretary of State for India, prepared the Bill in the first instance to give effect to the scheme of the Joint Report. But I am acutely conscious that all these sources of information do not make up for my personal ignorance of the India of to-day or the political condition of its people.

Speaking subject to this limitation, I am of the clear opinion that the time has come for associating the people in a much greater degree than at present with the Government, and that this can best be attained by starting from the representative institutions which are found at present in the Provincial Legislative Councils, enlarging their representative character, giving the reconstituted legislatures a measure of control over the Executive Government, and thereby placing upon them direct responsibility within a definite sphere for political acts and decisions and the consequences thereof. As the situation presents itself to me I see since my day a very noticeable increase of political activity among the educated classes, a strong disposition to question the policy and contest the decisions of the Government, an impatience at exclusion from the Governmental machine, a rapidly-growing power of combination for political ends, and of concerted movement through the Press and the platform on any occasion on which they wish to appeal to and influence the general community or particular sections of it. I see that the population at large, though still uneducated and inexperienced in politics, is no longer indifferent to world events, is awakening to a sense of national consciousness, is no longer content to render a passive and unquestioning obedience to its rulers, and readily comes under the influence of the active politician. The confidence that formerly subsisted between the autocratic Government and the people seems to be disappearing. The Government finds itself confronted in the Legislative Councils and in the Press with a permanent opposition of growing strength and expertness, and is conscious that its powers for good are being undermined and its activities frustrated. A position has been reached which to my mind makes it imperative to enlist new forces on the side of the executive and to place a share of the latter's responsibilities upon its critics.

That is broadly how I see the situation. I think that a large and generous measure of reform is called for for, and without ignoring the difficulties and possible risks attending a great experiment, I am generally in favour of the policy embodied in the Bill.

My answer to the questions are as follows:—

1. Do you accept the proposition that it is desirable to bring about the progressive realisation of responsible government in India? And, if so, how do you define the expression "responsible government"? And do you generally accept the proposition contained in the Preamble?—I accept, as I am bound to do, the policy announced in Parliament of gradually developing self-governing institutions in India with a view to the progressive realisation of responsible government in that country, and understanding that the proposition in the question is a shorter re-statement of the declaration of 20th August, 1918, I accept it. I make this distinction because, to my mind, the scheme proposed in the Bill for local government in the Provinces, while it may prove the first step towards responsible government in India, is in itself not responsible government—not even, I would almost say, in a rudimentary form. I understand the expression "responsible government" to be used in the ordinary constitutional sense as implying the amenability of the executive government to a legislature elected on a popular franchise. I agree that responsible government, as thus understood, is the ultimate goal of British policy, the British Government and the Government of India being the judges of the time and measure of each advance. I accept the proposition contained in the Preamble to the Bill that the first step in advance is to develop self-governing institutions in the Provinces, and concurrently to give the Provinces in provincial matters the largest measure of independence of the central Government which is compatible with the discharge by the latter of its own responsibilities.

2. Do you think that the realisation of responsible government in the Provinces involves the establishment in Provincial Legislatures of a substantially elected majority (Clause 6)?—Yes. I think this to be necessarily the first step in the direction of responsible government.

3. Do you think that the non-official members of the Provincial Legislatures should possess power to control the actions and policy of the Executive? Do you think they possess such power at present?—I think that the Provincial Legislatures should, as a necessary step in the direction of responsible government, be given a certain degree of control over the actions and policy of the Executive. At present they have a certain negative power of control over the legislative projects of the Provincial Executive. They can refuse to pass Government Bills. Their influence, as distinguished from control, both in matters of legislation and of administration, is very considerable.

4. Do you think that there are certain matters or functions of Government in the Provinces in which at present the Provincial Executive must remain responsible to the Secretary of State and Parliament, and must therefore be in a position to enforce its wishes?—Yes. I do not think that the Provinces are ripe for the introduction of responsible government in the accepted meaning of the term, and it would come to that if the provincial executives were not to remain responsible to the Secretary of State and Parliament. Nor could responsible government be established in the Provinces without a fundamental change in the structure and functions of the central government of India and in the military and political conditions by which the external defence of India is secured.

5. If you accept the propositions stated under Questions 1 to 4, do you think that the dual form of Government embodied in the Bill is the best means of securing them? If not, what are your objections to that feature of the Bill, and by what other means would you attempt to secure the objects in view?—I have seen no other scheme which better satisfies the four conditions named in the preceding questions (1) to make a beginning in establishing the responsibility of Ministers to the legislature; (2) to place the elected members in the majority in the provincial legislatures; (3) to give the legislatures a measure of control over the executive governments; (4) to restrict the matters within which this control may operate. The dual form of Government embodied in the Bill by dividing the executive into two halves—an official Government and a popular Government amenable within limits to the legislature, and by similarly dividing into two halves the subject matter of the administration, does make ministers and the legislature from whom they are selected responsible within limits for a definite part of the administration. That would not be the case under the scheme proposed by the Lieutenant-Governors. I need not elaborate this point. It is established by the Viceroy in his Minute of 5th March. I think that the scheme of the Lieutenant-Governors might be a workable scheme under other conditions than exist at present. But one essential condition is that it should satisfy the present hopes and aspirations of the active political classes, and that they would readily co-operate to make the scheme a success. I feel that as compared with the scheme embodied in the Bill those classes would regard it as retrograde and inadequate, and as failing to give the new electorates and the new legislatures a secure and definite measure of advance in the direction of responsible Government. If I am right in that, it is impossible to believe that reform on the lines of the Lieutenant-Governors' scheme would at this late stage of the controversy have a chance of success.

6. If you have any other method to suggest, does it (i) provide possibilities of advance by stages and facilitate the "progressive realisation of responsible 'government,'" and, if it does, in what way? (Clause 2, 3, etc.), and (ii) does it afford means of judgment, (a) to the electors and (b) to the Statutory Commission which is to examine and report on progress, of the success or failure in results of the control exercised by the legislature and those who represent it in the executive?—As I have no other method to suggest, I have nothing to say on this head.

7. If you consider a dual form of government, acceptable in principle, are there any points of detail the modification of which you regard as necessary? If so, what are those points, and what modifications would you suggest?—As far as concerns the Bill I have no modifications affecting its essential structure or its more important details to suggest. There are a number of minor amendments which the India Office Committee have recommended, but they have not yet been considered by the Secretary of State and I need not go into them. Many of them are drafting amendments, and to the best of my recollection they are relatively unimportant. The Bill, of course, is a skeleton, and its practical effect will greatly depend on the rules framed under it. I have seen the specimen rules made under Parts I. and II. of the Bill. They are incomplete, and they do not cover all the matters regarding which it will be necessary to make rules. But as far as they go, they are in my opinion a suitable basis upon which final rules may be built by the Government of India in communication with the Secretary of State. There are matters of some importance arising out of the Franchise and Functions Report, which will form the subject of rules, on which there is a difference of opinion between the Government of India and the Southborough Committees. As regards the Functions Committee, I generally accept the lists giving the division of subjects between (1) All India and provincial subjects; (2) transferred and reserved subjects, which have been laid before the Committee. My only hesitation is whether in all the Provinces it will at present be possible to find a Minister capable of administering the whole subject of Education, and whether, if this is doubtful, it might not be wise in the case of such provinces to transfer primary education only for the first five years.

8. In particular, do you think (i) that Ministers should hold office "during pleasure"—i.e., should be liable to removal if they are unable to support the action decided upon in their department by the Governor, or if they fail to retain the confidence of the Legislature (Clause 3 (1))? (ii). That the Governor should have power to disregard the opinion of his Ministers if he considers that action in accordance with that opinion is inconsistent with the due discharge of his responsibilities (Clause 3 (3))? (iii) that the Executive Council should in all Provinces normally consist of one official European and one non-official Indian (Clause 4)? (iv) that the Governor should have power to dissolve his Legislative Council (Clause 7 (4))?—(i), (ii), and (iv). Yes. As to (iii) I am of opinion that ordinarily one official European and one non-official Indian should suffice, and I am in favour of so constituting the Executive in every Province at the outset. But I would retain the present provision of the Act which empowers the Secretary of State to appoint such number of members not exceeding four as the Secretary of State in Council directs. Circumstances may arise in a Province that might make a Council of two insufficient, and as the power will rest with the Secretary of State, the normal number of two is not likely to be exceeded without good cause.

9. Referring back to questions 2, 3, and 4, if your answers to the first and third of these are in the affirmative, and if you think that the Legislatures should be given greater powers of control and influence than they possess at present, do you regard the limitations imposed generally by Clause 9 of the Bill upon their financial and legislative powers as (i) suitable, or as (ii) unnecessarily severe, or as (iii) inadequate to safeguard the responsibilities which the Government owes in the last resort to Parliament (Clause 9)?—I consider them generally suitable.

10. In particular, (i) do you think that the Legislature should have power, with whatever limitations, to vote supplies (Clause 9 (2))? (ii) Do you accept the plan of Grand Committees as the means of giving to the Government the power to secure essential legislation in the event of their failure to carry their propositions in the Council? If so, have you any modifications of detail to suggest? If not, what other method would you suggest to secure the object in view?—(i) Yes, and I approve the limitations expressed in provisos (a), (b), (c), (d) of sub-clause (2) of clause 9. (ii) Yes, I think the plan of Grand Committees preferable to giving power to the Executive Government to legislate by permanent ordinances. The composition of the Grand Committees is an important point, and this the Bill leaves to Rules. It is agreed that the function of the Grand Committee is to give the Governor in Council power to carry essential legislation. The Government of India argue that if the strength of the Grand Committee is fixed at 40 per cent. of the aggregate strength of the Provincial Legislature, and the Government is limited to a bare majority and one-third of that majority must be non-officials, they cannot be certain of securing essential legislation. In my mind this is so. But I think they should be content if the minimum strength were fixed as low as 33 per cent. I would give the Governor in Council power to exceed this strength at his discretion in any particular case, if he felt he could safely do so. The alternative scheme for fixing the strength of the Grand Committee in the several provinces which the Government of India propose, seems to me to rest on too arbitrary a basis.

11. Do you accept the position adopted in the Bill (Part II.) that the time has not yet come to give the Legislative Assembly a similar measure of control over the Central Government as that given to Provincial Legislative Councils over provincial governments?—I do. I think that the Government of India for the present must remain a unitary Government, and that the dualism which is proposed to be established in the provinces of an Executive Council responsible to Parliament and Ministers responsible to the Legislature can find no place in the Central Government. That being so, I see no particular advantage and several disadvantages in dividing the All-India subjects into "reserved" and "transferred" subjects, and giving to the Legislative Assembly in respect of the latter a similar measure of control as is given to Local Governments. The control would be mainly, if not solely, financial and of a negative character. A law passed by the Legislative Assembly on a transferred subject to which the Government objected would be thrown out by the Council of State. To require the Government of India to obtain supplies for the transferred subjects by resolutions carried in the Legislative Assembly would be a solitary exception from what I understand to be the accepted principle that resolutions of the Assembly shall have no binding force. The position of the Council of State, if such a power were given to the Legislative Assembly, would have to be considered. The framing of the list of transferred subjects would be very difficult, as there is no obvious principle on which to proceed. Sir James Brunyate's list would not subserve the purpose, for it has been framed not with a view of giving control to the Legislative Assembly but of enlarging the financial powers of the Government of India vis-a-vis the Secretary of State when they have the concurrence of the Legislative Council.

12. Do you agree that it is advisable, none the less, to provide for a substantial elective majority in the Indian Legislature (Clause 16)?—Yes.

13. Do you accept the plan of a bicameral legislature as arising out of this, as constituting both a satisfactory machine for the ordinary purposes of legislation and as affording the means to the Governor-General in Council to secure legislation which he regards as essential (Clauses 14, 15, and 16)?—I am unable to suggest a more satisfactory scheme. I hope it may eventually be possible to have the elected members returned by a direct method of election.

14. Do you accept the provisions of the Bill as to the course of legislation in the Indian Legislature? (Clause 20 (3) and (4). Or do you regard them as unnecessarily restrictive on the popular will, or as an inadequate means of ensuring to the Governor-General in Council the discharge of his responsibilities?—I accept the provisions.

15. Do you accept the changes made by the Bill (Clause 21) in the constitution of the Governor-General's Executive Council? If not, what are your reasons, and what modifications would you suggest?—Yes.

16. Do you think that the development of provincial autonomy on the one hand, and of self-government in the provinces on the other, involves any modification of the provisions of Sections 2, 33 and 45 of the Government of India Act (Clause 23)?—I think that the necessary modification is made by the words proposed to be inserted in Sections 33 and 45 of the principal Act.

17. Do you agree that the gradual realisation of responsible government involves periodical examination of progress by independent authority, and that the provisions of Clause 28 of the Bill are well designed to afford such examinations?—I think that periodical examination is desirable. The provisions of the clause have been criticised as possibly excluding from examination the question whether the principle of responsible government should not be introduced into the central Government. It should be made clear that this is not excluded from examination.

18. Are there any matters which it is proposed in the Bill to deal with by rule which you would suggest should be provided for in the Bill?—I have no suggestions to make on this head.

19. Have you any observations to offer on the Reports of Lord Southborough's Committees and of the Committee on the Home Administration of Indian Affairs?—With regard to the Reports of the Southborough Committees, I think the Committees have discharged their most difficult task in a manner exceeding expectations. They have proposed a workable scheme for the formation of electoral constituencies and for the division of subjects; and although there are some points on which their recommendations may be open to modifications, they have in their reports provided the materials necessary for the discussion and ultimate decision of such doubtful questions. On the difficult subject of the joint or separate purse, I am in favour of starting with the joint purse, and giving power to the Governor in Council to apply to the Government of India for a Commission to apportion the revenue if he finds that the joint purse is unworkable. The joint purse is said to be open to the objection that by means of it the popular party will strive to obtain, and may obtain, control over the finance of reserved subjects. This claim, it is argued, is unfair and wrong, and opposed to the conception of diarchy, since the essence of diarchy is that the popular party should should control transferred subjects and the finance appertaining to them, and that the rest of the field should remain with the Governor in Council, as at present. I am not clear that the aim of the advocates of the joint purse is to get control of the finance of reserved subjects, though they may wish to influence it. But, even if this is their aim, the provisions of the Bill are opposed to its attainment. The Budget will be prepared by the dual Government, and will, it may be hoped, represent a reasonable settlement of the demands of the two halves of the Government. The powers of the Legislature in dealing with the expenditure estimates for reserved subjects are limited. I think that the success of dualism will greatly depend on the two halves working together in a spirit of give and take, having the general interest of the province at heart, and this not only in finance, but in the whole sphere of administration. The joint purse, if it can be worked, will tend to draw the two halves together. The separate purse will sunder them from the very start. As regards the Report of the Committee on the Home Administration of Indian Affairs, I do not wish to add in this statement to the evidence I gave before that body; but I am ready to answer to the best of my ability any questions that may be put.

Chairman.

7257. Sir Thomas, you were a member of the Indian Civil Service up to the year 1901?—Yes, my Lord.

7258. How many years' service did you put in in India?—Twenty-nine.

7259. What was the last post you held in India?—I was Secretary to the Government of India in the Revenue and Agricultural Department.

7260. And then you became?—Revenue Secretary in the India Office.

7261. When did you become Permanent Under-Secretary in the India Office?—In 1912.

7262. We have had your memorandum in answer to our questions. Do you wish to supplement that in any way?—I should like to say that I think dualism is a workable system if it is worked on both sides with good faith, and with an intention to make the best of it and if the Indian members of the Legislative Councils will resist the temptation of striving to overthrow it and making it out to be an impossible half-way house, because there is considerable opportunity in this scheme for doing that. Deadlocks could be brought about, and they could only be resolved by the exercise by the Governor of his exceptional powers in the matter of securing supplies against the will of the Council and in passing Bills which they refuse to pass, or stopping Bills which he does not like. I do not anticipate that this will happen, because I hope that when the reform scheme is passed people in India will endeavour to make the best of it and make it a workable thing. Still, one has to face the facts, and it seems to me that a series of deadlocks is a possibility. Subject to that I think that diarchy is an extremely clever device for giving the enlarged Legislative Councils a distinct measure of control over a certain area of subjects. I am not certain that it has all the superiority that the Government of India think over the Lieutenant-Governors' scheme. On the other hand, I feel quite certain that to introduce the Lieutenant-Governors' scheme as a substitute for this diarchy at the present time would give rise to a great amount of suspicion, and would fail to secure anything like contentment in India. I also think that if the Lieutenant-Governors' scheme were thought to be possible at this stage it would have to be modified in two directions, and I doubt whether the authors of the scheme would like the amendments which, to my mind, would be inevitable. The one would be that there would be a division of subjects as there is in diarchy, so as to give the elected members of the Legislative Council a special measure of control over certain subjects, and the other is that the decision as to the representatives of the Legislative Council in the Governor's Executive Council would have to be reconsidered. The scheme says that the official members and the popular members of the Executive Council should be on an identical footing as regards status, position, and security of tenure. Well, the representative members would have to be more or less representative of the general sentiment of the Legislative Council—they could not be wholly opposed to it—and if they did not get on with the Legislative Council, or if they did not satisfy the Governor and worked with their own colleagues, they must be liable to be dismissed from office. That at once differentiates the ordinary official member of the Council from the representative, and if they are to be on the same plane the result would be that you would have to get rid of the Royal Warrant altogether and let both the official members and the popular representatives in the Council be appointed by the Governor and hold during his pleasure. That, of course, makes a very serious change in the composition of the Executive Council, and I do not think the Lieutenant-Governors would like that. At the same time, it logically follows from their scheme. I have said this about the Lieutenant-Governors' scheme not to advocate it but to say that I think it has certain merits, or a certain merit, which the Government of India's conception of diarchy has not. The Government of India accentuate the necessity for keeping the Ministers apart from the Executive Council on the ground that they must have a definite responsibility towards the Legislative Council, and in that spirit they wish to keep them apart as far as possible; but it seems to me that the bringing of the two elements together is a strong point in the Lieutenant-Governors' scheme, because all our experience of representative government everywhere is that the stronger and more united a Government is the greater efficiency and the greater force it has. The Government of India, again, say that the Lieutenant-Governors' scheme has a sort of veiled duality. There must be a difference between the two parts, and it is useless to conceal that. But I would submit that in almost any Cabinet anywhere there is that duality existing. Every Minister does not think alike, and does not represent the same shade of opinion, especially in countries where the group system prevails. Therefore, as it is you have duality in the Governments of other countries. My idea of the diarchy system is that the Governor should encourage joint responsibility as far as he can between the two halves of his Ministry, and, although they would not vote together, they ought to consult constantly together, and the Minister ought not to bring in a Bill or a big measure without at any rate having it discussed in what you might call a Cabinet. If that view is right, then it largely influences me in my wish to see a joint purse, and also in my willingness to see the whole of the subject of education made over to a Minister. If a Minister is to run education, secondary and university education as well as primary education, I do not think at present you have got men fitted for that task in India; but if he can rely on his official colleagues in the Executive Council I think it is possible that he might manage it. The same as regards the development of industries. Many people have a great fear that if you transfer industries to Ministers the transfer will not succeed, and the Minister will be found unequal to the work. But if he worked with his colleagues and all important measures he proposes to bring about in the development of industries are discussed in the United Council, then, I think, there is a fair chance of the transfer not ending in disaster. I think that is really all I have to say.

7263. That is all you want to say in supplement?—Yes.

Lord Sydenham.

7264. I am afraid I have not had a moment to read your paper yet, Sir Thomas, but I understand you say that the question as to whether industries should be handed over rests entirely upon the kind of consultation which takes place between the different members of the Cabinet?—I would not say entirely, but I think it would very materially.

7265. That is, of course, the kind of thing which cannot be laid down in any way; it must depend on the individuality of the people?—On the individuality of the people, and I think the spirit in which the head of the Government works the new scheme.

7266. Do you really think, as a general question, that dual government is a workable arrangement?—I think that, given good faith and good will on both sides, it might be a workable arrangement.

7267. That is to say, it would depend on the chance of

of personalities being exactly what they ought to be in order to work a system which has never been tried before in the world?—Yes, there is the risk of failure, of course, in it; but you have to make an advance, and I have not convinced myself that there is any other way of doing it.

7268. You look upon it as inevitable because of the introduction of the word "gradual" in the announcement?—Quite apart from that, I think India had come to a point where a liberal measure of political advance was absolutely necessary.

7269. You know that the progress throughout the Dominions has been to gradually build up representative institutions with a view to the introduction of responsible government, responsible government being given wholly after the representative institutions had been built up. Do you not think that we have to do a good deal of building up of representative institutions before India is fit for any form of what is called responsible government?—I think you come to a stage in a nation's history when they are not satisfied with gas and water, and so on; it leaves them quite cold, and you must give them something more; and I think you have reached that point in India.

7270. Must not the whole basis of it be a considerable electorate, so that the members of the Legislative Council may really be representative of the people? Do you think that we have got anywhere near that in India yet?—You have not got to the yoint you have in this country, or possibly in some European countries. On the other hand, there are countries, perhaps not in Europe, but, at any rate, in the world, where you have representative institutions with an electorate certainly not superior to what you get in India.

7271. With an electorate in which something like 80 per cent. of the rural population is illiterate?—I believe in Athens very few of the people could read, but they worked their constitution very well.

7272. Their constitution was not exactly a democratic one, although it worked very well for the oligarchical Government. You really think responsible government could be made a reality through this dual system?—I should not like to say that what is proposed is responsible government. I have said in my Memorandum that I do not think it is, in the constitutional sense in which we use the words "responsible government" but what it does do is to give an assembly, in which there is an elected majority, a special measure of control, within limits, in respect of a certain area of subjects. I do not think that is responsible government in the sense in which we use it with regard to the self-governing Dominions.

7273. If you abandon the idea of really responsible government, can you not adhere, at all events for some years, to the unitary government?—The only unitary government which is proposed is that of the Lieutenant-Governors' scheme, and I have suggested that I think you could not propose that to the Indian people without extensive changes in it.

7274. You mean that the Indian politicians would not accept it in any form?—I do not think they would accept it in its present form; they would think it a retrograde step; they would say: "We have been encouraged to come over to this country and to represent our views and to press them very earnestly, and here we are presented with something which is less than the Bill."

7275. I am sure you will agree that the Morley-Minto Councils have the effect of giving considerable weight to Indian opinion?—Yes, I agree.

7276. It is my opinion, and it was also elicited from Lord Carmichael here, that the Councils do not yet realise the very considerable power that they did obtain?—They have failed to realise it, or at any rate they represent that it is less than it really is. It is influence, not control.

7277. That is perfectly true. But you do not think preserving a unitary government which gets over an enormous lot of difficulties would in effect go so far as we ought to go at the present time with safety?—Not the undiluted Lieutenant-Governors' scheme. I do not think it goes far enough.

7278. Are you satisfied with the electorates as proposed?—I have not examined them very closely. I should say there are some outstanding questions which have still to be settled. The electorates are left to rules which have not yet been settled; but, form of rules, which have not yet been settled; but, generally speaking, I think the Franchise Committee have made a workable scheme. It is founded mainly on the recommendations of the various local bodies, and those bodies consider they can work it.

7279. I am sure you will admit it is of the very essence, whether you call it responsible government or control, that the Legislative Council should represent equally and fairly all classes in India?—Yes; that is desirable, certainly.

7280. And you know, of course, that we have had an enormous number of representations from the lower castes generally, who say their interest will not be sufficiently represented according to the proposals of the Franchise Committee?—I was not aware that was so all over India. I know it has assumed great prominence in Madras, but I did not know it had been represented forcibly as regards other provinces.

7281. From many other places representations have come showing that there is a great fear as to what the preponderant element in the new Council may do. You follow that is an important point, and that in making these Councils we have to be most careful that the less vocal people, the people who do all the work of India, have an adequate representation?—Yes; that is desirable, certainly.

7282. It may be difficult to obtain, but you think that we ought to put that in the forefront of any great advance in India?—As regards Madras. I have looked at the representations which had been made, and I should not be prepared to go so far as the recommendations of some of the non-Brahmin representatives. I understand the Government of India are prepared to have double constituencies and to reserve a certain portion of the seats for non-Brahmins, and that is as far as I should be disposed to go. I think it would be giving undue weight to those feelings to carve out Madras into communal electorates.

7283. Do you think that there are possible evils, and some evils that we do not know, which may arise under this dual system, and that if they could be avoided in any way it would be desirable?—I suppose there are defects in any system, and I quite agree that in devising any system the great thing is to remove any anticipated defects.

7284. Are we not really in this dual for Government taking a step absolutely in the dark for which no precedent can be found in any part of the world?—I think all parties agree it is a big step.

7285. Is it not a step in the dark, as I say?—I think all constitutional advances of a considerable size are steps in the dark; we have been constantly told that in our history.

Sir J. D. Rees.

7286. Sir Thomas, am I right in thinking that your long and distinguished service has been more particularly connected with the Revenue branch of the Administration, and incidentally with those who paid the Revenue?—Yes.

7287. And then you have an extensive knowledge of the ordinary Indian ryot?—I do not know that I have an extensive knowledge; I have some knowledge.

7288. Does the word "illiterate" as applied to him bear the same sort of significance as it would if applied to anyone in this country? Is he in point of fact a stupid person or one unaware of his own interest and wishes?—No; he is not by any means a stupid person. He knows his own interests in his own sphere, but, of course, it is quite small and narrow.

7289. Is he rather a shrewd person and capable of judging, if there were two candidates, for instance, which would be most likely to suit his book?—I think he is a shrewd person; whether he could always judge which of the two candidates was the right one, I do not know.

7290. That could hardly be said of any of us, but do you think he is on the whole capable of casting a considered or reasoned vote?—A good many of them are.

7291. That arises out of what Lord Sydenham asked you. Further, arising out of what he asked, do you believe that there is any necessary antagonism between the interests of the upper and lower castes in India, that their interests are necessarily diverse?—I think each class thinks of its own caste specially, and puts that in the foreground. I do not know that their interests are very greatly diverse or more diverse than you would find in any country where you have a variety of classes, if not of castes.

7292. You do not believe that there is a corporate antagonism between castes which may be collectively styled higher castes and those which may be collectively called lower castes?—Not in the part of India I know; it may be otherwise in Madras.

7293. Something was said to-day about the probable effect of this Bill, if it passes, in impairing the District Magistrate's powers to keep order in his district and preventing people from looking up to him and going to him as heretofore. I should like to ask you if you see anything anywhere in any clause in the Bill which would affect the District Magistrate's power to keep the peace or alter his position in that respect?—Not expressly in the Bill.

7294. I should also like to ask you this question: You served for a considerable period in Calcutta, and are well acquainted with the large European community there and their interests. In the scheme of reforms and the Bill giving effect to them as far as it does, and the contemplated rules under the Bill, what is your idea as to the position of foreign capital invested, including in the word "foreign" our capital invested in India? Do you think its position endangered, or greatly altered, or affected?—I cannot really say, but if I look at the present state of affairs in India, in a big place like Calcutta or Madras, I do not see any signs of capital being scared by impending reforms. I do not see any drop in the value of shares—in fact, everything has gone up, and there is no apprehension, as far as I can see, expressed in terms of money.

7295. Would you say that there has been during the latter half of your long service any appreciable falling-off in the class, from the intellectual or other point of view, of men who have entered the Indian Civil Service?—No, I do not think so; I think the average is maintained.

7296. You can remember, no doubt, or at any rate if not the time of the change the time immediately following the change from Haileybury to competition?—That was before my time.

7297. It is not long, at all events; it is near enough for you to remember the apprehensions which were then expressed that the new men would be vastly inferior?—I do not remember that.

7298. Would you say that these reforms, so far as you can forecast them are likely to very prejudicially affect recruitment?—It is very difficult to say. I have heard both views expressed by people who ought to know, Oxford professors and dons. Some say it will affect recruitment and others say it will not, and I take it that a great deal depends on the openings in this country in the professions.

7299. Have you formed an opinion on the whole yourself as to which of those two views is correct?—I do not think myself if I were a young man I should be deterred from going to India by the change.

7300. Is a high exchange, speaking generally, favourable to an English public servant in India?—On the whole it is, certainly.

7301. Do you believe that these changes, if the Bill passes, will result in wholesale applications for proportionate pensions?—I do not think so.

Sir Henry Craik.

7302. You think, Sir Thomas, that the principles of this Bill should not be applied to the Government of India?—Yes, that is my view.

7303. And that the dual system in the Provinces would not be possible?—I did not say it would not be possible, but during this season of probation and trial it is better not to weaken the Central Government.

7304. And you think that any extension of the Bill in that direction so as to affect the Central Government would be a rash thing?—I would prefer not to see it.

7305. With regard to the dual government, you think it essential for the working of this dual government that there should be some sort of practical unity in the Government, that it should come together by some means?—I wish them to be in consultation together as much as possible.

7306. Do you trust to that consultation being always followed by agreement?—No, I do not.

7307. You compared the case of certain differences of opinion in the English Cabinet with the possible position in India, but surely those differences are on minor points which are for the time being subordinated to one great principle which holds together all the members of the Cabinet?—That is so.

7308. But is it not almost certain that in the composition of the Dual Provincial Governments there will be fundamental differences of opinion, which will only by discussion become more marked?—No, I cannot see it in that way. I do not see why there should be. A great deal can be done by talk, discussion, and persuasion.

7309. Surely, if they start by looking at things from a different point of view, discussion will not bring them nearer, and there must come a point where they must agree to differ, and then, if they are to go on together, it must be on two distinct channels?—I can understand that there will be points on which they fail to agree after discussion and so on, and then, of course, there must be, as regards that particular measure, separation between the two points of view. The Minister will pursue his Bill, and it will rest with the official Government, whether it is to actively back that Minister up or to leave him to his supporters and himself.

7310. You know, in the Cabinet here, however much there may be differences of opinion between different members of the Council, when it comes to a matter of voting for a particular measure they must all vote one way, or else part?—Yes, the analogy breaks down.

7311. That would not be the case in India?—I do not think it would be the case.

7312. So you do not wish to press that analogy between here and there?—No; I only want the members of the Government to approximate as far as possible in their practical working.

7313. There is only one other subject I want to ask about, because I do not quite understand your position. You said—and one admits for very grave reasons—you do not think there ought to be any division with regard to education, and that the whole of education should go together?—I feel that it is an extremely difficult question to decide. I have read the evidence of Sir Michael Sadler, and I have seen what Sir James Meston said, and what the Government of India have said, and there are difficulties in either direction. What, on the whole, really moves me most is Sir Michael Sadler's view, that the education of India, to be successful, requires a greater impetus than the official Government can give, and that there is a chance of that if you make the whole of education over to a Minister.

7314. But you see great difficulty in dividing education?—I do.

7315. I think you added immediately that you cannot at present find a man in India who would be fit to take over the whole?—I think in some Provinces there would be a difficulty. In Bengal there are men, I expect, who could do it, and in Madras, and probably in Bombay; but when you come to Upper India, the United Provinces or the Pubjab, I think it would be difficult to find anybody, especially in the Legislature, who is capable or who has the knowledge and experience to run the whole thing.

7316. To act as Minister?—As Minister.

7317. If it were dealt with as a transferred subject?—Yes. On the other hand, a Minister would take over a running Department, with the staff, and if he is a sensible man he will be guided a great deal by his professional advisers and his secretaries.

7318. You do not think the transferred subjects might differ in different Provinces, and where you did not find a man fit to do it you might keep it as a reserved subject?—I do not see why that differentiation should not be made.

7319. You think it possible?—Well, it is quite possible, it seems to me.

7320. You see no great objection, or no insuperable objection?—I do not.

Lord Brodrick (Viscount Midleton).

7321. As Under-Secretary of State, you have been familiar with the whole working of the India Office as regards the intervention by the India Office in the affairs of India?—Yes.

7322. Have you considered carefully Clause 23 of the Bill and the provision made under it, "Notwithstanding standing anything in the Principal Act, the Secretary of State may by rule regulate and restrict the exercise of the powers of superintendence, direction and control vested in the Secretary of State, the Secretary of State in Council, and the Governor-General in Council by the principal Act." That is a very wide power, is it not?—A very wide power.

7323. Has it ever come to your knowledge in the course of your period as Under-Secretary that anything has occurred which has made it necessary to extend the Secretary of State's powers in that way?—I think it arises out of the new idea of government in India, embodied in the Bill. A certain portion of the Government in the provinces is to be freed from Parliamentary control and left to the Provincial Ministry and to the Legislature, and this clause, as I understand it, is put in to enable the Secretary of State to give effect to that.

7324. Have not the Acts under which the Secretary of State performs his duties been a sort of schedule by which the whole of the India Office and the whole of the Government of India have been bound in the past?—In the past they have been bound.

7325. Is it not desirable that everybody should be aware of exactly what the powers are of the Secretary of State and that those are not binding on one Secretary of State only, but that they should be continuous and binding equally on all Secretaries of State?—If rules were made under Clause 23 and they were laid before both Houses of Parliament and no objection against them was presented, they would be binding upon every Secretary of State until he chose to make a new set of rules.

7326. Surely a newly-established Secretary of State might, with his Council, make a number of rules which a Secretary of State of longer experience would have hesitated to make, and which could be made without any reference to Parliament whatever?—I agree there is a great deal of responsibility attaching to the use of this clause, but I gather that a clause of this sort is essential if the Secretary of State is to be relieved, or to relieve himself, of responsibility for certain acts and measures of the Provincial Governments in the sphere of action which is allotted to the Legislature.

7327. Do you think it would be possible to work this new Act without this provision?—Yes; I suppose it would be. The Secretary of State in certain cases would voluntarily abstain from using his powers, and if he were challenged in Parliament as to why he did not exercise them in respect of a certain measure he would say, "It is part and parcel of the system of progressive realisation of responsible government which Parliament has approved."

7328. The Bill before us provides for a reconsideration of this measure after a certain period of years; do you not think that the effect of putting in Clause 23 will be for those who are dissatisfied to continually agitate for changes to be made by rule, which could not be made without an Act of Parliament under present conditions?—If there is agitation in India over the Bill and its restrictions I do not think the agitation will fix on this clause particularly.

7329. In your note you say: "One essential condition is that it" (that is the Bill) "would satisfy the present hopes and aspirations of the active political classes, and they would readily co-operate to make the scheme a success." Have you been able to read the evidence which has been given us up to this moment?—I have read a good deal of it.

7330. Did you notice the pronouncements of, I think, nearly all the leaders of parties in connection with Indian Reform who have come before us, that nothing short of their full demands would cause the cessation of agitation?—People do not always act up to their statements, and I hope for better things when they settle down to work.

7331. Is it not rather a sanguine view to take, as you did in your note, that if in any way the Bill is altered in the direction either of the suggestion of the Lieutenant-Governors, or I rather understand it in other directions, there will not be that co-operation, while there will be that co-operation if the Bill passes in its present form?—The more you cut down the Bill the more you will increase this discontented force. I quite agree this force will exist in India, and there will be possible agitation, but I hope it will be confined within narrow limits.

7332. Having regard to the pronouncement which we have listened to from leading Indians, do you think it would be wise in any way to decrease the power of the Secretary of State, the Governor-General, or the Governors for final action on any matters which are essential?—I do not know that the Bill does decrease the power of either the Governors or of the Governor-General, and as for the Secretary of State, he may or he may not take advantage of this clause, supposing it stands in the Bill.

7333. You agree that in the last resort we must keep these powers intact?—With the Government of India and with the Governors in supreme cases.

7334. With regard to the Secretary of State and his Council, were you a member, or in any way concerned with Lord Crewe's Committee?—I gave evidence before it.

7335. Would you mind telling the Committee what your view is as to the past action of the Council? You attend the Council every week, have you found it a valuable adjunct to the Secretary of State, especially with regard to the changes which so often take place with regard to the heads of offices?—I gave evidence before the Committee, and I did express the opinion that the Council was extremely useful, and I also expressed the view that it would be difficult for the Secretary of State to carry on the business without a Council in some form or another—not necessarily the present form—or without even an advisory committee. But I was in favour of keeping the Council more or less as it is at present, with one exception, namely, that the powers of the Council as to sanctioning expenditure of Indian revenues, and certain other powers which the Secretary of State cannot exercise except with the majority of the Council, might conveniently be dispensed with. Otherwise I considered that the Council was a very valuable adjunct to the Secretary of State. It supplied information in an authoritative way which you could not otherwise get.

7336. You would agree, would you not—take any question, such as Foreign Policy—that it is essential for the Secretary of State to have men of trained Indian experience at his elbow to consult, and in fact his policy should be to a large extent assisted by such people?—Yes. Of course he can get it, and he does get it to some extent, from the office as distinct from the Council.

7337. Take another case. I am not suggesting but what very likely you will change the composition of the Council somewhat, but take a case such as you and I are familiar with as having come up to the office, the partition of Bengal. Do you think it conceivable that the Secretary of State, without a Council, could really be seized with the whole of these questions by reading despatches?—If he had not a Council I suppose there would be advisers of some sort or another with recent Indian experience. He might have an advisory committee such as Lord Crewe's Committee suggest, or if he had not that he would consult people who had recently come from India and who were conversant with the subject; but it would be a fluctuating body.

7338. You think men who are merely advisory have not really the same sense of responsibility as men who are themselves acting?—I think that the Council, even if it were retained in an advisory capacity only, would still have the same sense of responsibility, because it very often happens that the cases in which the Council advises most strongly, and which are most debated, are cases in which the Secretary of State under the Act could over-rule the Council, and the Council is acting in a purely advisory capacity. Yet the Council's influence and the Council's sense of responsibility in those cases is just as great as in the limited number of cases where power to sanction rests with it.

7339. Surely, if you have purely an advisory Council you are running the risk that the eminent man who is called in to advise and asked to sit on the Council, but has no statutory position, may, if his advice is disregarded once or twice, simply resign and go away?—I am assuming that he has a settled tenure, as in the present Council. What I am urging is that, with the exception of the limited cases in which the Council has the power to sanction or withhold sanction, the Council in all other respects is at present advisory, and in its advisory capacity it seems to me to exercise just as much responsibility and to have have just as much consideration as where it has power of sanction.

7340. You have had experience both in India and the India Office. Would you favour the suggestion that there should be considerable interchange between the Indian Civil Service and the staff of the India Office for mutual information?—I was examined at considerable length on that point by the Crewe Committee, and my view was that it is desirable to bring from time to time members of the Indian Civil Service into the office, and that there is not very great difficulty in arranging that, but that there is a difficulty in arranging the counter-transfer to India, because you send a man from the India Office to India who knows nothing about the languages or the law, and who would have to spend a very considerable time in being trained there before being of any use.

7341. I would just like to get it on record—I daresay all the members of the Committee are not familiar with it—but there is, is there not, not diarchy but a dual method in the India Office of the presentation of matters to the Secretary of State? A Council of the office makes their presentment of the case, and the Member of Council charged with the particular business makes his presentment on different lines, but both come to the Secretary of State. Do you think those two courses are both necessary or do you think it would be possible to unite them; that is to say, do away with the heads of the different departments and make those who are now Members of Council act as heads of departments so as not to duplicate the business?—Yes, it would be possible; but I would like to describe exactly the procedure that takes place in our office. The office submits the case, say a despatch from the Government of India, with its recommendations, and the case then goes, if it is an important matter, to the Secretary of State, who may or may not remark upon it. He then passes it on, not to a single member of the Council, but to a Committee of the Council, and valuable work is then done by that Committee. You may have four or five members of the Committee on this case. The drudgery has already been done in the office, and suggestions have been put forward, but members of the Committee are in a position of authority which the office does not possess to settle the case or at any rate to make recommendations. Then it goes to the Council. I do not think the dual procedure is procedure which really overlaps.

7342. At the same time you think the India Office work is capable of some simplification?—Yes. Of course the suggestion your Lordship made is a possible expedient, but it has these defects: You would take away from the office all the headships of departments; that is to say, there would be no scope for an ambitious man to rise, because all these appointments would be filled from India. You would have to take from India not a man of mature experience, who has been a Lieutenant-Governor or a Member of Council, but one of the younger generation and less experience, and his influence would not have the same weight as an adviser to the Secretary of State, as a man who had passed through a whole series of high offices in India.

7343. One more question; assuming that Indian affairs were to form much more the concern of Parliament and popular assemblies in India, do you think it would be an advantage to have the Parliamentary Committee which is suggested, which would have the power of examining into these questions and enabling the India Office to make their case round the table?—Yes; I am in favour of it. I think that it has certain advantages.

Mr. Montagu

7344. Would you give us your experience as to whether the Council or the Councillors were of more use to the Secretary of State? Do you attach importance to the Council in its collective capacity or in its individual capacity?—I attach importance to both.

7345. You gave some answers to Lord Midleton just now about the often-discussed scheme of the portfolio system and you said that its chief disadvantage in your mind was that it would deprive members of the India Office of a chance of becoming heads of departments. They are not now heads of departments in the same sense as you have heads of departments in other Government offices, because they have a Committee of the Council between them and the head of the office?—Yes; that is true.

Mr. Montagu—continued.

7346. Supposing you adopted the portfolio system, and had a second man in each department, or a Member of Council, in charge of a department, one or the other always a member of the Indian Civil Service, but not both—from India I should have said?—Does that mean the abolition of the Council or the substitution of the heads of departments, as it were, for the Council?

7347. Yes?—I have one great objection to it; that it would really prevent the representation in the office of Indians because I do not know any Indian who would be capable of running a department as head. At present the Council is an opening for Indians.

7348. Would you favour the scheme of direct correspondence between members of Council in the India Office and their opposite members in India?—No. I do not see the necessity for it as a recognised system. There is correspondence, of course, but it is private.

7349. Do you ever feel that there is too much centralisation in the India Office in the hands of the Under-Secretary and Secretary of State?—That is a very difficult question to answer. I have done a good deal in the way of delegation since I have been in the office.

7350. Is not delegation hampered by statute, or do you not find it so?—It is in some respects, but there is a great deal of delegation.

7351. I come back for a moment to Clause 23. Supposing that clause was struck out of the Bill, it would be impossible, would it not, for a Secretary of State in Council to delegate any of his functions either to a Provincial Government or to the Government of India except by what I may call a non-binding decision of his own?—I think, as regards financial responsibility, the Secretary of State can already make rules, or allow the Government of India to make rules, which do delegate very considerable powers to them. There is a very large scope there, but it is in administrative matters that the Secretary of State is at present responsible to Parliament. Take the particular case of Excise. Excise is to be a transferred subject in connection with which the Secretary of State would wish to leave the whole responsibility to the Provincial Governments. Yet it is quite possible that something might be done in the matter of Excise by one of the Governments which will attract attention in Parliament, and the Secretary of State would, if he has not made any rules under Section 23, be held to be responsible. I think that is a case in which, if a rule were made under Section 23, he would be protected; at any rate it should protect him, and in particular relieve him in a statutory way of the responsibility he has at present.

7352. Just one other subject. You put before the Committee a scheme for a unified Provincial Government as a modification of the Lieutenant-Governors' scheme, and one of the features of it was that, notwithstanding the fact that you had united government, there were to be transferred and reserved subjects?—Yes.

7353. In the transferred subjects, I take it, the official members of your united Government would defer to the opinions of the non-official members?—I think so.

7354. As long as it was a transferred subject?—Yes.

7355. But they would continue, because it was a united Government, to take full responsibility and equal responsibility among all the members of the Government for all the subjects?—Yes; but that is always subject to the Governor agreeing with the member.

7356. Therefore, in your form of unified government the official members responsible, equally with the non-official members, would be compelled to adopt and carry out a policy with which they had not agreed?—They need not vote for it or speak in support of it then.

7357. The fact that they are united would make it a collective responsibility, would it not?—Yes, with a primary responsibility on the member.

7358. Now, another feature of your scheme would be that you could only have collective voting?—In the Council?

7359. In the Executive Council?—Well, you might. I do not know why you should not.

7360. Would you be prepared to see an Executive Council under your scheme in which there was a majority majority of Indians?—No; I was thinking of half and half.

7361. Therefore, you would be restricted to two Indians, however great a list of transferred subjects there was?—Yes, that would be the case, unless you had three Europeans as well.

7362. Apart from that suggestion, your evidence amounts to this—that you would want the Government to be as united as possible and to deliberate together as often as possible?—The Government constituted under the Bill—yes.

7363. One last question. You told Lord Midleton you had read most of the evidence given before this Committee, and you said also that you would not like to see any duality in the Government of India?—Yes.

7364. Is there anything short of duality in the Government of India; is there anything you would be prepared to recommend, which is not in the Bill, to meet the evidence which you have read?—No, I do not see my way to it.

Lord Sinha.

7365. Sir Thomas, as I understand it—I may be wrong, but this is my understanding of the evidence of the Indian members of the deputations who have appeared before this Committee—with regard to this claim of the Bill for the Provinces, that there should be a division of subjects, but that there should be joint deliberation between the two divisions or sections of the Government in all matters, and if it came to voting it should be voted on in the section concerned; secondly, that the purse should be joint; and, thirdly, that with regard to both the sections the Governor should have the same right to veto the decision of the Councillors or Ministers, as the case may be, on grounds now existing in the Act. Would you agree?—May I ask if you are referring to the Bill and the Government set up under this Bill?

7366. Under this Bill; they all want these three things to be made clear?—And the first is?

7367. The first is joint deliberation, although there may be separate voting, if voting became necessary?—Joint deliberation certainly.

7368. If it came to voting—of course, it might not come to voting at all—they might all agree, which I hope would generally be the case, but what would happen if it came to voting, that is, if there was a difference of opinion in regard to reserved subjects amongst the Executive Councillors, and in regard to transferred subjects amongst Ministers?—I imagine under the scheme of the Bill their views would never be put formally to the vote. The Governor would allow the discussion and take the sense of both his Ministers and Executive Councillors. I believe in the old days—I do not know what it is now—there was no voting in a Cabinet.

7369. But it is informal voting. So far as I know the Executive Council, each one is asked his opinion, and the Governor either agrees, when there is a difference of opinion, or overrules?—Yes, under the Executive Council, as established at present, when voting is prescribed, and the Governor has a power of setting aside the majority in certain cases; but under the scheme of the Bill, as I understand it, when there is consultation between the two halves of the Government, there would not be formal voting.

7370. Voting is what is asked for by the Indian members, as I understand it, in the same way as in the Executive Council?—No; I do not think that would be feasible.

7371. Then they further ask that there should be a joint purse?—Yes.

7372. They say the scheme will be unworkable, and not really worth looking at unless there is a joint purse?—Yes.

7373. Thirdly, they say that the Governor should have the same right to overrule his Ministers as he has to overrule his Executive Council?—As regards the joint purse, I agree. At any rate, I would give it a trial. If it does not succeed then the Governor must apply to the Government of India for a Commission or Committee to divide. What was the third point?

7374. That the power to overrule should be the same with regard to both sections?—No. I do not agree there. The Governor would continue to have his statutory power over his Council, and the Council have a power of dissent and of recording it by minute; but that is not the case, as I understand, as regards the Ministers.

7375. He would have, under the instructions, the right to overrule?—Certainly; he would have a right to overrule.

7376. Therefore, the right is practically the same, is it not? Is there any difficulty in making it appear the same in the Bill itself?—In that case you give the Minister a power of recording his dissent and the Governor has formally to overrule him.

7377. Would there be any harm in that?—It is not contemplated in the Bill.

7378. No; but would there be any harm in it? Do you think there will be anything inconsistent in the scheme?—I do not think I should prescribe it at present. May I just say this in addition? The Governor's position as regards his Executive Council is rather different from what it is as regards his Minister. The Executive Council holds office for a certain term. The Governor can dismiss his Minister at any time. There is a distinction, and that has, I think, something to do with the mode of overruling.

7379. Quite so. That, of course, would remain as long as the tenure is different. Am I right in understanding your criticism of the Lieutenant-Governor's scheme to be that it would not satisfy public opinion in India unless it was modified in two respects; firstly, that there should be a division of subjects—one over which the Legislative Council would have control, and another over which there should not be such control?—I think those two alterations would certainly be necessary.

7380. The second modification is that all the members of the Council—because it will be only a Council then—which are four, two officials and two non-officials, should hold office during the pleasure of the Governor, as Ministers should under the scheme?—Yes, I think that is the logical result of the scheme.

7381. Without those two alterations the scheme would not be workable or acceptable?—No, and even with those alterations I do not know that it would be acceptable.

7382. Even with those alterations you prefer the scheme of the Bill?—Yes, it has been elaborated and been in the field for a long time, and I would not change now.

7383. In your opinion would there be any danger in agreeing to embody in the Bill a provision that there should be three Indian members of the Executive Council of the Viceroy instead of two as contemplated?—There is no racial distinction at present in the Bill, and I am not in favour of any racial distinction.

Chairman.

7384. Did not you say there was no racial distinction altogether apart from the Bill?—No, I am speaking of the Executive Council.

Lord Sinha.

7385. Yes, of the Governor-General. I was suggesting to you whether a modification which would enable half the members of that Council to be Indians would not be a step which would satisfy Indian public opinion. It is contemplated to give two Indian members to that Council?—But there is nothing said about it in the Bill.

7386. No?—All the Bill does is to prescribe ten years' service under Government in respect of two members, and both those might be Indians.

7387. I quite agree they might be Indians, but the Report itself contemplates that there should be two and no more than two. I am asking you whether, if there is any further change in the Executive Government, a change in the direction which I suggest—namely, an addition to the number of Indian members from two to three, would be such a step as might be contemplated without any misgivings?—I am not in favour of expressing it in the Bill. As regards what should be done in practice, I think it would partly depend on the number of members of the Executive Council. The Bill proposes to leave the numbers indefinite, and, with a Council in excess of the present number of six, you might easily have three Indians.

7388. And you would not have any misgivings with regard to that?—All I feel about the Council is that it should should be efficient. There is heavy work for every member, and every man should be an efficient man.

7389. You do not think it would be impossible to get three in India?—It depends on the number of members of the Council, and the allotment of portfolios.

7390. It is a scheme which is under consideration now?—Yes.

Lord Islington.

7391. One more word as regards this question of the dual and unified Government. I understand you are very anxious to see unity of discussion in all matters, and to make that compatible with duality of decision?—Yes. Assuming that there is to be diarchy, as in the Bill, I am in favour of the utmost consultation and deliberation.

7392. Would you favour a clause definitely laying down that all matters which are to be subjects of collective discussion and decision as apart from purely departmental questions, whether they be reserved or transferred subjects, should first undergo discussion by both branches of the Government sitting and de-deliberating as one Government?—I do not think I would put it in the Bill. That seems to me to be going too far into detail. It is a matter which ought to be left to the Governor's discretion, subject to his instructions. You can put something like that into the instructions. Even as it is, all matters are not deliberated by the Governor in Council. The Members of Council work separately a great deal.

7393. Exactly. I was saying, apart from departmental questions, only those subjects of discussion which come up for collective decision?—In that case it is for the Governor to decide. He settles the practice in each Government as to how far there should be joint consultation, and I would leave him to do that with his Ministers.

7394. You think it would meet the case if the instrument of instruction to each Governor laid that down rather than make it a clause in the Bill?—Yes, in general terms.

7395. Then I would like your opinion on this: You say, on the whole, you favour the proposal that all branches of education should be transferred; but I think you said, in answer to one question put to you, that you lay stress on the importance, if that be so, of the full united discussion and assistance of all members of the Government?—In all the larger questions of education.

7396. Have you ever thought whether it would be advisable—it is a proposal, of course, which you may say will add to the complications, but this is necessarily a complicated scheme—to put certain subjects under a united government in the Provinces—such subjects, I would suggest, as education and industries—and make the whole policy attaching to those subjects one to be decided upon by the united government, the Executive Council, and Ministers sitting together as a Cabinet, and deciding as such with the Governor?—Then you would have a triarchy, a third division of subjects, would you not?

7397. Yes, it would be a third division?—I think the scheme is complicated enough, if I may venture to say so.

7398. I anticipated that would be the answer you would give. On the other hand, would you say those two subjects, education and industries, possibly above all others, are subjects that should have for their consideration and assistance the whole of the Government?—Yes, I think so; and I expect a Governor himself would see to that without being told.

7399. However, you would not care to branch off into that third category?—No, I think not; we have two.

7400. Questions have been put to you as regards Clause 23 of the Bill. Clause 23 is not really any extension; it does not suggest any extension of the power which the Secretary of State already possesses, does it?—No.

7401. He has got all the powers embodied in that clause, which are to be submitted to rules, already in the existing Act?—To a great extent; but this, of course, if acted upon, would divest him formally of responsibility to Parliament with regard to certain subjects embodied in the rules.

7402. Rather it would be giving him the power to divest himself by his own discretion of whatever responsibilities he may desire to devolve on another authority?—That is the case as regards the Secretary of State and the Secretary of State in Council, but this clause also gives him power to divest the Governor-General in Council of responsibility, and that, I understand, the Government of India do not like.

7403. No; but I suppose, if you are to get rule of thumb in the Provinces it is necessary that there should be some provision of this character inserted in the Bill?—I do not think it is absolutely necessary. I think the Secretary of State could do it without a rule, and could justify his action in Parliament if challenged. His action would never be challenged unless it was a case in which Parliament took a great interest in a decision of a local government and considered that decision a wrong one.

7404. There has been a good deal of evidence from all the witnesses that I have read, and I think it is in the Reports—in Lord Crewe's Report, in the main Report to a certain extent, and more precisely in subsequent reports by Sir James Brunyate and Professor Keith—laying down that in future the Government of India should not have disallowing powers, but that their powers should be confined to allowing powers, and, where it came to disallowance, reference should be made to the Secretary of State. Do you generally agree to that proposal?—I think it requires to be further thought out. I understand it is limited to financial matters, as far as I remember.

7405. No; I think not. It embraces both Legislative and administrative matters. I think I am right in saying that, as I have read it quite recently?—That is to say, if a Bill on a reserved subject, where the special sanction of the Government of India is required, comes to the Government of India, and they agree, the Bill need not be referred home; but, if they disagree, it would have to be referred home.

7406. That is it?—I think there is a good deal in that, but we have not yet had the views of the Government of India on the Crewe Report in any detail, and I would like to see what they say about it.

7407. If that were carried, that would be to a certain extent, I suppose, a reimposition of responsibility on the shoulders of the Secretary of State—divesting the responsibility of the Government of India and placing it back on the shoulders of the Secretary of State?—Well, it would be a limitation of the responsibility of the Secretary of State because the Government of India in that case would allow the local Government to act without the Secretary of State's knowledge.

7408. It would to that extent. On the other hand it would not have any power to disallow?—No.

7409. You said just now that you would leave anything in the nature of responsible powers for the Central Government alone for the present?—Yes, that is my view.

7410. Of course, you know the detail of the proposal of Sir James Brunyate?—Yes.

7411. It is a tentative effort to give a certain amount of responsible government to the General Assembly?—I do not read Sir James Brunyate's proposals in that light. I think, if you will look at the proposals, you will see he says: "My proposals are made in order to give the official Government of India larger powers in certain cases when it has the support of the Legislative Assembly than it otherwise would have"; but he goes on expressly to say: "I am not proposing to give any greater power to the Legislative Assembly vis-a-vis the Government of India." So he does not really delegate any enlarged powers of control to the Legislature.

7412. But would not it in practice give more power than at present exists?—It would give more power to the Government of India when they have the Legislative Assembly in agreement with them, and one can see that under certain circumstances if Sir J. Brunyate's proposals were accepted the Secretary of State might be obliged to give way to the Government of India because they had the Legislative Council with them, when he otherwise would not do so, and when he might be firmly convinced that the two together were wrong. A somewhat unscrupulous Government of India might arrange with the Legislative Assembly that a certain thing which they knew the Secretary of State would not agree to if they put it forward themselves should be put forward by them and the Legislative Assembly combined.

7413. By common agreement?—Yes.

7414. That is taking rather an extreme view of the future morality of the Government of India, is it not? However, you would admit, would you not, that it would give a certain amount of power other than that which at present exists to this new General Assembly with this large elective element in it?—Not a control over the Government of India. I do not see that it gives any control over the Government.

7415. Would not you anticipate that there might be a good deal of trouble in the years to come if you leave the General Assembly of India with this large elective element without any responsible power?—In years to come I think the Assembly will have to be given responsible power, but the immediately coming years are what I am thinking of.

7416. You anticipate in a very few years something would have to be done?—Yes—ten years, perhaps.

7417. With regard to the Council of India, you suggest you would like to see the financial powers that at present exist in the hands of the India Council removed?—I am not very strong about it, but in my evidence I said it seemed to me that in all big and really important questions of finance when the Secretary of State is determined to have his way he gets it. This power of sanction is exercised in small matters; but it is really a power which can be forced at any time.

7418. Therefore your inclination towards its removal would be because it is rather futile in its operations?—It is rather futile in its operations, and looks larger than it really is.

7419. Now, assuming that the India Council was made more representative of Indian opinion, would you be prepared to give effective financial power to it over the Secretary of State?—I have never seen any proposal for making the Indian element so large as really to overbalance the other, and I do not think the modified, slightly enlarged Indian element will make a difference; but I am not very strong about taking away the financial powers of the Council. There are good arguments on the other side.

7420. For taging away the existing powers?—Against taking away. It is a very evenly balanced question it seems to me.

7421. As to the numbers of the Council, have you any views? Would you reduce the numbers?—I think the present maximum number, fourteen, which is never worked up to, is too large. I think twelve is about right. The Crewe Committee recommend a minimum of six and a maximum of twelve. Probably six is too small. I think it should be between nine and twelve.

7422. Do not you think that generally nine would do?—I think nine will give the Secretary of State all the assistance that he requires.

7423. Assuming it was composed of nine members, would you agree to three of those being Indians?—Yes.

Mr. Acland.

7424. I understand your difficulty, which I share, about being clear as to transferring the whole of education. Could you go any further than you have gone, and tell us which way you would decide it, if you had to decide it, or is it such a puzzling matter that you cannot come to any clear view?—I think you can do it in two ways. First, you can say that primary education only will be transferred for the first five years, and that there should be power to transfer the whole of education, either to all the Governments or to selected Governments, at the end of five years. The other way is, from the outset, to say that certain Governments should have the whole of education and other Governments primary education only as a transferred subject.

7425. You think one of those two is the best way out?—I think, myself, one of those two. Even Sir Michael Sadler qualified his proposal with certain conditions.

7426. That was so. That is all I have to ask you myself, but my colleague, Mr. Bennett, has asked me to put this question for him: You spoke of difficulty in establishing equality between Ministers and Members of Council. Would it not be an advantage to establish this equality wherever possible? For example, in regard to salaries, would not lower pay to Ministers, involving inferiority of status, be resented for that reason by Indian opinion?—Under the Bill? No doubt, if it is left to the Governor, he will be very strongly pressed to give equal salaries to Ministers, and I expect he will do so. My only fear is that this new system of government is going to be terribly expensive. You have at present several Provinces where the Government consists of a Lieutenant-Governor only. You will have in each province a Governor, and probably two Members of Council and two Indian Ministers, and you may have a Governor in many cases from home. Now, we know that in India a Governor's Government is always more expensive than a Lieutenant-Governor's. He has a larger salary, larger allowances, and bigger state. If you add all those things together we shall have a very large bill to pay.

7427. That is your chief feeling?—That is my feeling.

7428. You are in favour of the principle, perhaps?—I think perhaps the principle will have to be conceded, otherwise there will be a perpetual sore established.

Chairman.] We are very much obliged to you for your evidence.

MEMBERS PRESENT:

Earl of SELBORNE.	Mr F. D. ACLAND.
Lord BRODRICK (Viscount Midleton).	Mr. BENNETT.
Lord ISLINGTON.	Sir HENRY CRAIK.
Lord SYDENHAM.	Mr MONTAGU.
Lord SINHA.	Sir J. D. REES.

The RIGHT HONOURABLE THE EARL OF SELBORNE IN THE CHAIR.

SIR M. F. O'DWYER, G.C.I.E., K.C.S.I., is called in; and Examined, as follows:—

Chairman.

7429. You were Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab?—Yes.

7430. Up till when?—Till the end of May this year.

7431. And that was the end of how many years' service in India?—About thirty-three.

7432. You have been good enough to send in a Memorandum, in answer to the questions we sent you, and that is before all the members of the Committee?—Yes.

Chairman—continued.

The questions and answers were as follows:—

Note.—I have already offered my opinion on the general question of Indian Reforms in the Provincial Government Letter of 5th November, 1918, and the Memorandum of 10th January, 1918, which are printed as enclosures to the Governor of India Despatch of 5th March, 1919, and would refer to those papers as explaining more fully the replies below.

Chairman—continued.

1. Do you accept the proposition that it is desirable to bring about the progressive realisation of responsible government in India? And, if so, how do you define the expression "responsible government"? And do you generally accept the proposition contained in the Preamble?—I accept, with the qualifications stated later, the proposition that it is desirable to bring about the progressive realisation of "responsible government" in India, taking those words to mean the responsibility of Government to a Legislature fully representative of a wide and competent electorate adequately voicing the views of all classes and interests. But the realisation of responsible government must obviously await the creation of such an electorate, and the process is likely to be long and difficult for the reasons stated in the Joint Report. I will quote only two, the justice of which will appeal to everyone with a knowledge of India:—"India is still a country (one might say a congeries of countries) marching in uneven stages through the centuries from the fifth to the twentieth." "The rural classes (226 out of 244 millions) have the greatest stake in the country, because they contribute most to its revenues (one might add, 'and, apart from the British Army, supply almost exclusively the man-power for its defence'); but they are poorly equipped for politics, and do not at present wish to take part in them." Their horizon is limited to their fields and their villages; their life is "a long-drawn question between a crop and a crop"; they are concerned with the caste and family matters described so accurately in Paragraph 133 of the Joint Report, rather than with outside politics; and in the Punjab at least they display the greatest apathy even in matters of local self-government, not more than one in eight of the vacancies in the District Councils being contested, though these Councils regulate many important local matters, schools, roads, fairs, dispensaries, etc. In the Punjab, even including the towns, only one person in twenty-eight was literate at the Census of 1911, and one in sixteen among the male population, while only one in 270 had any knowledge of English. Education is now spreading rapidly, as a Compulsory Primary Education Act was introduced by Government and passed last year. But it will take generations to create a sane and intelligent political instinct among the masses. Meantime their ideal is not "responsible government"—the meaning of which not one in a thousand understands, and for which there is no equivalent in the Indian vernacular—but "good government," which to them means security and protection, light taxation, honest officials, a reasonable rural representation in official circles, which are now in most Provinces monopolised by the educated urban classes, a minimum of interference from outside, a speedy, impartial and reasonably efficient administration of the law, better facilities for education, medical relief, and communications, and timely aid from Government in seasons of scarcity and distress. All of these are objects which are being steadily pursued under the existing form of Government, and with increasing success. They are not, however, ambitious enough to appeal much to the advanced politician, who as a rule takes little interest in any of them, except education, in which all classes are interested; but while the rural classes want more money spent on primary schools at their doors, the political classes desire more high schools and colleges in the towns. This "good government" was solemnly promised to all Indians in Queen Victoria's Proclamation of 1858, when her Majesty undertook "to administer the Government (of India) for the benefit of all our subjects resident therein." In framing any scheme of responsible government to meet the national claims of the politically-minded classes—still a very small minority—we must do nothing that would endanger (a) the fulfilment of the above pledge to all our Indian fellow-subjects, whose interests we hold in trust till they come to the age of political discretion, or (b) the maintenance of India as an integral part of the British Empire as postulated in the announcement of 30th August, 1917, for the former is dependent on the latter. Responsible government is, after all, not so much an end in itself as a means to an end, viz., good government; and I therefore suggest that the present Bill would more clearly express our policy and our obligations if the title or preamble were to show that it is a measure for the "good government" or "better government" of India. I also observe that the Preamble contains no reference to one important feature of the announcement of August, 1917, viz., "the increasing association of Indians in every branch of the administration," and as such association is clearly one of the ways to the end in view, and the one which appeals most directly to Indian sentiment, it should, I think, find a place in the Preamble.

2. Do you think that the realisation of responsible government in the Provinces involves the establishment in Provincial Legislatures of a substantial elected majority (Clause 6)?—I agree that an elected majority in the Provincial Legislatures, subject to the necessary safeguards against hasty or factious action, is a practical step towards responsible government, and will have a useful educative value as well as a beneficial influence on the administration. The strength of the majority should depend on the electoral conditions and stage of political advancement of each Province and the facilities given for communal representation. Where there are classes and interests which cannot at present be adequately provided for by communal representation, Government should have a wide discretion to nominate representatives for them. Hence in a Province politically backward, such as the Punjab, I personally would prefer to allow one-third of the members to be nominated, till such time as a more effective system of representation is established.

3. Do you think that the non-official members of the Provincial Legislatures should possess power to control the actions and policy of the Executive? Do you think they possess such power at present?—At present non-official members of the Provincial Legislatures, in theory at least, have not power to control the actions and policy of the Executive, nor is it, for the reasons given in answer to Q. 1, desirable that they should have such control till they are in a position to show that they represent and hold a mandate from an electorate wide, competent, and adequate to voice the opinions of the masses. How far these conditions are from being realised in the Punjab will appear from the reply to Question 4. The Government cannot absolve itself of its responsibility (through Parliament) to those masses until they are in a position to speak for themselves through their representatives—and the basis of such representation has yet to be laid—for, in the words of the announcement, the British Government and the Government of India, on whom rests the responsibility for the welfare and advancement of the Indian people, must be the judges of the time and measure of each advance towards such control. The fact that this part of the announcement has been challenged by advanced Indian politicians who claim, but without justification, to represent the masses, is all the more reason for insisting on it. But even now in practice the non-official members, when it is fairly clear that they have a great mass of opinion behind them, have very wide influence over the Executive. To take a single instance. Two years ago the Punjab Government introduced a Bill empowering District Boards to levy a special cess on land for the extension of light railways. The measure was opposed unanimously by the rural members as imposing on land an extra burden from which the urban classes would mainly benefit, and though Government was not convinced of the soundness of this view, and could have passed the measure with the support of some of the urban members, it recognised that the opposition represented the general rural feeling, and dropped the measure. In the same way the Punjab Government has generally endeavoured to give effect to resolutions carried by the non-official vote, when these do not conflict with established principles of policy.

4. Do you think that there are certain matters or functions of government in the Provinces in which at

at present the Provincial Executive must remain responsible to the Secretary of State and Parliament, and must therefore be in a position to enforce its wishes?—Please see answers to (1) and (3). The Provincial Executive, while deferring more and more to the popular view, as this finds increasing expression through the wider electorates, and the larger bodies of representatives now to be established, should, in view of the narrowness and ignorance of the electorates, the inexperience of the representatives, and the absence at present of the broad foundations of responsible government, retain its power to enforce in the last resort its wishes and policy in all matters concerning the peace, tranquillity, and good government of the area it administers. This is essential for the discharge of its responsibility not only to Parliament, but also to the people of India. We have within the last ten years made a substantial advance along the road of political reform, and the pace in future must depend on the political leaders working in association with the Government, and giving proof on the one hand of loyal co-operation and a sense of responsibility, and on the other that they are the genuine representatives of the popular will. If we attempt to proceed faster than this we shall endanger the ordered progress—in the widest sense of the word—of the community as a whole, run the risk of transferring power prematurely to an inexperienced Intelligentsia with little moral, material or physical force at its back, and of creating a new sense of injustice among the masses, who at present do not desire any violent changes, and will resent being made the subject of a hasty political experiment. In the Punjab it is proposed to give the political franchise to only one in 84 of the total, and to one in 110 of the rural population—nine-tenths of the whole—and even under this limited franchise at least 80 per cent. of the rural electorate will be illiterate. Moreover, for many years to come the electorates will doubtless be communal, and those they elect will primarily represent sectarian interests—Hindu, Mahommadan, and Sikh—or, if those divisions are temporarily eliminated, the line of cleavage between rural and urban interests will take its place. In such circumstances the Executive Government, as the only impartial authority capable of holding the balance evenly between conflicting interests—"where all are for a party and none is for the State"—must clearly remain in a position to enforce its wishes in the interests of the community in all matters of moment.

5. If you accept the propositions stated under questions 1 to 4 do you think that the dual form of government embodied in the Bill is the best means of securing them? If not, what are your objections to that feature of the Bill, and by what other means would you attempt to secure the objects in view?—I do not consider that the dual form of government is the best means of working up to responsible government. That is also the conclusion arrived at independently by nearly all local Governments, widely as they differ in constitution and local conditions; and the practical unanimity of the opinion among those who have working experience of Provincial administrations is a very strong argument against the proposal. My own views are set forth in Paragraph 9 and Paragraphs 20-23 of the Provincial Government Letter of 5th November, 1918. Briefly my objections to the dual system are:—An Indian Province needs a united Government; and this gives it a divided Government. An Indian Province needs a strong Government; and this gives it a weak one. An Indian Province needs a Government capable of prompt action; and this leads to delay and friction. An Indian Province needs a simple system of Government; and this involves extreme complexity. An Indian Province needs a cheap system of Government; and this involves a very costly one, with elaborate methods of taxation and finance which will certainly not make for economy. An Indian Province needs a Government which commands the confidence and ready support of the services; and this tends to divide and disintegrate the services by making them serve two masters. An Indian Province needs a Government which secures good administration to all; and this gives power to a small section and endangers the interests of the masses. The dual system proposed is not essential to the fulfilment of the announcement of 20th August, 1917. Its inclusion in the Reform Scheme appears to me to be the main cause of the many grave difficulties in relation to (a) the superior Executive, (b) the Legislative machinery, (c) finance, (d) the public services. Those difficulties necessitate the many special safeguards and provisoes put forward by the Government of India, which now make the Reform Scheme so hard to comprehend and so complicated to work. If it is embodied in the Statute the time of Government and its officers, from the highest to the lowest, will be taken up, not so much with work for the good of the people, as with endeavouring to puzzle out the correct procedure to be followed. In other words, the material will be sacrificed to the machinery. "The hungry sheep look up and are not fed." The Scheme expects too much at the start from (a) the Governor (see the remarks of the Bombay, Madras, and Bengal Governors and the terms of the draft Instrument of Instructions), (b) the Executive Council and Ministers, (c) the Legislative Council, (d) the electorate, and even its eminent authors contemplate a period of serious friction at the outset. As the dual system is expanded by increasing transfer of subjects to popular control, it may well lead to increasing administrative disorder, for the tendency of Ministers will be to play more and more to what they regard as the popular gallery, to pose as the champions of the popular cause in resisting or attacking a hostile bureaucracy, to strengthen their own position by forming party cliques, and establishing separate services who will serve their party. Meantime the existing services, under two masters, will become disorganised or endeavour to safeguard themselves by entering the political arena, and the masses, for whose benefit all these changes are intended, will become perplexed and confused by the difficulty of finding the responsible authority to which they have hitherto looked and the disappearance of the old landmarks in the turmoil of politics based on personal and sectarian rather than on public interests. At the same time the position of the local Government will be steadily weakened by the recurring attacks on the Minister for the time being and his policy by his rivals, for the Minister is a part of the Government, and recent experience has shown only too clearly the danger of allowing government in India to be vilified and misrepresented under the guise of constitutional agitation or electioneering tactics. All these dangers and difficulties in the Scheme appear to spring from the excessive emphasis laid on responsibility, and particularly on the Ministers' responsibility—a constitutional theory which at present is absolutely foreign to Indian ideas, but which is being pressed in the Scheme even beyond British constitutional practice. Why lay so much stress on Ministerial responsibility at the top, when you have still to search for and even establish the very foundations of responsibility in the electorate, when, as between Provinces, it is not yet possible (Paragraph 61 of Government of India Despatch) to insist on the elementary principle of responsibility, viz., that each shall pay its own way and make an equitable contribution to the Central Government? In other words, why seek to put on the roof before you have laid the foundations? Our anxiety to give India up-to-date British institutions must not make us overlook the fact that the masses are still lagging centuries behind. The remarks of Mr. Hyndman on Russia at the National Socialist Conference on 17th August are applicable to India. He said: "More than 80 per cent. could neither read nor write, and they were in a state comparable to that of the European peoples in the 17th century. It was impossible to turn the 17th century into the 20th by fiats from Moscow or elsewhere." Experience may show—I trust it will not—that your millions of future electors will take as little interest in the political franchise as they now do in the Municipal and District Board franchise, except where sectional feeling or personal rivalry supplies a stimulus. If so the very foundation of responsibility will be as lacking as it now is, and is it wise at this stage to sacrifice so much to a theory—a shadow? What Indians with political aspirations really desire is a share—a practical share—in the Government—the whole Government—not the separation of Government into two, and a theoretical or rather illusory control over the transferred portion. I say illusory because, in spite of the emphasis laid in the Scheme on Ministerial responsibility in the abstract, it has in practice been found necessary to provide checks and safeguards (see the Government Despatch of March 5th and the Bill), which in practice will obscure the Ministers' responsibility quite as much as the alternative system proposed in the Majority Scheme. I would refer to Paragraphs 72-76, 101-105 of the Governor of India Despatch; also to the terms of the draft Instrument of Instructions, and to clauses 3 (3) and (4), 9 (1), 9 (b) of the Draft Bill. The latter gives the Governor power (very rightly) to override his Minister even in the administration of transferred subjects, and the Legislative Council in regard to the financial provision for those subjects. These necessary provisions go far to nullify Ministerial responsibility; and to retain the shadow, when the substance is gone, will only lead to disappointment and charges of broken faith. Moreover, the communal electorates and communal representation will play a great part—probably the dominant part—in the constitution of the new Council and the selection of Ministers, thus creating a new line of cleavage which cuts right across the theory accepted in the Joint Report of the Ministers' responsibility to the Council as a whole. As pointed out by the Bombay Government (Paragraph 13 of their letter of 11th November, 1918), it will be impossible for the Council or the electorate in a given case to ascertain whether he has acted on his own responsibility or in concert with another Minister, or as one of the entire Government, or against his will under the control of the Governor. In the dual Government and the responsible Minister administering the transferred subjects, the Scheme appears to me to aim at a system that is unattainable in practical politics and would be undesirable if it were attainable; a system that is novel and untried, that is particularly unsuited to India, the last place to be chosen for political experiments; for India more than any other part of the world has always regarded Government as one and indivisible, and has no ideas of constitutional or democratic government beyond those she has borrowed from the West. The typical Indian form of government is to be found to-day in the Native State with its personal and autocratic rule, and the few progressive States which have adopted constitutional forms only reproduce faint copies of British-Indian institutions, but they have nowhere evolved anything approaching dualism. For the above reasons the dual Government appears to me unsound in principle, unworkable in practice. It sacrifices the simplicity, efficiency, and unity of the administration, the integrity of the services, sound principles of finance, and all the practical advantages that are already being, and under the Majority Scheme will be increasingly derived from the association and co-operation of officials and non-officials, to a constitutional theory. However popular it may now be in certain political circles, who are influenced by the authority of its authors, and perhaps regard it as an integral part of the Reforms, which might be wrecked by its elimination, it will, when brought into practice, either create serious disappointment—owing to the necessary safeguards—or lead to premature transfer of other branches of the administration to inexperienced hands in order to allay discontent. Its complete realisation on the lines foreshadowed in Paragraph 260 of the Joint Report—involving the disappearance of the Grand Committee and the elimination of the official element from the Superior Executive—appears to be inconsistent with the two fundamental principles referred to in Answer (1), viz., the maintenance of India as an integral part of the British Empire and the administration of the Government for the benefit of all our fellow-subjects in India. It was in view of those objections that certain heads of Local Government in January last rather hastily drew up and put forward what is known as the "Majority Report." Up to then they had only been asked for opinions on the Joint Report, but some of us had already ventured on constructive proposals on those lines, and when asked for an alternative to the dualism we endeavoured to frame a scheme which, while giving effect to the announcement of 20th August, 1917, would be free from the evils and complications of dualism, in conformity with Indian traditions, and a liberal expansion of the present system. For, to use the words of the Secretary of State on the second reading of the Bill, "we are not writing on a clean slate; we are writing in continuation of chapters written before; we are building on existing foundations." Those words, I think, describe the scheme of the "Majority Report." I adhere to the main features of that report. It accepts all the main features of the Joint Report except the dual executive and the arrangements subsidiary to it. But in view of the events of the present year in the Imperial Council, and the disturbances in certain Provinces. I would now suggest that half of the members of the Executive Council or Cabinet should be officials and half non-officials, or at the most that if the Cabinet is to be composed of three members (besides the Governor) one should be an official, one an elected Member of the Legislative Council, and one an Indian non-official, who might in time, if the system works smoothly, be also selected from the elected members. The Governor would, of course, have a vote as a member, and also a casting vote. The Governor in Council would exercise ultimate control; there would be no Ministers and no transferred subjects, but there would be a strong Indian element in the whole Government, which would receive continuous training in the entire work of administration and be in a position to impress the Indian view on the official element. This association would thus be to the advantage of all parties, and would be readily understood and appreciated by a great mass of Indian opinion. Indeed there is reason to believe that if these proposals had been first in the field they would have found favour even with advanced Indian politicians.

6. If you have any other method to suggest, does it (i) provide possibilities of advance by stages and facilities the "progressive realisation of responsible government," and, if it does, in what way (Clauses 2, 3, etc.)? and (ii) does it afford means of judgment (a) to the electors and (b) to the Statutory Commission which is to examine and report on progress, of the success or failure in results of the control exercised by the Legislature and those who represent it in the Executive?—The Majority Scheme as above summarised provides possibilities of advance by stages, at least till the appointment of the first Statutory Commission. Both the electors and the Statutory Commission will be able to judge of the actions of the Legislature, which will be as fully and clearly evident from the proceedings in Council as under the dual Scheme. The actions and policy of the Indian members of the Executive will also be apparent not only from their declarations and votes in the Legislature and the proceedings of the Executive Council; they will be judged rather on their general record than on particular measures (in regard to which, as shown in Answer 5, it would often be impossible to fix their responsibility under the dual Scheme) and will thus, while learning the practical work of administration, be saved from one of the most serious temptations of immature democracy. In practice, therefore, there will be little difference between the two Schemes as regards the fixation of responsibility, and such difference will be justified by the considerations above stated.

7. If you consider a dual form of government acceptable in principle, are there any points of detail the modification of which you regard as necessary? If so, what are those points, and what modifications would you suggest?—As (for the reasons given in Answer 5) I consider the dual form of government unsuitable, it is, perhaps, unnecessary to criticise the details.

8. In particular, do you think (i) that Ministers should hold office "during pleasure"?—i.e., should be liable to removal if they are unable to support the action decided upon in their department by the Governor or if they fail to retain the confidence of the Legislature (Clause 3 (1))? (ii) that the Governor should should have power to disregard the opinion of his Ministers if he considers that action in accordance with that opinion is inconsistent with the due discharge of his responsibilities (Clause 3 (3))? (iii) that the Executive Council should in all Provinces normally consist of one official European and one non-official Indian (Clause 4)? (iv) that the Governor should have power to dissolve his Legislative Council (Clause 7 (4))?—For the Minister holding office during pleasure, the Majority Report suggests an Indian Member of Council appointed by, and holding office during the pleasure of, the Crown. It would be for the Governor to decide whether he should be removed by the Crown if he fails to retain the confidence of the Governor, or (in case of selection from the elected Members) of the Legislative Council. I notice that even the dual Scheme, as amplified in the Government of India Despatch (Paras. 103-107), gives the Governor power to compel the resignation of a Minister if he fails to retain his confidence or that of the Legislature, but leaves the Governor discretion to retain a Minister against whom a vote of "no confidence" has been carried for action which the Governor has approved. Thus as regards responsibility to the Council the difference between the position of a Minister under the dual Scheme and of an Indian Member of Council selected from the elected Members is not in practice very great. For the reasons given in Answers 1, 4 and 5, the Governor should have power to disregard the opinion of his Ministers in the circumstances stated. This is a further argument against the application of Ministerial responsibility and in favour of the alternative proposal in the Majority Report. Please see Answers 5 and 6. The Governor should have power to dissolve his Legislative Council.

9. Referring back to questions 2, 3 and 4, if your answers to the first and third of these are in the affirmative, and if you think that the Legislatures should be given greater powers of control and influence than they possess at present, do you regard the limitations imposed generally by Clause 9 of the Bill upon their financial and Legislative powers as (i) suitable, or as (ii) unnecessarily severe, or as (iii) inadequate to safeguard the responsibilities which the Government owes in the last resort to Parliament (Clause 9)?—I agree that the Legislatures should be given greater powers of control and influence over Executive matters, legislation and finance, as they become more fully and truly representative of the masses than they are at present. This point has been dwelt on in the foregoing replies. Meantime, I think the limitations proposed in Clause 9 of the Bill are generally suitable, but in Sub-clauses (2), (b), and (2), (d) I would give the powers proposed to the Governor in Council rather than to the Governor in person, thus securing that the voice of the Indian element in the Council shall have a hearing. In practice, and until the sense of responsibility develops, these powers may have to be frequently exercised, and they should not be regarded as arbitrary or exceptional. Hence, it seems advisable to save the Governor as much as possible from individual action, and throw the responsibility on the Executive Government as a whole. I may explain that in the Punjab the rural classes contribute at least 90 per cent. of the revenue, and have, therefore, the main interest in the expenditure. But they are not at present in a position to control it, and often complain, sometimes with reason, that their interests are sacrificed to those of the urban classes, who control the Press and the platform, e.g., in matters of education, medical relief, sanitary and other public works. They, therefore, must for a long time to come look to Government to protect their interests in these as in other matters.

10. In particular (i) do you think that the Legislature should have power with whatever limitations to vote supplies (Clause 9 (2))? (ii) Do you accept the plan of Grand Committees as the means of giving to the Government the power to secure essential legislation in the event of their failure to carry their propositions in the Council? If so, have you any modifications of detail to suggest? If not, what other method would you suggest to secure the object in view?—(i) Subject to the free revising power of the Governor in Council (see answer 9), I would allow the Legislature to vote supplies, but would point out that the exercise of the revisionary power is less likely to cause friction and agitation under a unitary than under a dual Government. (ii) I accept the plan of the Grand Committee for securing essential legislation by constitutional forms. But in view of recent experience in the Imperial Council, showing how difficult it is for even nominated non-officials to withstand the pressure of unscrupulous agitation, I consider the margin of safety in the Grand Committee should be larger than that proposed in the Joint Report, and be something on the lines suggested in para. 80 of the Government India Despatch of March 5th. I would also not limit the Governor's selections to the nominated Members, as that might exclude some of the elected Members best capable of supporting the Government's view.

11. Do you accept the position adopted in the Bill (Part II) that the time has not yet come to give the Legislative Assembly a similar measure of control over the Central Government as that given to Provincial Legislative Councils over Provincial Governments?—Yes.

12. Do you agree that it is advisable none the less to provide for a substantial elective majority in the Indian Legislature (Clause 16)?—Yes. But for the reasons outlined in answer 10 I would provide for a larger margin of safety in the Council of State

13. Do you accept the plan of a bicameral Legislature as arising out of this, as constituting both a satisfactory machine for the ordinary purposes of legislation and as affording the means to the Governor-General in Council to secure legislation which he regards as essential (Clauses 14, 15 and 16)?—Yes. But I have not been able to give the matter much consideration.

14. Do you accept the provisions of the Bill as to the course of legislation in the Indian Legislature (Clause 20 (3) and 4))? Or do you read them as unnecessarily restrictive on the popular will, or as an inadequate means of ensuring to the Governor-General in Council the discharge of his responsibilities?—Yes, as in No. 13. Perhaps the ordinary course of business in the two Chambers and the procedure in case of differences of opinion between them might be more fully indicated. The "popular will" as understood in Western countries will not be in a position to make itself felt in the Indian Legislatures for many years to come.

15. Do you accept the changes made by the Bill (Clause 21) in the constitution of the Governor-General's Executive Council? If not, what are your reasons, and what modifications would you suggest?—I would prefer, if that is feasible, to see the maximum number fixed by Statute as in the present Act, and as is the case of the Provincial Councils. As the number is not likely to fall short of the present number, I would retain "three, at least," Members qualified by service under the Crown, one qualified barrister or advocate, and provide for "two" Indians. There may be theoretical objections to this proposal, but a matter of such importance might well be dealt with in the Statute, and the statutory grant of two seats to Indians is likely to have a good effect.

16. Do you think that the development of Provincial autonomy on the one hand, and of self-government in the Provinces on the other, involves any modification of the provisions of sections 2, 33 and 45 of the Government of India Act (Clause 23)?—I agree that as Provincial autonomy develops, and progress towards self-government in the Provinces extends, the control, direction and superintendence of the Secretary of State and of the Governor-General in Council should be lessened. Even in existing conditions the superior control is often excessive, and seriously delays or hampers local governments in their schemes for the benefit of their Provinces. Provided that the relaxation of control is carried out as proposed in Clause 23 by the Secretary of State in Council (the Council being a statutory one with a body of expert Indian opinion, as at present) there need be no fear that the action will be too sweeping or precipitate. It is most important that in the transition stage, i.e., till representative institutions tutions have been established on a broad and sure foundation, the responsibility of the British Crown and Parliament should be maintained and enforced. As has been aptly said, "Past neglect of their responsibilities (for the good government of India) by the British elector and British Parliament cannot be remedied by a sudden zeal to abdicate them." The average Indian has unshaken faith in the British Crown and Parliament, and a well-grounded confidence in the honesty and impartiality of their agents in India, and however the new and imported plant of self-government may thrive in an Indian atmosphere, he will, for many years to come, continue to look to one and the other as the authorities responsible for his security, welfare and advancement. He is concerned rather with the results of the administration than with its constitution forms, and is slow to accept new ideas.

17. Do you agree that the gradual realisation of responsible government involves periodical examination of progress, by independent authority, and that the provisions of Clause 28 of the Bill are well designed to afford such examination?—I do not think that the gradual realisation of responsible government necessarily involves periodical examination by an outside and independent authority. But in view of the ultimate responsibility of Parliament and of the publicity given to the proposal in Clause 28 of the Bill, I think the procedure suitable. Perhaps the injunction that the examination should be made "at the expiration of ten years" is too definite and restrictive. Parliament might not be in session then, or might be pre-occupied with even graver matters, or conditions in India (war or famine) might be unfavourable. The Commission should have power to report not only whether "it is desirable to extend or modify the degree of responsible government" in any Province, but also whether it is desirable to "restrict" it, where there has been serious maladministration. This seems to follow from Paragraph 261 of the Joint Report, and also from the general responsibility of Parliament.

18. Are there any matters which it is proposed in the Bill to deal with by rule which you would suggest should be provided for in the Bill?—The following matters appear more suitable for provision in the Statute than by Rules:—(a) Cl. 3 (4)—The temporary administration of transferred subjects in cases of emergency. Obviously when the Government acting with a Minister ceases to act, the only other form of "Local Government" is "the Governor in Council" (S. 134 (4) of the principal Act), and it is this authority and not the Governor alone that should administer in such cases. (b) Cl. 5 (2) seems to give undue powers to the Governor and the rules and orders in question might be made by the Governor in Council, with the approval of the Government of India. That would be safeguard against hasty action or unnecessary local variations between Provinces. (c) Cl. 6 (3) (a)—The ordinary term of office of Governors' Legislative Councils might be fixed by Statute, as in the case of the Indian Legislature (Ch. 17). (d) Cl. 9 (3)—The Governor's power of nomination to the Grand Committee should not be limited to nominated Members of the Council. (e) Cl. 21—The maximum number of Members of the Governor-General's Executive Council might be fixed by Statute. (f) Cl. 23-26—The wide rule-making power to be given to the Secretary of State in Council will meet with opposition unless exercised in consultation with a Statutory Council representative of Indian opinion, official and non-official.

19. Have you any observations to offer on the Reports of Lord Southborough's Committees and of the Committee on the Home Administration of Indian Affairs?—The only remarks I have to make on the Franchise Report are that I would retain the University seats, would grant the franchise to the military classes as proposed, and would not give the women a vote, because, omitting other reasons, the proportion of literacy among women is only one-tenth of that among males. Also, judging by the enormous difficulties attending the polling of large bodies of electors in the Punjab, it seems prima facie impossible to provide a reliable and efficient machinery for polling the millions of votes in certain Provinces, if any large proportion of the voters came to the poll. In the cities of Lahore and Amritsar, with some 12,000 to 20,000 municipal voters, the whole machinery of the district administration has to be turned on to the polling booths for a whole week, to the neglect of all other work. Even so, the results are not very satisfactory, and, though the polling officers are all of gazetted rank, there is usually a big aftermath of petitions alleging bribery, coercion, intimidation, personation, etc., etc., the decision of which is a heavy tax on the officers of the Government, the only reliable agency available. With ignorant rural electors, who will have to come in to the district or taksil headquarters if they wish to vote, the practical difficulties will be enormously increased, and the facilities for fraud, bribery, personation, etc., will be immense. That was my main reason for proposing a fairly high franchise in the Punjab, and even then I estimate that 80 per cent. of the rural voters will be illiterate, and if they come to the poll at all in large numbers (the experience of existing elections to local bodies indicates that they will not) they will be at the mercy of the tout, the electioneering agent, or the registering officer, and, as in the present municipal elections where bribery is often rampant, will be swayed by private and personal rather than by public motives. To repeat the words of Mill, "Representative institutions are of little value, and may be a mere instrument of tyranny or intrigue, when the generality of voters are not sufficiently interested in their own government to give their vote; or, if they vote at all, do not bestow their suffrage on public grounds, but sell them for money, or vote at the beck of someone who has control over them, or whom for private reasons they desire to propitiate. Popular election thus practised, instead of a security against mis-government, is but an additional wheel in its machinery." While the Indian electorates are mainly made up of men poor, illiterate and ignorant and uninterested in public affairs, they will probably vote, if they vote at all, under the influence of one or other of the above considerations, and that is why I have urged with such insistence that the foundations of responsible government have yet to be laid, and that elaborate work on the superstructure may be labour lost. Education, in the broad sense of the word, is, of course, the remedy, and for some years there has been a burst of educational enthusiasm, but the results of this will not appear for another generation. Meantime it would be unwise to expect too much from the new electorates, or to legislate too far in advance of their ideas. In regard to the Subjects Report, all I wish to say here is that if the dual system is accepted I agree with the Governor of India's view that secondary and higher education and industries should not be among the transferred subjects at the start. The Subjects Report reveals the enormous difficulties of working the dual Government, and I would be prepared to dwell more fully on those when I appear before the Committee. I have no detailed remarks to make on the Report of the Committee on the Home Administration of Indian Affairs, as I have seen only a newspaper summary. I think, however, it will be in conformity with the general principles of the Reform Scheme to maintain the statutory powers of the India Council, and at the same time widen its constitution.

7433. Is there anything you would like to say in supplement to that Memorandum?—Yes. In the Memorandum I reply to the questions in rather a scrappy way, and I would like to explain, on behalf of myself and the other heads of local governments who signed what is known as the majority report, our general position: That is that we accept all the main features of the Montagu-Chelmsford Report and of the Bill to give effect to it, except the one feature of dualism. At the end of my Memorandum I said I would be prepared to explain to the Committee in some detail some of our objections to that feature of the Bill. If your Lordship will allow me, I would like to do that by means of a practical illustration.

7434. If you please?—The illustration which has occurred to me is this. The field of administration in India might be compared to a great arid plain which for its full agricultural development requires a constant and secure supply of irrigation. At present it is irrigated, but only partially by two streams, and those two streams are combined into a common channel. One of those streams has an Eastern source. At first it was the sole source of irrigation, but in the course of centuries, owing to constant struggles for its possession, this channel became obstructed, its volume diminished, and its supply for irrigation purposes became fitful and inadequate. At this stage the second stream came into operation. That stream comes from a Western source. It has a strong and constant channel, and it has already achieved great results, both in extending the area of irrigation and also in increasing the yield from that area. Indeed, were it not for the action of this Western stream, the whole area would by this time have relapsed into barren waste. Another point; with the aid of power generated from the Western stream, the Eastern channel is being steadily freed from the obstruction which impeded its working and is now in a position to supply a larger and more constant supply of water for irrigation. Each stream separately, I may say, is inadequate for the efficient irrigation of the whole tract, but each stream, owing to its separate source and separate course, has certain fertilising qualities which the other lacks, so that the best results, both as regards the area to be irrigated and the yield from that area, are obtained by combining the waters of both streams into a common channel. Now given these two sources of irrigation, what course should a wise chief engineer adopt? Will he follow past practice and work both as a common channel, as a joint channel with a single agency, thereby securing unity, economy and efficiency of working; thereby securing also a greater area of irrigation (for every hydraulic engineer will tell you that losses from absorption and evaporation in a single channel are much less than the losses in two channels; thereby securing also a greater yield from the total area irrigated (because, as already explained, the combined waters of the two streams are much more fertilising than either separately); thereby also securing prompt and timely action in seasons of emergency, in times of drought and low supply (when it is most important not only that the distribution between the many claimants should be economical, but should also be so impartial as to command the confidence of all); thereby, in fact, meeting the wishes of the vast majority of the irrigators who desire to retain the greater security of the joint system, the absence of friction and delay, and the other advantages that arise from joint management? Is your chief engineer to work on those lines, or is he, for the sake of an experiment, in order to see what results the Eastern stream if worked as a separate canal by a separate agency will produce, to set himself to work to convert both streams into separate canals, with a separate staff, separate areas, arbitrarily delimited, and separate rates and finance; thereby restricting the total area irrigated, reducing the yield from that area, and at the same time increasing the working expenses? Thereby also causing delay, uncertainty, and confusion among the irrigators, for the areas on the two streams will often overlap, and arousing discontent among them as they find their areas reduced and their yield diminished, while they are being saddled with increasing working expenses; thereby also incurring serious risk of friction and collision between the two separate and possibly rival agencies, and depriving himself of the power of prompt and unified action in a time of crisis? Thereby, in fact, sacrificing all the interests, or at least imperilling all the interests which it is his duty to protect and promote, and all this for the sake of an experiment, the results of which can be foreseen or can be arrived at in other ways.

I hope I have made my meaning clear. The chief engineer is the British Parliament, acting at present through this Committee, and responsible for the welfare and advancement of the whole tract. The Eastern and Western streams are the Indian and the British influences and elements in the administration; the joint canal is the unitary government into which these two streams of influence have hitherto been combined, and must in our opinion remain combined if the Western stream is to function as an integral part of the system. The two separate canals are the two sections of the dual government, with their reserved and transferred subjects, their separate policies, separate rates and finance, separate establishments, and the other possible sources of rivalry, friction and expense. And now I come to the irrigators. The irrigators are the great masses of the people of India, who admittedly know little, and care little, about political schemes, which are not easy for them to understand in their present state of political development, but who are entitled to receive, and expect to receive the essentials of good government, and, being naturally conservative, would prefer to receive those essentials of good government by the development of the system to which they have been hitherto accustomed. That system, in our opinion, with the extension of Indian ideas and influence in the whole administration which is now being effected and working in close association with British capacity and British experience over the whole field of government while maintaining the security of the irrigators, that is of the masses, will give them the benefits of a progressive Government, and also give them the opportunity of ultimately realising responsible self-government within the Empire, if they prove their capacity to do so.

And, lastly, I come to the separate agency on the Eastern canal. That separate agency represents those political classes who desire to bring the whole administration under their sole and separate control, at first partly perhaps, but eventually in its entirety. In so far as their object is to prove their own capacity and to obtain wider scope for Indian ideas and Indian personnel, that object is quite legitimate, and even laudable. But that object we hold can be adequately secured by giving them, as proposed in the majority scheme, a larger share in the working of the joint British Indian administration as a whole, a share which will be increased as promised in the announcement of the 20th August, 1917, in proportion as they give proof of capacity, experience, and a sense of responsibility. Our view is that, working in association, as laid down in that announcement, those classes will have much to learn and also a good deal to teach. But in so far their object is to exclude British experience and capacity from the administration which those qualities have built up, that object appears to us inconsistent with the welfare of the community, and the British Government, which is admittedly responsible for the general welfare, should not allow the general interest to be subordinated to that of any one class or any one interest, whether Eastern or Western.

If I may, I will add a few more words as to how we think the two systems, the unitary government and the dual government, would work in practice. The business of government, according to the Government of India, in Paragraph 105 of their Review of the Franchise Report, must be inspired by a common purpose. That common purpose cannot, in our opinion, be obtained under a dual form of government. No doubt the elements of dualism, the Western and the Eastern streams, are latent, and must remain latent in every system of Indian administration. But it should be our aim, like that of the wise chief engineer, to harmonise and unite those two elements by close association for a common purpose, and not to emphasise them, as we think the dual system does, by an artificial and ever-increasing separation. The best way to secure this unity is to recognise that the British and Indian elements are working for a common object; that they have, in fact, a common mandate and a common responsibility, the good government of India as a whole, and we think that the association and partnership of British and Indians for this common object will, in the vast majority of cases, secure unity of views and unity of effort. That is at least the mature conclusion of seven out of the nine local Governments who were concerned, and it is based, not on any abstract reasoning, but on long and practical experience of working in association with Indians in the Legislative Council and elsewhere.

7435. Will you remind the Committee which those seven Governments were?—All the Governments except Bengal and Bihar and Orissa. The authors of the Montagu-Chelmsford Report say that they rely on experience experience and good feeling in overcoming the difficulties of the dualism in their scheme, and we, I think, are entitled to rely with equal, if not greater confidence, on those same qualities in overcoming the lesser difficulties of our scheme. The difficulties in their scheme are, I believe, infinitely greater than those in ours. The Government of India, in endeavouring to forecast the working of the dual system, in paragraph 107 of their Despatch used these words, "There must be established a convention by which each half of the Government refrains from opposition to the other half," and they add, "But more than that it seems to us quite impossible to expect; neither half can be required to give active support to a policy which it has not endorsed." The result of that appears to us is that you set up in each Province two Governments. Their attitude to one another may be either that of benevolent neutrality, correct neutrality, or armed neutrality. We think the risk of the last is one that should not be taken. We consider that if you cannot at this stage offer to India something better than that form of government it would be a confession of the bankruptcy of our statesmanship. We think that we can offer something more than that, something which, while retaining the main features of the Montagu-Chelmsford scheme, that is to say the wide electorates, the electorate majority, the control of legislation, the control of finance, subject to certain revising powers and certain checks—while retaining all these features our scheme modifies it in one important respect only by eliminating the dangers of dualism and giving at the top of the edifice a joint executive, half British and half Indian, to start with.

7436. You mean two British and two Indians?—Yes, two British and two Indians to start with.

7437. And a Governor?—Yes, we think that that scheme will meet the terms of the announcement of the 20th August, 1917, even more fully than the Bill which fails to give effect to the first principle of the announcement, viz., the increasing association of Indians in every branch of the Administration; and it will be readily understood and appreciated by the great masses of the people in India, all those at least who are capable of forming an intelligent opinion on the subject. It may be objected that our scheme will excite the disapproval and disappointment of the admittedly small but very vocal section of advanced politicians. But many of those advanced politicians have already expressed their strong dissatisfaction with the scheme embodied in the Bill, and I think it is obvious that no scheme will satisfy men whose claims are often conflicting, often unreasonable, and in some cases inconsistent with the maintenance of India as an integral part of the Empire. In fact our view is that the basis of our policy should be to secure, in the words of the announcement, the welfare and the advancement not of any one class, however influential or however vocal, but of the Indian peoples as a whole. That is the responsibility which was undertaken by the Crown when it took over the Government of India in 1858, and that responsibility has been solemnly re-affirmed in the announcement of the 20th August, 1917. Our contention is—I speak for other signatories of the majority report as well as for myself—our contention is that that responsibility can best be discharged by the form of unitary government which we have proposed in modification of dualism in the scheme. That is all I have to say, and I hope I have not trespassed on the indulgence of the Committee too long.

7438. Not at all. There are two points of your scheme that I want you to make clear. How are the two Indian members of the Executive Council to be selected? Are they or are they not to be selected, because they are supposed to enjoy the confidence of a majority of the Legislative Council?—Our view was that you should as far as possible select your two members, in some Provinces both the Indian members, and in others perhaps one, from the Legislative Council, and they should be men representing a large and influential body of opinion in that Council. As the Councils will be constituted it will be very difficult to say that you have a majority of any one view on the Council, because the Councils are based on communal representation and on lines of cleavage other than purely political. But the idea is that the Legislative Council, through the members selected from it, should be in a position to influence the decisions of the Executive Government.

7439. Was the idea to give those Indian members of the Executive Council charge of certain departments of Government?—Yes. The idea was that the Governor should distribute the portfolios, not in reserved and transferred subjects, but, subject to the joint responsibility of the whole Government, should distribute the portfolios among all the members of his Government. There would be no objection, for instance, to the Indian member being put in charge of Law and Justice, or Land Revenue, or even the Police, the object being to enable them by association to gain experience of the actual system of working the Government. Let them range over the whole field of Government. Admittedly at present, however capable they are, they must be lacking in administrative experience, and it is hoped that by distributing the portfolios among all the members they will be able to get greater experience of the actual working.

7440. The Governor on each occasion would simply, according to his own judgment, distribute the portfolios among the four gentlemen who form his Council?—Yes.

Mr. Bennett.

7441. I have read your memorandum, and I notice that you refer to the necessity for the creation of a sane and intelligent electorate, largely to be arrived at by education, and I think you point to a growth in the public interest in education in the Punjab?—Yes.

7442. I think a recent director of Public Instruction rather emphasised that—it has been rather remarkable?—Yes.

7443. The increased interest?—Yes; in all classes.

7444. That is one of the hopeful signs which helps us to anticipate the creation of that electorate?—Yes. It will take a generation for the results to appear.

7445. Is it not difficult to measure the pace of political changes?—Yes, it is.

7446. Would you not hope, within a reasonable time, to find an electorate in India not less competent to bear the responsibilities of their vote than the agricultural labourer in England was before 1884, having regard to the proposed dimensions of the electorate?—I look at it in this way at present: Taking the males over twenty in the Punjab, one in ten is literate. "Literate" means being just able to write his name. One in 100 is literate in English. I do not think in a generation you will arrive at a position in which you will be able to say that more than one, perhaps in six, is literate, and perhaps more than one in sixty literate in English, considering the enormous field to be covered.

7447. That is your estimate?—Yes.

7448. You speak of the complicated procedure which will exist under the changes proposed. Take the complicated procedure in our Courts, for instance. Indian law makers are not responsible for that, are they?—I do not see to what passage you refer.

7449. I am referring to the bottom of the first page?—The efficient administration of the law.

7450. Yes. "People are looking for an impartial and reasonably efficient administration of the law." You refer to the complicated procedure there, do you not? That has not arisen from the Indian law-makers, has it, the complicated procedure in the Indian Courts?—I think our local procedure in India is very complicated and very elaborate, from this fact that we started with rather inefficient tribunals, and it was necessary to have a very elaborate system to check them with. That check is accomplished by very elaborate procedure, much more elaborate than you require in England, where you have strong public opinion to keep your Courts and Magistracy in order.

7451. You refer to Ministers. You say that administrative disorder follows the establishment of diarchy. Would not that be a reason for refusing to increase the transfer to popular control? For instance, we place three Departments under Ministers, and assuming that those are not properly administered, will not that be a reason, when the time of revision comes, for refusing to increase the number?—Yes, I think that is understood.

7452. Does not your reference ignore that safeguard, the safeguard of revision ten years hence, or whatever the period may be? Do not you disregard that safeguard?—No, but I am laying stress on the natural tendency and the hopes held out that more and more subjects subjects will be transferred. It will be very difficult to resist the claim that progress is to be achieved by the successive stages allowed in the announcement.

7453. But is it not held out conditionally?—Yes, but there is always a tendency to overlook the conditions.

7454. We have to deal with that when the time comes. Then you say if the dual system is expanded by increasing the transfer of subjects to popular control, it may well lead to increasing administrative disorder. As I have pointed out, we have provided safeguards against that. "And the tendency of Ministers will be to play more and more to what they regard as the popular gallery." Now we have undertaken this great enterprise in the hope that it will succeed. The success of the enterprise is, as you will admit, dependent upon a reasonable amount of mutual confidence between the two parties to it. Do you think the atmosphere in which that confidence will grow is to be created by suggestions that Ministers, whom we wish to co-operate with us, will play to the gallery? Do you think that is a helpful suggestion?—I think it is admitted by the Government of India, and also by the representative who appeared before this Committee, that at least the period of the first two Councils will be one of very serious friction; and I think we have not seen so far such evidence of a desire to co-operate with the Government as would justify us in basing a strong hope on future co-operation. The atmosphere, I think, has to be created.

7455. And now is the time to begin to create that atmosphere?—Yes. My suggestion was that that atmosphere was more likely to be created under a system of association rather than under a system of division.

7456. But do we help in its creation by assuming that men whom we propose to ask to co-operate with us will be playing to the gallery? There are galleries and galleries, are there not?—Yes. I suppose it is not unknown in any country.

7457. Then you refer to attacking a hostile bureaucracy. Is any advantage gained by assuming hostility between the bureaucracy and the popular side of the Government?—Well, I think the very words you used, "the mere fact of dividing the Government into what you call an official Government and a popular Government, is, in itself, provocative of friction. You look on them as more or less opposing camps.

7458. Quite so, but not necessarily hostile?—No, possible hostility. The attitude of the two Governments might be one of benevolent neutrality, which we hope it might be in time, or of correct neutrality, or of armed neutrality. I think we have to consider the possibility of all these forms according to the circumstances of the different Governments and the different Provinces. We must look the facts in the face.

7459. But the Report, at all events, contemplates the retention of a considerable number of the British element in the Indian bureaucracy, and is it not well to avoid suggestions of hostility when that is the case?—I think nothing is to be gained by not looking facts in the face. I think hostility is quite possible under the form of Government proposed, and I thought, therefore, it was wise to contemplate the results.

7460. You refer to a point made by the Bombay Government, who say it will be impossible for the Council or the electorate in a given case to ascertain whther he has acted on his own responsibility or in concert with another Minister. Have you read the suggestion—I think you must have seen the suggestion—made by the Government of India that that confusion will be avoided if in an order issued by the Government it is stated in transferred matters by the Governors——?—After consultation with his Ministers.

7461. Do you not think that will get over that difficulty?—I doubt it, because the official orders will only issue when the matter is decided. They will throw no light on how the matter was decided—whether the Governor overruled his Minister or not.

7462. Generally, that will establish a distinction between orders arrived at in consultation with the Minister and those arrived at in consultation with the Executive Council?—Yes, it will do that.

Mr. Bennett—continued.

7463. Generally it will, but there are cases in which it will not?—Yes, but in the case of the Minister it will not say whether those orders are passed at the suggestion of the Minister, or are orders which the Governor, in the discharge of his responsibilities, insisted upon the Minister passing. So, to that extent, it obscures the responsibility of the Minister.

7464. You say under the scheme of the five Governments advances could be made by stages?—Yes.

7465. Would it be by imposing additional duties and responsibilities on particular members as the advance was made—would that be the form?—That would be one form—placing more Departments in charge of your Indian members or Ministers.

7466. I am thinking, of course, of the majority scheme. Supposing that increased duties and responsibilities were placed upon particular members, would not you, in that way, be laying the foundation of a diarchy—you would be accepting the fundamental principle of a diarchy? You would have a number of Ministers with one grade of responsibility and others with a higher grade. There you get at once the beginnings, at all events, of the principle of the diarchy?—No, because once they are members of a collective Government they will be all jointly responsible; each Minister or each member will, as I believe is the case in the British Cabinet, be responsible for his own Department, subject to the collective responsibility of the Government as a whole. If he is dissatisfied with the general policy of the Government in his own Department or in any other Department he can resign. Such resignation takes place even at present. One has recently occurred in the Council of the Viceroy.

7467. You suggest the removal by the Governor of Indian members of the Council who fail to retain the confidence of the Legislative Council. Do you not there establish a fundamental difference between one set of the Governor's advisers and the other? The members of the Executive Council are irremovable—the official members are irremovable?—Constitutionally, I think not. Under the Government of India Bill they are appointed by the Crown and removable by the Crown. Any member of the Executive Council who did not see eye to eye with the Governor, and would not carry out the policy of the joint Government, would be removed, at the instance of the Governor, by the Crown.

7468. But in any case, the status of the two under your scheme is fundamentally different?—Yes, to some extent I admit that. It is because you have to bring two elements into your Government. That is the result of the Western and Eastern elements. The member selected from the Council is expected to work with the Council as far as possible.

7469. So that under this presumably unified Government there are distinctions?—Yes, but both will have a common responsibility—the good government of the people as a whole.

7470. There are fundamental distinctions?—Yes.

7471. Now, towards the end you quote Mill, I think. You quote a passage from Mill to this effect, "representative institutions are of little value, and may be a mere instrument of tyranny or intrigue, when the generality of voters are not sufficiently interested in their own Government to give their vote," and other dangers of democratic government are pointed out. I need not read the whole?—Yes.

7472. That quotation, I take it, you use as an argument against the extension of democratic institutions in India?—No, I only point out the difficulties which lie in the way of establishing representative institutions in India. No one would be more pleased than I if you had the machinery for democratic government, but we have to face the practical difficulties pointed out by the Secretary of State and Lord Chelmsford, and also by the Government of India, in the way of establishing democratic institutions.

7473. Those difficulties apply to political problems in England, or in Europe, at least as much as they do in India. They have no special application to India?—I think they have, because Indian conditions are totally different. Perhaps I may be allowed to quote a few passages. In the Montagu-Chelmsford Report, in Paragraph 228, speaking of responsible government, it says: "We find it in its earliest beginnings resting on an effective sense of the common interests, a bond compounded of community of race, religion, and language."

language." We have that community in England; we have it in our self-governing colonies, but we have not that sense of common interest in India, because we have not the community of race, religion and language. We have not community in any of those respects. Another quotation in continuation of the above is this: "The history of self-government among the nations who developed it, and spread it through the world, is decisively against the admission by the State of any divided allegiance; against the State's arranging its members in any way which encourages them to think of themselves primarily as citizens of any smaller unit than itself." And, further on, they say, "Any general extension of the communal system, however, would only encourage still further demands, and would, in our deliberate opinion, be fatal to that development of representation upon a national basis, in which alone a system of responsible government can possibly be rooted." It is owing to the existence of these conditions that I point out the difficulties which lie in the way of establishing a democratic system of representative government in India. After considering this very question of communal representation, the Government of India, in expressing their views on the Franchise Report, admit that India is not prepared to take the first step forward to responsible government on any other road than that of communal responsibility, having already pointed out that communal responsibility is incompatible with representative government. They go on to say: "The road does not lead directly to the goal, and we can only echo the hope of the Franchise Committee that it will be possible, at no very distant date, to unite all communities in one general electorate." That is the position. In many cases we have had communal elections in our local Boards and Municipalities for many years, but we see no signs of a disposition to discard it, and, therefore, I am afraid that the hope of the Committee that it will be possible to discard it as regards the political franchise is a very faint one.

7474. We may take it, then, that the quotation from Mill was meant to apply to conditions in Europe, and Europe has faced the risks?—In Europe you had the conditions on which you can build representative government, because though the electorate may have been very ignorant and limited, you have community of race, religion and language, you have a common bond, and that is why you had the conditions on which you could establish responsible government.

Mr. Acland.

7475. I think I gathered rightly that under your scheme you depend to a considerable extent on the Governor as to what extent Indian members of the Legislative Council were given real power of administration?—No. I contemplated that each member of his Government would be responsible for his Department, subject to the collective responsibility of the whole Government, in the same way whether he was a European or an Indian, or an official or a non-official, Because a non-official member would require more training he would have to go slower at the start.

7476. But it would be argued with regard to your scheme rather more strongly than with regard to the scheme we are primarily considering, that if there were any failure in administration in the Departments of the Government allotted to the Indian members of the Executive Council, it was the fault of the other members rather than the Indian members concerned. There would not be quite as definite clear-cut full responsibility on the Indian members of the Executive Council under your scheme as there is under the Ministers in the scheme of the Bill. Is not that so?—Yes, I admit that; but I also say the present conditions are incompatible with full responsibility. There is no source, no basis, on which you can found full responsibility.

7477. Do you not think it is a very great point if it can be obtained, particularly when you are regarding your scheme as leading up to further advances, that you should be able to say, without any question at all, that success or failure has been due to the good or the bad administration of particular Indian Ministers and administrators in order to be able to found an opinion as to whether further reform is justifiable? Would it not always under your scheme be alleged that the relative non-success of any particular Department was really due to the interference of official members with the discretion of the Indian member of the Executive Council?—Assuming that, I think the same thing would be alleged in the case of failure under the dual system. If a Minister's conduct of the administration of his sphere is not successful he will always be able to hide himself behind the fact that he was over-ruled by the Governor or that his financial proposals were not accepted.

7478. But the over-ruling by the Governor is a perfectly definite thing. The effect of a sort of joint responsibility of the different members of the Executive Council is a much more indefinite thing?—Yes, but the proceedings of the Executive Council are always put on record. Each member, if he finds his views are not accepted, can have his protest recorded. Those protests are on record, and by access to those you will be in a position to see whether failure was due (it may require a little more careful investigation) to him personally or to his being over-ruled by the collective Government.

7479. I cannot get you to go further than you have already said that you do agree with me that if you can get it, it is a good thing to be able, in reviewing the matter ten years hence, to say such and such persons under our system were given perfectly direct responsibility and they have carried out that responsibility in a certain manner, which allows us to judge?—Yes, if you could get it, it would.

7480. Your suggestion is that you cannot?—Yes. Under either system it can only be obtained by investigation. That is what the Statutory Commission is for.

Lord Islington.

7481. You say, on the first page of your note, that one in eight of the vacancies in District Councils only is contested?—Yes.

7482. Would you say from your experience in India that, in spite of that, the uncontested seats have produced competent men to discharge the work of those District Councils?—Yes, in many cases. The absence of contest is due to the electors being either apathetic, or being fairly well satisfied with the sitting member.

7483. But the personnel of the Council, although it has been furnished by means other than contested elections, has been, on the whole, satisfactory?—Yes, not unsatisfactory.

7485. Would those come under the head of literates, all those elected to those districts?—A considerable portion.

7486. Or would a proportion be illiterate?—A proportion would be illiterate—perhaps one-third.

Chairman.

7487. In this connection, may I ask you how are the Chairmen of Local Boards in the Punjab appointed? Are they elected or official?—They are elected in nearly all cases, but, as a rule, an official President is elected. We have tried very hard to make local bodies select non-official Chairmen, both Municipalities and District Boards, and, in some cases, we have succeeded, but in the majority of cases we have failed. Take the instance of our two biggest Municipalities, Lahore and Amritsar, each with a population of about 200,000. Within the last two years the Government has been striving to get those two leading Municipalities to select their own non-official Chairman. We said to them it was most desirable that they should. They agreed. These two Municipalities have the communal system. The Hindoos were most anxious to have a Hindoo; the Mohammedans were most anxious to have a Mohammedan. Neither party could agree as to any particular individual, and, in the end, in Lahore almost universally, and in Amritsar, by a majority, they decided to appoint the Deputy Commissioner as President, and asked Government to allow them to retain an official President, because it was impossible for them, the two most advanced Municipalities in the Province, to agree on a non-official.

7488. You lay stress on the amount of illiteracy, and you lay stress on it in connection with the inadequacy of an electorate for a responsible Government. Would you say that it necessarily follows because a man is illiterate that he is also incapable of giving an intelligent vote?—No, that does not follow, but I think if a man is literate, he is more likely to be capable of giving an intelligent vote. He is more likely to be able to read the papers, and form some opinion on current political topics.

7489. We have had a good deal of evidence on this from witnesses who have been here, and I would like to get your view with your long experience of India. We have a good deal of evidence here in this Committee to the effect that both the ryot and the industrial mechanic, both of whom are probably illiterate, have a very fair idea of what they want and what their interests are, and would probably give very definite effect to it if they were given a chance in the polling booth?—Yes, in matters directly and closely affecting them. We had a notable instance of that last year in connection with the compulsory primary Education Bill introduced in the Punjab. The Bill was introduced by the Government, and there was a great deal of educational enthusiasm. In the Bill, as drafted, largely under the influence of the non-official members, provision was made for the compulsory education of girls on the same lines as of boys and also for the age of compulsion five years. When this Bill was circulated for opinion it was found that there was a great mass of rural opinion and of the working classes distinctly opposed to giving up their children to be educated for as long as five years, and there was a very general feeling among the Mohammedans, both the higher classes and the peasantry, and among the higher classes of Hindoos, against the compulsory education of girls; and in deference to that feeling, which, as you point out, sprang from the more or less illiterate classes, those two provisions were modified. The compulsory education of girls was left to stand over for a period, when public opinion might be advanced enough to justify it, and the age of compulsion—the limits of age were reduced so as to meet the views of the great masses of the population, who make use of their children on their land and in their labour. That was a matter intimately affecting the people, and I think they were quite capable of giving an intelligent opinion with reference to it, but it was the Government rather than the Legislative Council that ascertained and represented their views, which otherwise would have remained unheeded.

7490. That is rather a good illustration, really, in India of the assimilation to the kind of rough-and-ready decisions we have come to in countries governed under the responsible system?—Yes. At the same time, I may point out that the Government had the greatest difficulty in overcoming the objections of the educational enthusiasts in the matter. They wanted to press for the compulsory education of girls and also for a longer period of compulsion for boys, and it was only when pointed out to them in the Legislative Council and elsewhere that those measures, however desirable, if put forward at this stage, would wreck or endanger the success of the whole Bill, that they gave way, very unwillingly.

7491. Their rather precipitate zeal in other ways was restrained by the people?—Yes, and by the Government as interpreting the views of the people. If it had been left to a pure vote in the Legislative Council, those two provisions, which would have endangered the Bill, would have been carried.

7492. If you had the Legislative Council elected by those people, it would have a corresponding effect upon the minds of the legislators, would it not?—Yes, I agree, assuming that their representatives voice their views.

7493. They would to that extent be controlled and influenced in whatever decision they came to?—Yes.

7494. I listened, as I am sure all the Committee did, to the very illuminating and picturesque illustration you gave showing the underlying demerits, as you saw them, of a dual system, and the strong advantages, as you realised them, of a unified system. I think all of us have the deepest sympathy with you and your colleagues, and every Government desires to get as near as possible to the unified system, but the difficulty which faces us, which we want to get cleared up if we can, is to combine a unified system with the amount of real responsibility which it is desired to start this reform scheme in India on. Now I think in your answers to Mr. Acland already you have admitted that your scheme would not give that real responsibility in any particular subject?—I do not think I said that. I said, subject to the collective decision of the Government, each member of the Council, whether British or Indian, would direct the affairs of the Department for which he was responsible, but as the Indian member at this stage would not have had any official training, it would probably happen that he would be more interfered with at the start than a member with a long administrative training.

7495. But, of course, the final decision on any important point in regard to legislation or administration would be the combined decision of a unified Cabinet?—Yes.

7496. With regard to the mode of election of that Cabinet, you said the two Indians should be appointed by the Governor from the Legislative Council?—In some Provinces, but not in all, it would depend on the conditions of the Province. In the Punjab I contemplated one member would be taken from the Legislative Council and the other need not necessarily be, because there are large interests which at first would not be adequately represented in the Council among the elected members, and which it might be very desirable to have represented in the Government. Take the interests of the depressed classes, of the inferior classes of the peasantry, the interests of factory labourers and people of that kind, and the interests of the military classes.

7497. If a franchise could be adopted which would give representation to those classes which you have mentioned, then would you suggest that the member should be appointed from the elected?—Yes, when you get a franchise in which all classes of the electorates are capable of being adequately represented, then I think the necessity for nomination would disappear, and that would be possible. That is one of the steps to which we look forward. In some Provinces it may be possible to do it at once. I am only speaking with reference to my own particular Province. Most heads of Governments agree to two members from the Legislative Council even at the start.

7498. How would you propose the other two members should be appointed, the official members?—They would be appointed by the Crown in the same way as the non-official members—nominated by the Governor and appointed by the Crown.

7499. Both officials?—Yes.

7500. Would you give the same tenure to all?—Subject to "during pleasure."

7501. To the pleasure of the Governor?—I think the Executive Councils are appointed by the Crown, and they would be only removable by the Crown. I think it is very desirable that as far as possible all should have the same status.

7502. Now I diverge for a moment. I think you say in your note that you think it most desirable that the military element in India should be included in the electorate?—Yes; I suggested giving them the franchise—having a military franchise.

7503. You would have a military constituency, as it were?—No; I did not propose a separate military constituency; I only proposed that they should be enfranchised in the constituencies in which they reside. I have not proposed a separate military constituency.

7504. You would enfranchise all those who have served with the colours?—Yes. That was the proposal, I think, of the Legislative Council, and I think we roughly accepted it. I think perhaps we limited it to Indian officers and non-commissioned officers.

7505. As regards the mechanics in the towns occupied in industry, can you suggest to us any way by which they could be directly represented in the Legislative Councils?—I can only speak in reference to the Punjab, and there industry is at present imperfectly developed. I think our total factory operatives in the Punjab number only 30,000, and they are so scattered in various small establishments that it would be almost impossible to form them into a separate electorate; nor does their number in the Punjab justify their being formed into a separate electorate.

7506. Speaking from your own local experience of the Punjab, it does not bulk so large as a problem as it would in Bombay, Bengal, Calcutta and other Provinces?—No.

7507. Would you say you would regard it as important that that class should have direct representation in the Councils?—I think it is very desirable, because the conditions of factory labour at present in India require very careful revision, and in matters of that kind I think the Government has hitherto been the principal agency in protecting the interests of the workers. It is very desirable that they should have some nominated member at present representing them.

7508. I take it you would agree that the reason for the proposal of a dual system is on two grounds really. The first ground is as near as possible direct representation. Responsibility should be given in certain subjects, whilst other subjects which it is not considered desirable at the present juncture to place on a responsible system should still be retained under an autocratic system?—Yes.

7509. Your proposal for unified government would have the effect of diminishing the responsible aspect of the transferred subject, and it would also have to a certain extent the effect of diminishing the autocratic aspect of the reserved subject?—Yes, it would secure a greater unity of system in the administration.

7510. It would secure a greater elasticity for the reserved subject?—Yes.

7511. It would come more directly under the control of the Legislative Council?—Yes; that is very desirable. As long as you have two separate fields, I think you would have the Ministers in charge of transferred subjects very jealous of the reserved sphere, and resenting the fact that they were kept out of the most important fields of administration, and that can be overcome by allowing them to range over the whole sphere of administration. We need their assistance and advice in the reserved sphere just as much as in the transferred sphere. The spheres are arbitrarily delimited and very often overlap, and that is one of the strongest arguments against the division.

7512. Do I understand also that you would propose that all these subjects should be open to either race?—Yes, I am quite prepared for that.

7513. From the start?—Yes, except matters connected, say, with native States and foreign relations. Of course, the latter do not arise in Provincial Governments.

7514. Let us assume for a moment that the transferred and reserved subjects obtain, can you conceive a means by which that could be carried out in a less separate fashion than that which you indicate it will be? I rather gather from your remarks that you visualise this scheme with two perfectly separate Governments working in complete water-tight compartments, Ministers on one side and the Executive Council on the other, and the Governor for both, but quite separate and water-tight compartments. Would you say that it might diminish the difficulties that would arise from that system if it were laid down quite clearly that all matters that are of that importance which should come up for deliberation, other than those which are purely departmental, should come up for discussion in the whole Government sitting together and deliberating as a single Government, members of the Executive Council and Ministers, and that it should be laid down either in the Act or by an instrument of instruction that the Governor must first of all place that before the combined cabinet for full discussion, whether it be a reserved subject or whether it be a transferred subject?—I think that would conduce to much better administration and avoid many serious blunders which the inexperience of Ministers might lead them into, but at the same time the objection to it from the point of view of the scheme arises: Are not you obscuring responsibility again?

7515. After full discussion has taken place, and possibly and probably modifications and compromises have been come to on important aspects on the question under discussion, at the end of all that there might be a division of opinion: Can you conceive it workable that in the last resort that that difference of opinion should be decided upon in the case of a transferred subject by the Governor and his Ministers, and in the case of a reserved subject by the Governor and his

Executive Council? Could not that take place without any really undue friction?—But you almost come back to the position from which you started. You have the Governor with his Ministers, and the Governor with the Council. You have transferred and reserved subjects. A case arises which involves both perhaps. That is brought before the joint Government. After discussion the ultimate decision rests with the Governor and his Ministers, or the Governor and his Council. Is that what you mean?

7516. No. Of course in any case where it is clear that a subject overlaps, a transferred subject definitely overlaps and conflicts with a reserved subject, I think I am right in saying there is a provision in the Bill that the Governor has full authority in the matter?—Yes.

7517. I am not asking from that point of view; I am asking from the point of view of a purely reserved subject—a police subject. That would come under the full discussion of the combined sides of the Government?—Yes, I think everything is to be gained by that.

7518. And they thrash it out. At the end there might be a point which the Governor and his Executive Council might consider is absolutely essential for good government, and he exercises his authority then at the end?—Yes.

7519. As a reserved subject?—Yes.

7520. And he would outvote the combined Government in consequence?—Yes.

7521. And the same would happen in a transferred subject, if it were an agricultural subject. If the Minister held out at the end for a particular point, that point would obtain, because it was a transferred subject, after full discussion?—Yes, subject to the Governor.

7522. I am trying to put it very roughly, but I hope you see my line of thought, and I wanted to ask you whether you cannot conceive a scheme of that character working out fairly well without undue friction?—I think it is very preferable to the present scheme which, as expounded by the Government of India, does tend to set up a Chinese wall between the two halves of the Government.

7523. You say as expounded by the Government of India: It has been interpreted in that sense?—Yes.

7524. I do not know whether that is the view of the Government of India or not. It seems to me to have been interpreted in a much more separated sense than it need be, and I am trying to bring it more together. If it could be brought together on those lines do you think that some of the vital objections that you have put to us to that extent would be modified?—Yes. I think in so far as you gain increased association you obviate the danger of rash decisions.

7525. By this scheme would you not gain increased association whilst at the same time you would retain that amount of responsibility which is desired, and which has been asked for from so many sections, within a limited area?—Yes, prima facie it seems a decided improvement on the proposals hitherto put forward, but, of course, it would all depend on the manner in which it was worked.

7526. Your scheme would too, would it not?—Our scheme provides for constant association, and we are going on long experience as to how that reconciles conflicting views.

7527. On page 10 you indicate to us that local Governments have been hampered in the past by superior control, and you think this control should be relaxed to some extent?—Yes.

7529. Could you indicate to the Committee some of the matters which might undergo relaxation to the advantage of administration in a Province?—I could illustrate cases in which our hands have been tied in the past by the system. In the Punjab a few years ago we started a scheme for the reform of the criminal tribes by registering them, by establishing settlements for them, reformatory settlements, industrial settlements, and eventually, as their reformation proceeded, agricultural settlements. We worked up that scheme. We had the

the land and the money at our disposal. We sent it up to the Government of India; it was referred to the Secretary of State; it was a very pressing problem, but it took us about three years to get that scheme through; whereas, if we were masters in our own houses in purely internal matters of this kind, we should have been able to push the thing through in perhaps three months. Similarly questions of reorganisation in the Services, they are held up. For instance, we are trying to reorganise the subordinate educational service in the Punjab. That hinges on the reorganisation of the provincial educational services. That is a matter which is before the Government of India. The Government of India has taken a very long time over that, and meantime all our scheme for reorganisation in subordinate services is held up. In ordinary everyday administration you find yourself continually held up by the necessity of reference to the Government of India, or for the financial sanction of the Secretary of State. The result is very often that local governments are slow to initiate schemes which they know will take a long time to obtain sanction for, and also a long time to put through. Any relaxation of that superior control which would give financial and administrative devolution to local governments would, I am sure, enormously improve the administration.

7530. You say in your note, you would like to see the discretion for this relaxation exercised by the Secretary of State in Council?—Yes.

7531. By that, am I to understand that in any recasting of the system, you would desire to see it recast by the Secretary of State in Council?—Yes.

7532. Rather than by rules made by the Government of India?—I have an open mind on that point. I was not able to go into the proposals with regard to the reorganisation of the Secretary of State's Council. I never saw them officially, I only saw a summary of them. Whether it is done by the Government of India or the Secretary of State in Council, as long as the end is attained, I do not think it matters very much from the point of view of provincial administration.

7533. All you want is, you want it hastened up a bit?—Yes.

7534. You have not read Lord Crewe's Report?—No.

7535. And you have not seen Sir James Brunyate's Note in that Report?—No.

7536. So that it is no use asking questions on that?—No.

7537. You say you would like to see the statutory powers of the India Council retained, and at the same time you would like to see its constitution widened?—Yes.

7538. Could you tell us what you mean by that last paragraph, the widening of its constitution? How would you like to see it composed?—So as to give the Indian element adequate representation in it—the official element and the non-official element.

7539. Would you increase the Indian element in it from what it is now?—The present figures are three out of twelve, I think. I do not see why it should not be three or four out of twelve.

7540. You say you would like to see in the preamble something to suggest the increased association of Indians in every branch of the administration?—Yes. That is the first principle laid down in the announcement of 20th August, 1917, and the Bill does not give effect to it.

7541. Would you like to see some statutory proposals introduced into the Bill to that effect—embodied in clauses of the Bill?—I have not considered that in detail, but I think it essential.

7542. I have no doubt you have read the Report of the Public Services Commission?—Yes.

7543. Do you agree with the proposal in that Report that the so-called technical services in India should become, as soon as possible, as soon as men are found available in India, services recruited by Indians?—I did not quite gather your question.

7544. There is a proposal in that Report that the technical services—and they come under a considerable list—you know the services I mean?—Yes—veterinary, agriculture, and so on.

7545. Yes; that as men are found available in India for those services, trained for them, the process should continue as fast as possible for those services to become entirely Indian. That is the proposal of our Report?—My view would be the general view, that you require both the Western and the Eastern streams of influence even in your technical services, and I would not exclude either.

7546. You would not be prepared to see anything on those lines included in the Bill?—Increasing the strength of the Indian element certainly, but not excluding the British.

7547. Do you think, from your experience of India, that the delay of the increase of recruitment of Indians to the various services in India has contributed towards the general feeling of discontent and agitation in India?—I think so. I think the delay in giving effect to the proposals of the Public Services Commission has had something to say to it among the educated classes. I do not think it has affected the great mass of people in any way.

Lord Sinha.

7548. First of all, with regard to all schemes which have been put forward, including your own, it will be necessary for English officials both of higher and lower grades to act under the control of Indian superior officers, members or Ministers, or whatever we may call them?—Yes.

7549. Under any scheme that we may have under contemplation?—Yes; it happens at the present day.

7550. Do you apprehend that there will be any difficulty with regard to such subordinates, English officials, whether belonging to the Indian Civil Service or any other service, objecting to serving under Indian Ministers or members of the Council?—I do not think there would be any objection to serving under Indian members of the Council, because they serve under them at present in every province where there are Indian members of Council; but I think there would be considerable anxiety as to their position under Ministers.

7551. Take the first: Indian members of the Executive Council. Of course you have no Executive Council in your own Province?—No.

7552. Have you ever heard that in regard to other Provinces where there are Executive Councils and Indian members of the Executive Councils there has been any unwillingness or objection on the part of English officials to serve under the control of those Indian members of Council?—No, I have never heard of such a thing.

7553. And you do not believe there would be any such objection with regard to members of Council qua Indians?—No.

7554. I take it that even with regard to Ministers in the technical sense in which it was used in the Bill there would be no objection to serve under them, qua Indians?—The objection would arise in this way, that they are men selected from the Legislature and who have not at present had sufficient administrative training and experience as to command the confidence of the services which would be entrusted to them. That would be the feeling.

7555. I quite follow that. I understand that from your previous answer, but my point is that the objection to serve under them would not be because they are Indians, but because they have not sufficient experience and capacity and so on, and were under the control of a Legislature which also had not sufficient capacity?—Yes.

7556. The objection would not be, therefore, to serve under them because they are Indians?—No, not a racial objection.

7557. You do not anticipate there will be any racial objection?—No, not as far as my experience goes.

7558. Nor do you believe there will be?—No.

7559. You really object to any immediate transfer of real power to popular representatives?—No. We go further than the Government of India in proposing that the Budget should be voted by the Legislature.

7560. Now you are talking of your scheme—the Lieutenant-Governor's scheme?—Yes, that includes that point.

7561. I am going back to a little earlier stage, the Memorandum which you refer to in your answer, the Memorandum of the 10th January, 1918?—That was written before the Reforms Report was framed. In a subsequent letter letter of 5th November, 1918, which contains my considered opinion on that Report, I said that I had given way as regards my objections to the transfer of responsibility, owing to the fact that the scheme made provision for the Government being able to pass essential legislation and also to secure essential supplies.

7562. Therefore

7562. Therefore, I take it, that with those safeguards the power to pass essential legislation and to secure essential supplies, you do not object to an immediate transfer of real power to popular representatives?—No, assuming you can secure popular representatives.

7563. Do you believe that you can secure popular representatives at the present time?—Not in the wider sense of the word, because, as I have pointed out, the conditions of responsibility as generally accepted are non-existent. We hope to create them.

7564. Leaving aside perfection, which it not now attainable and perhaps never will be, do you consider that it is possible now to obtain real popular representatives to whom power might be transferred?—They will represent a section, various classes, but they will not represent any large proportion of those classes, and to the extent that they are lacking in their representative capacity I think their powers should be limited.

7565. Even though, as you point out from the Report itself, I think from one of Lord Morley's addresses, even though India may be representing centuries from the fifth to the twentieth, you would admit that representative institutions are not only possible and desirable, but absolutely inevitable and necessary, do you not?—They are practicable and desirable.

7566. And inevitable?—Yes; in view of the announcement.

7567. That being so, whatever imperfections there may be in the system of representation, would you allow a real transfer of power under present conditions to such representatives of the people as it is possible to secure under the present conditions?—Yes, subject to necessary safeguards, due to their inexperience and not being fully representative.

7568. I take it that in order to obtain representation in Legislative Councils you would necessarily have to have recourse mainly to what has been called the educated, and sometimes the political classes, would you not?—You would have to seek your representatives among those classes.

7569. It would be necessary mainly to rely upon the educated classes?—Yes; that I consider is the great drawback of the system, because the educated classes—or rather the political classes—we have to rely upon are so unrepresentative of the masses.

7570. But as it is you must rely upon them for whatever representative institutions you can set up—Not necessarily on them solely, but largely.

7571. I do not say solely?—You must rely largely on them.

7572. In fact, chiefly?—Yes.

7573. You said that they were not representative of the masses?—Yes.

7574. In what respect do you say that they are not representative of the masses?—The best thing is that the masses should speak for themselves, and I think they have often done so. I can quote cases from my own Province. The measure during my official career which was the most important in the Punjab was the Punjab Land Alienation Act, to secure the interests of the peasant proprietor of the Punjab. That measure was strongly resisted by all the representatives of the urban educated class, for two reasons: In the first place the educated classes are almost exclusively urban, and their interests in this matter were conflicting with those of the rural population. Their object was to obtain possession of the land, and the rural population desired to retain possession of their ancestral acres. The measure was resisted at all stages by the urban educated classes in the Punjab, and even after it was passed into law by Lord Curzon's Government, what you may call the educated classes have lost no opportunity of denouncing it and of trying to obtain its modification or its cancellation. That is one of the reasons which in the Punjab, apart from other Provinces, has given rise to the line of cleavage between the urban and the rural classes. That is one striking example.

7575. Is that Act working satisfactorily?—It is looked upon as the Magna Charta of the peasant proprietors in the Punjab, and they themselves in every representation they have put forward have admitted that it is.

7576. Take another instance, the Colonisation Bill. That was also largely resisted by the educated classes, was it not?—Yes; it was resisted by the colonists primarily.

7577. And by the educated classes?—Yes.

7578. And the local Government passed it, and it was disallowed by the Supreme Government?—Yes.

7579. So that the educated classes are not always in the wrong, are they?—No; when their own interests are not conflicting with those of the rural classes their opinion is very often right. There are a great many matters in which they do conflict.

7580. There is another point. You say the educated classes belong mostly to the urban classes. Do they not come from the provinces just as much? I can only say that they do in Bengal and in Bombay, I am told. I do not know about the Punjab. You probably know better than I do. But I put it to you that the so-called educated classes come as much from the country as from the cities; in fact, more from the country than from the cities?—That is not the case where the "educated" classes are taken to be the "English educated." It is one of the complaints of the rural classes that nearly all the higher educational institutions are in the towns.

7581. The complaint is that they have to send their sons to those educational institutions?—The result is that those at whose doors these educational institutions are naturally preponderate.

7582. I suppose to some extent it must be so—that educational institutions being mostly in big cities, the people living in the cities derive the greatest advantage from those educational institutions?—Yes.

7583. There is nothing peculiar to India in that respect, is there?—No, but the fact is there is in the Punjab a very distinct line of cleavage between urban and rural sentiment in matters of administration. The rural population complain that the urban people, owing to their control of the Press and the platform, are in a stronger position to press their claims, and therefore their interests receive protection, while the rural interests are overlooked or disregarded. I think that is very strongly put in a copy of a memorandum I received the other day from one of the leaders of the rural interests. I think it was addressed to the Right Hon. the Secretary of State, but he sent me a copy of it in the hope that I would explain his point of view to the Committee if I had an opportunity. He is one of the most prominent members of the rural community in the Punjab and a member of the Punjab Legislative Council, and in this memorandum he dwells on the fact that the rural interests have hitherto been invariably overlooked, that the urban classes have obtained for themselves the control of the funds for education, for sanitation, and facilities for local self-government, and that their outlook as regards rural matters is a narrow and selfish one.

7584. Have you found yourself that the educated classes, assuming them to be chiefly urban, have opposed opportunities of sanitation, education, and so forth for the rural areas?—No, but when it comes to the practical working out of the schemes they secure most of the benefits of these measures for themselves. If you look at the expenditure on sanitation you will find that of the grants given for every one hundred rupees spent in an urban area there are only ten rupees spent in a rural area, though the rural areas contribute most of the funds.

7585. Do you apply that to the Legislature or to the District Boards?—To the Legislature and perhaps the District Boards.

7586. The District Boards deal only with rural areas?—Yes.

7587. So far as the municipalities are concerned, they would be entirely distinct?—Yes.

7588. The so-called urban areas?—Yes.

7589. The Legislature, up to now, have had no power to deal with grants for those purposes?—Grants are put at the disposal of a Sanitary Board, and are distributed by the Sanitary Board, and as the urban areas have most power to make their wants—their very legitimate wants—felt, they naturally obtain priority in the distribution of the funds.

7590. That is the Sanitary Board—the Sanitary Board created by the nomination of the Government?—Yes. Even there the urban classes, from their superior organisation and intelligence, secure undue advantage. That is the complaint made.

7591. Do you agree that the growing body of Western educated opinion is gradually creating a new atmosphere all over India?—I would not say all over India. It is certainly arousing hopes and aspirations among the educated classes.

7592. Do you agree with this: "Even those who most strongly deprecate some of its manifestations realise that it has contributed largely to the great social and religious movements which are aiming at giving a new direction to old beliefs, and of harmonising ancient doctrines with the teachings of science"?—Yes, I see no reason to dissent from that; but I might point out that its influence in that direction—that is, of religious and social innovation—is also causing considerable uneasiness among the masses of the people.

7593. Do you agree also with this: "It is reflected"—that is their influence—"in that new sense of unity which is displacing the idea of ordered separation hitherto prevalent in Indian society"?—I am afraid I have not seen as many signs as I should like to see of that new sense of unity.

7594. The passages I have quoted to you are from the Report of the Public Services Commission, over which Lord Islington presided. Would you in the main accept those statements which I put to you?—The sense of unity may appear to be growing steadily from year to year, and then some event happens, like the riots last year in Katarpur, which aroused the most violent religious sectarian animosity, and all the ground gained is apt to be lost for the time being.

7595. You do not ascribe riots of that description to the influence of the educated classes, do you?—No; I ascribe it to the sectarian feeling, which I suppose prevails among all classes of society. It is not absent in the educated classes.

7596. But so far as the educated classes are concerned, the tendency is to minimise the sectarian feelings leading to such riots, is it not?—I think in the case of the Katarpur riots, the judgment in which I recently read, it was shown that a considerable number of highly educated men were concerned in the disturbances and were convicted and punished for their share in them.

7597. I will not take an individual case, because probably I could quote other cases which might be different; I want your general opinion from your experience and knowledge of modern India as to whether the influence of the educated classes is not on the side of minimising sectarian feelings leading to riots and disturbances?—Very often it is, but, as I say, cases arise in which a strong religious sectarian feeling is aroused, and no class, Hindu or Mohammedan, can hold itself aloof from taking its part.

7598. I can realise that?—It is much the same as the sectarian feeling in the North of Ireland between Catholic and Protestant.

7599. There is one other statement of yours which, with great deference, I desire to controvert. I put this to you: You say that there has been so far no desire apparent to co-operate with the Government so far as the educated classes are concerned. Did I understand you wrongly, or is that what you said? That is what I understood you to say?—There is no strong desire as evidenced by any marked co-operation. I am speaking from my experience as an administrator—there is no very marked desire.

7600. May I trouble you to give two instances of that absence of desire to co-operate?—One instance of it arose during the war. I was in charge of the Punjab, which was expected to furnish the largest proportion of recruits to the Indian Army. In the course of four years we raised 350,000 combatant recruits—half the total number raised for India. That effort was achieved by the co-operation of practically all the rural classes by appeals to them from every side—appeals to their traditions, to their religion, to their patriotism, to their sense of honour, and to their martial instincts. That effort was almost exclusively confined to the rural population. We tried a similar campaign in the towns among the educated classes. I tried to raise a University double company. With the greatest difficulty I succeeded in obtaining from those who were undergraduates, and the class above the undergraduates, seventy men who were formed into a signalling section. We then tried to raise a defence force at the time when the situation was very critical, and when His Majesty and the Premier appealed to India for renewed efforts. With the greatest difficulty from our two-million urban population we succeeeded in raising, I think, one double company. This was at the time when from our rural population we had raised 350,000 men during the four years of the war. That I consider is one instance of lack of co-operation at a period of great national emergency. Then you asked me to give a second instance. Last April we were meeting with a very disturbed situation in the Punjab, in which it was necessary to enlist on the side of law and order all supporters of the Government. I do not wish to go into that matter; it is a wide matter which is under inquiry, but I did not receive much assistance.

7601. Those are the two principal cases which you have thought of?—Yes. May I put it in this way, that the educated classes, indeed all classes, divide themselves into three—one which is hostile, one which is neutral or sitting on the fence, and one which is inclined actively to support the Government. You cannot make any one statement with reference to all three, but my experience was that of the educated classes the larger proportion was among the neutrals, those who are sitting on the fence.

7602. I do not desire to go into matters of Indian administration with regard to the Punjab or any other Province, but would you agree with me that both those instances which you have given are matters of controversy at the present moment in India?—I do not think there can be any controversy about the fact of the total number of recruits.

7603. Whether there ought to be, or ought not to be, controversy is not my point?—I say I do not think there is any controversy about the number of recruits we succeeded in raising from the urban population.

7604. Not as regards the number, but the methods—there is controversy as regards the methods of recruitment, is there not?—Perhaps in rural areas, but not in urban. I have never heard any suggestion as to the methods used in urban areas.

7605. And similarly there is a controversy with regard to the second instance which you gave. I am not going into the rights and wrongs of it, because it would be hardly proper either for you or me to do so on the present occasion.

Chairman:] We are not concerned with that.

Lord Sinha.

7606. But they are both matters of controversy?—Yes. I believe questions have been raised by people outside the Punjab.

7607. Now coming to your scheme, if I understand it rightly, you agree that it is disguised dualism?—Reconciled dualism, I would call it.

7608. In the long run, in the ultimate analysis, it comes to dualism, does it not?—No, I do not admit that. I say that our experience shows that those two dualistic forces working for a common object will be inspired by a common aim and purpose, and will work unitedly.

7609. Is there any reason why in the dual form the two sections should not do so?—There is the great reason that they will not be working in close association and with joint responsibility.

7610. Assure the association, as Lord Islington proposes it should be assured, will it not be the same?—No; it does not appear to me to be an organic association.

7611. Why not?—It is presided over by the same president, the Governor?—Ministers know that in the last resort the decision on certain subjects will rest with them. So do members of the Executive Council. They go into this joint meeting with the knowledge that in the last resort they can carry their point apart from the results of any discussion. If they meet round a table with the knowledge that they must agree, whether they are Ministers or members, on a common decision, then each will be prepared to give way somewhat and you will get a joint decision. But if each party comes in knowing that the discussion will not necessarily affect the final decision, then I think that is not an organic association.

7612. You might say that with regard to both sections, of course—both the members of Council and the Ministers?—Yes. I think it is very desirable that both should have the benefits of association.

7613. Is there any objection, so far as you see, to each section having the final say with regard to particular classes of subjects—for example, with regard to sanitation the Ministers, and with regard to law and justice the Councillors?—I think the division of subjects is inherently a bad principle of administration—that you ought to be able to concentrate on every branch of administration the joint experience of all your Government.

7614. But do you not secure that experience by the association?—I do not think the association, in the sense in which you are suggesting it, would be effective enough to secure it.

7615. Now, as regards tenure. Under your scheme in the provinces, where you take two of the members of the Executive Government from the elected members of the Legislative Council, they would necessarily cease to hold office when the Legislative Council is dissolved, and cease to be members thereof?—That is a matter of legal provision. I had not contemplated that. I understood they would be members of the Executive Council in charge of certain branches of the administration, and would hold office during the pleasure of the Crown.

7616. But they are chosen because they are members of the Legislative Council?—Yes.

7617. When the Legislative Council, of which they are members, ceases to exist, and a new Legislative Council comes into existence, they may not be members of that?—In that case they certainly would cease to be members.

7618. Therefore their tenure of office may come to an end when the Council of which they were elected members comes to an end?—It would be perhaps more correct to put it, when the new Council is elected.

7619. Yes. If they continued to be members of the Executive Council, but no longer members of the new Legislative Council, what would happen under your system?—The Governor, I presume, would have to nominate from the new Legislative Council members to take their place.

7620. Therefore the two who had lost their seats in the Council would have to go out?—Yes.

7621. But their colleagues, the official members of the Executive Government, would stay on?—Yes.

7622. Their status therefore would be totally different?—To that extent.:

7623. Therefore the point to which you attach great importance, that their position and salaries should be the same, could not be maintained?—But their status and salaries while they held office would be exactly the same.

7624. Assuming further that when they remain members of the Legislative Council they find that members of the Council do not support their policy, what will happen in that case to the Executive Councillors chosen from among the Legislative Council?—It would be for them to decide whether to resign or to tender their resignation to the Governor.

7625. Supposing they did not, what is the Governor to do? Keep them on? In the event of their sticking to office, notwithstanding that they have ceased to retain the confidence of the Legislative Council, what is the Governor to do?—That, I gather, is left under the scheme to the discretion of the Governor.

7626. I am now talking of your scheme?—Under our scheme we have retained the same thing; we leave it to the Governor to enforce their resignation if he considers it necessary.

7627. Therefore, in both those respects the position of the two non-official Executive Councillors chosen from the Legislature would be exactly the same as that of the Ministers under the scheme of the Bill?—Yes. That is one of the very points I tried to bring out in my Memorandum, that there is very little difference between the two in practice.

7628. That is my point, that there is so very little difference that there is no reason why you should quarrel with one which is generally accepted by Indian political opinion, and try to force down their throats one which is not accepted. In practice, may I put it to you that there is not any substantial difference, having regard to what I point out and what you say yourself, between the two?—There is this very substantial difference. In the case of the member of the Legislature who is appointed a member of the Executive Council, he is a member of the Government with joint responsibility—separate responsibility for his own Department, but subject to the joint responsibility of the Government as a whole. The separate Minister under the scheme of the Bill has exclusive separate responsibility carried to a pitch far beyond that which is allowed in the British Constitution. In the British Constitution the Minister is responsible for his Department, but he is subject to the collective responsibility of the Government as a whole. Here you have no control under the system of dualism over the Minister, and no joint responsibility with his fellow Ministers. He is solely responsible to the Governor.

7629. Given the association which is generally desired, would not the Legislative Council also hold that they are to some extent amenable to their control in the part they take with regard to reserved subjects?—That the Executive Councillor selected from the Legislature would be amenable?

7630. To my mind it is immaterial whether you call them Executive Councillors or Ministers. Even when the subjects are divided, the Legislative Council will have considerable influence over reserved subjects?—Yes, undoubtedly.

7631. And similarly that influence would be reflected by the two non-official Indian members of the Executive Government, whether you call them Ministers or Councillors?—Yes.

7632. To that extent, therefore, they will be responsible for the part that they take in connection with reserved subjects?—Yes, but the Government of India contemplate that position with considerable suspicion.

7633. I know the Government of India do, because the scheme of the Government of India, if I understand it rightly—Lord Islington perhaps understands it differently—involve greater separation than I desire myself, but, assuming there is not that separation and there is that close association which seems to be generally desired, here, at any rate, the position would be practically the same with regard to reserved subjects also?—Not practically the same. In the one case he could only have influence, in the other case he would have responsibility. Under the dual scheme a Minister would have only influence in reserved subjects; in the other case he would be responsible and a member of the Government.

7634. You gave two instances of local bodies not choosing non-official Presidents, notwithstanding the desire of the Government that they should do so, and Lahore was one of them?—Yes.

7635. In the case of Lahore was not originally a non-official President elected by both the Hindoo and Mahommedan members?—Yes, and the election was held to be irregular.

7636. By the Government?—By the legal advisers of the Government. The Government has to gazette the appointment, and before that the Government has to satisfy itself that the election is regular. In this case the election was irregular, and it was quashed, and they were called upon under the same conditions to make a new selection and similarly asked to select a non-official.

7637. I suppose it was urged that it was the Government's influence that was exerted to get rid of the non-official who was selected?—Misrepresentation of these matters no doubt does take place.

Mr. Montagu.

7638. Your evidence really comes to this, that you are in agreement with the policy of the Bill?—Yes.

7639. But you have a very strong opinion in differing as regards its methods?—Yes.

3640. Why do you accept the pronouncement of the 20th August? Why is that pronouncement acceptable to you?—Well, I never considered that I had any voice in the matter. It is a pronouncement of the Government, and it is not for an officer of the Government to question it. But if I am asked my personal view, I say I heartily accept the pronouncement in so far as it is likely to ensure the objects which are stated in the pronouncement, which objects have my full sympathy.

7641. That is an important distinction. I mean it is quite possible to accept the pronouncement loyally as a pronouncement that you cannot get out of, because it is given to the world, and it is also possible to accept it because you believe in it?—Yes. I accept it for both reasons.

Mr. Montagu—continued.

7642. You accept it for both reasons?—Yes.

7643. You want to see eventual responsible Government in India?—Yes.

7644. Could you tell us why?—I think, on the whole, if you can secure it, it produces better administrative results and is more popular with the people than any other form of Government.

7645. Are there not two theories on which you could build Government institutions, one of which regards the problem of Government as an engineering problem for the irrigation of a great estate, and the other regards it as largely a psychological problem, in which the institutions are to be tested by the degree of citizenship which they call forth from those who live under them? Are there not those two possible kinds of theory of government?—Yes, but I do not accept the theory, if you are alluding to the simile I put forward, that I contemplate working the irrigation system as a great estate of Government; I contemplate working it in the interests of the people living on that estate.

7646. Their material interests?—No, their general interests.

7647. On the hypothesis on which you drew, very skilfully, that picture, I think you said it was desirable that the Government should work with unity, with efficiency, with economy, and without rivalry, without friction and without antagonism?—And finally meeting the wishes of the irrigators—that was very important.

7648. From every point of view, if those are the tests, is it not much easier, is there not much less risk of friction, is it not much more economical, are not the chances of unison much greater if you have autocratic government in the hands of one man than if you have any responsible government at all?—That may be so, but you have to look forward to the time when your autocratic Government will not be meeting the wishes of the irrigators. That is a very decisive feature of the matter.

7649. And then you have to substitute for economy something which may be more expensive; you have to substitute for efficiency something which may be less efficient?—Yes. My point was, if you meet the wishes of the irrigators, and at the same time retain these very valuable qualities of unity, economy, efficiency, etc., so much the better.

7650. Then we come a step further. You want to meet the wishes of the irrigators, or in other words, the time has come to associate them with Government?—In so far as they are fit and show desire.

7651. In a subordinate capacity, or in a capacity of equality?—In the capacity of equality.

7652. That means that you have to share the burden with them?—Yes.

7653. You have to give them control of part of the Government?—I should give them partial control of the whole Government.

7654. That means that part of the control you give them is taken away from those who have got it now?—Yes, that may be admitted.

7655. That lessens efficiency, in your view?—To a very small extent under our scheme, because you have the collective Government—the Government working as a collective body.

7656. It lessens economy?—Yes, to some extent. That may be admitted.

7657. It brings in to share the burden of equality people "who will play more and more to what they regard as the popular gallery, who will pose as the champions of the popular cause in resisting or attacking a hostile bureaucracy, who will strengthen their own position by forming party cliques," and so on. It brings that undesirable element into the irrigating establishment?—To a very small extent if it is a joint system with association.

7658. You want to keep it as small as possible—as small as the wishes of the irrigators make it necessary?—Do you mean the transfer of authority?

7659. Yes?—No, I do not desire to limit it in that way.

7660. But the larger you make it the more you bring in these undesirable elements?—My suggestion was that under the scheme I contemplate these undesirable elements would not exist, or not exist to any appreciable degree—that the possibility of friction and danger and delay in times of emergency could be avoided under the system of joint Government which we propose.

7661. You have got in the Punjab what, from the administrative point of view and from the criteria which you have laid down, I should have thought, other things being equal, you consider is the best form of government, the Government of one man with no Executive Council at all; now you suggest bringing in the Executive Council, because, if I am not misstating what you said in answer to me, the wishes of the irrigators have got to be met?—That is one among other reasons, and a very large one.

7662. When you have an Executive Council you will have on it two Indians?—Yes.

7663. Those two Indians will presumably be, or in the modification of the scheme which you suggest one of them will probably be, one of these educated Indians?—Yes, but not necessarily of the urban class.

7664. One of these gentlemen who do not represent the masses, who have, according to the instances you have given, shown no desire to co-operate with the Government, who have acted in their own interests on such things as the Land Alienation Act and the Colonisation Act. In other words, you are bringing into the Government, under your own proposal, an element which you distrust, which you think the masses distrust, and which will make for inefficiency and greater expenditure and playing to the gallery in your administration. Why do you do that?—Because I hope that all those difficulties which you have pictured can be obviated by working in association.

7665. If I have mis-stated what you have said, correct me, because I want to understand your argument?—At the close of Lord Sinha's examination I divided the educated classes like others into three, a small section hostile to the Government, another section actively supporting the Government, and a very large section which was neutral or sitting on the fence. One hopes the Council would represent a very large proportion of those who are active supporters of Government, or at all events a very large proportion of those who are not opposed to Government.

7666. You would have to take a man largely representative of the majority?—Yes.

7667. Eventually, as this process went on, as the share of the educated Indian element in your Executive Council in all subjects increased, the time would come when we would get near the realisation of responsible Government mentioned in the pronouncement?—Yes.

7668. You say this involves the disappearance of the Grand Committee and the elimination of the official element from the superior Executive, and you say this is inconsistent with the two fundamental principles referred to in Answer 1, the maintenance of India as an integral part of the British Empire and the administration of the Government for the benefit of all our fellow-subjects in India. Can you have the realisation of responsible Government and keep the Grand Committee and the official element in the superior Executive?—I contemplate a responsible Government with those two provisos adequately safeguarded, that is to say the maintenance of India as an integral part of the British Empire and the administration of the Government of India for the benefit of all our fellow subjects in India. Those are fundamental principles which any system of responsible Government must provide for.

7669. I agree with you. We are completely at one on that matter. But can you have responsible Government if a Grand Committee device is necessary, with the weighting of the non-official element by the introduction of an official element so as to secure a decision favourable against the wishes of the Legislative Council? Is that consistent with the realisation of responsible Government?—No, I think not.

7670. Is it consistent with the realisation of responsible Government to have an official element in the supreme Government?—Yes, for this reason, that you will have many interests and influences in your Province which are incapable of being represented in the Council. You will have your depressed classes, military classes in some provinces, and large British interests, commercial interests which may not have representation at all or adequate representation in the Council, and the only way of securing that those interests shall make themselves heard, as well as the interests of the Public Services, which are a very important factor in the administration, is to retain an official member in your superior Executive. That is how it strikes me.

7671. Would your official element in the superior Executive then be in the Executive as officials, or as the representatives of certain classes who could get no other representative?—He would probably have so many interests to represent that he would represent them best as an official.

7672. So long as he represented them as an official you would not have responsible Government?—No, because at present I cannot visualise the time when the conditions in India will allow of full responsible Government.

7673. What you mean by supporting the pronouncement is that you will get as near to it as you can, but you do not think you will ever get to it?—I hope that we shall, if the conditions of the announcement can be created, but I do not think we can assume we will get to it within, say, this generation.

7674. Why do you despair of the educated classes ever becoming representative of the depressed classes?—Partly owing to historical reasons, to caste differences, and the whole caste organisation, which in India tends to make a man a very admirable and worthy member of his own particular caste, and makes him apt to disregard anything outside his caste.

7675. You yourself promoted the Compulsory Education Bill for the Punjab, did you not?—That was a Government measure.

7676. And one of the effects of that Bill will be in time to increase the educated classes in the Punjab?—Yes, as regards primary education only.

7677. And under its provisions some of the depressed classes will become educated, I presume?—Yes, if we can secure their admission to the public schools, which is a matter of great difficulty at present. Even among our lower castes the fact that you admit certain castes into their schools tends to empty those schools. That is so, even in the Punjab, in which caste is much less powerful than in other parts of India. However, the Government or local bodies will be able to provide separate schools.

7678. Eventually, as you extend the Franchise in the Punjab, the depressed classes will have votes?—Yes, some of them.

7679. And the educated man who is in the Punjab Legislative Council by reason of the franchise of his constituents will find it necessary to attend to their wants, or he would run the risk of getting turned out?—Yes, that is so in theory; but what we have seen in practice in municipal and other elections of the way in which votes are given and the considerations which influence the voter, does not give one any very strong hope that the votes will be given for public reasons.

7680. Then why do you want the realisation of responsible government? What is the use of it if votes are not going to be given for a real purpose?—Well, to use the words which you and Lord Chelmsford used in the Report, "because of the faith that is in us."

7681. But is the faith in you?—It is; but I do not shut my eyes to the facts.

7682. No; I quite agree. They are stated in the Report. I was only wondering why you found that it was impossible to look forward to a time when the depressed classes would be represented by others than officials in the superior Executive?—I think even for a generation when a member of the depressed classes comes into a polling booth in almost any part of India, the tendency will be to say "Oh, he is a Chuhra (scavenger); he has got no business here." It will be more or less the same position as the negros are in in some of the Southern American States.

7683. You said that one of the difficulties in establishing this form of government in India was that there was no community of race, religion, and language. You quoted that from the Montagu-Chelmsford Report. Would you challenge the statement that even though you cannot produce community of race, religion or of language, you can produce unity between races, religions and languages by setting them to do common work in the development of their country?—All recent experience shows that centrifugal tendencies are much stronger than the centripetal in those conditions—the Austro-Hungarian Empire, Turkish Empire and various political organisations of the sort.

7684. There was no community of race, religion or language historically in Canada, was there?—No; but you had only two lines of cleavage, the French and the British.

7685. You had no community of race, religion and language in South Africa?—There, too, you had only two lines of cleavage, and you had a common civilisations—a common standard of civilisation and a fairly high standard of intelligence.

7686. But you did not delay responsible government until you could have unity of race, religion and language in those places?—No; but I suppose you get what is another condition laid down in the Montagu-Chelmsford Report, you get representation on a national basis, on which alone it said a system of responsible government can possibly be rooted.

7687. But the Bill we are now discussing is not complete responsible government, because it is admitted there is not that representation?—In those countries I do not suppose your hands are tied by communal representation, which is found indispensable in India.

7688. Quite true—there is no real analogy—but I wished to know how far you wish to drive your argument that a community of race, religion, and language was necessary for responsible government. Similarly you dwelt on the great difficulty, which is I think obvious, in getting adequate representation in the new Legislative Councils?—Yes.

7689. And it was with a view, which does not commend itself to you, to meet that that this expedient of reserved subjects, temporarily reserved subjects, was adopted. When this was discussed among your Governments I understand there were five heads of Governments present?—Seven last January; five who agreed to what is known as the Majority Report and two who did not agree.

7690. Now the Lieutenant-Governor of the United Provinces had a scheme of his own, or rather a scheme of a Committee of his own, which is published, which had transferred and reserved subjects?—I am not sure about its having transferred and reserved subjects. I cannot remember the scheme, but I understand it was very close to the scheme we put forward; in fact, the thing which astonished us when we came together was to find that, working separately, we had all attacked the dual scheme on the same grounds and arrived at almost the same conclusions.

7691. I presume you had reached more or less of a compromise?—We were astonished to find when we came together and compared the official replies we had given, in different Provinces and under different circumstances, that we had arrived at almost exactly the same conclusons.

7692. I do not say this with a view to controversy, because one has not any right to challenge a difference of view after consideration; but there was a time when most of you had accepted a form of duality far more marked than the one in the Bill?—I do not think I was ever a personally assenting party. I think there was a preliminary period provided for.

7693. Did not you assent to that thing which was agreed to in Delhi?—I made reservations with regard to the Punjab on the lines of this Memorandum of the 10th January, 1918, and said until assurances were given as regards essential legislation and essential finance I could not see my way to agree to an elective majority.

7694. I think that is right, but did not you at one time feel that duality was inevitable? Did you ever feel that duality was inevitable if you were to carry out the pronouncement?—I thought after the Montagu Chelmsford report appeared it was inevitable till I began to consider how it would work in practice, and I started last year to try and work it out in practice, and I found the difficulties were so enormous that I ventured to put forward in an official reply to the Punjab Government the alternative scheme, which is more or less on the lines of the Majority Report.

7695. Now I come to one or two questions about your own scheme. Let us assume that you have got your Executive. It consists of two officials, an Indian non-official from the Legislative Council and another Indian, not necessarily from the Legislative Council. That is four of them. As a matter of fact in the Punjab, if you were now Lieutenant-Governor, you would not give the portfolio of Law and Justice or the portfolio of Land Revenue immediately to the Indian gentlemen who came from the Legislative Council?

Mr. Montagu—continued.

Council?—Not perhaps Land Revenue. That is a very technical subject, but I do not see why the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab should not give the portfolio of Law and Justice to an Indian member. That is more or less a straightforward matter.

7696. You think you might in practice?—I think so.

7697. But you think you would not in the case of Land Revenue?—It depends on the man. It is a very technical subject, and has a very long history. It would be very difficult to find a man, a non-official, coming into the Council who would be acquainted with the history of the administration of land revenue in the Punjab.

7698. You have told us that in all probability the members of the Legislative Council would belong to the educated classes?—Yes.

7699. And you have told the Committee that at present the failure of the educated classes was to represent the agricultural interests of the country?—Yes.

7700. Land revenue is one of their most vital interests?—Yes.

7701. Therefore is not it likely that the portfolio would be given to him?—Yes, because he would require a much longer administrative training to be capable of dealing with it.

7702. Education you might give him?—Yes.

7703. And when you begin to discuss in your Executive Council various projects, you would do your best to agree with the wishes of the man who was in charge of a particular portfolio?—Yes.

7704. In other words, therefore, you would be likely to defer to the member who was in charge of land revenue or land revenue matters, and to your education member in education matters?—Yes.

7705. In other words, you would work it unconsciously and very much against your will (because I am sure you would not like to use such a horrible vocabulary), as if there were transferred and reserved subjects?—Yes, but you always have the saving grace of collective responsibility.

7706. I am coming to that. In practice there must be this present stage, something approximating to the treatment of subjects as though they were transferred or reserved. You now are anxious to preserve a collective responsibility. In answer to Lord Sinha you said, I think, that probably the member of your Executive Council who was chosen from the Legislative Council would resign if he were not in harmony in his decision with the Legislative Council?—The Governor, I said, should be in a position to enforce his resignation. The Government of India on that particular point says that the probability is that the Ministers will be rather inclined to defer too little to the views of the Legislative Council than too much, and therefore it is necessary that the Governor, if he thinks it necessary, when the Minister is not in accord with the majority in the Council, should be in a position to enforce his resignation, but the discretion is left with the Governor.

7707. I do not want to misunderstand you. I think it is true to say that you said that there would come occasions when the members of the Executive Council who were members of the Legislative Council would have to resign, but the official members would not?—Yes.

7708. Now they are all collectively responsible, because that is the thing to which you attach importance. Is it fair, when they all share the responsibility, that some of those who have the responsibility should go and the others should remain?—The man chosen from the Legislative Council has, in a way double responsibility. He is responsible to the Council as well as to the Government. That is one element of duality which you cannot avoid.

7709. There must be duality?—It is one of the elements of duality which you cannot avoid. We hope to reconcile them both in a common purpose.

7710. I have only one further question. You said one of the difficulties of this scheme, as re-stated by Lord Islington, was that in the last resort the Ministers would know that the decision rested with them, and therefore they would not be in such a compromising mood as they would be if there was collective responsibility. In the last resort the decision must rest with someone: whom would you suggest it should rest with?—According to the constitution of the Executive Council, it goes by the majority. The Governor has power in certain cases to over-ride his Council in cases of emergency. I should think that analogy might well be followed.

7711. Therefore you would have it in the last resort, that it would always rest with the Governor?—Yes, if he cared to exercise the power of over-riding his Council which the law gives him. But, failing that, it would rest with the majority of the Government.

7712. If it rests with the majority of the Government, must not you take steps always to see that non-officials and officials are equal in number?—Not necessarily. That is to say in a cabinet of three, which was one of the suggestions I put forward, you would have your Governor; he would have an official colleague and two non-official Ministers. That would be two and two, but the Governor, of course, would have the power of veto. He would have an extra vote as he has at present. The Governor at present has a vote as a member of the Council, and he has also a casting vote in case of an equality of votes.

7713. Therefore you must either do it through the Governor or by some alternative means, and you attach importance to equality between the two halves?—Yes. I hope it will be possible to dispense with it as matters develop.

7714. As matters develop, and as you increase the number of the non-official members, you give the decision in the last resort to the non-official members?—Yes, but that stage would only be reached in accordance with the words of the pronouncement of the British Government: "They have decided that substantial steps in this direction should be taken as soon as possible. Progress in this policy can only be achieved by successive stages. The British Government and the Government of India, on whom the responsibility lies for the welfare and advancement of the Indian peoples must be judges of the time and measure of each advance." Therefore I say that an advance would not come till the British Government and the Government of India have satisfied themselves. When they have, then I think the change should come, but my point is the change would not come till the matter had been investigated and the British Government is satisfied that the conditions justify it.

7715. In order to get the co-operation of the educated classes with the Government, with one part of the Government, which, in your experience, has been lacking to the full in the past; in order to get an understanding between the educated classes and the voter in the rural districts, which in your experience you said has been lacking in the past; in order to get the voter to exercise his franchise, which in your experience of municipal authorities, you say has been lacking in the past, are you to wait till you believe all these will happen? Are you to test it by experience?—Test it by experience.

7716. Can you do that?—I think we are testing it by experience, by creating these wide electorates, by providing for the elective majority in every province, by giving that elective majority a dominant voice in legislation and in finance, subject to necessary safeguards, and by introducing an Indian element into the Government in every province. It must be remembered that at present the Indian element is non-existent in the actual Government in four out of eight provinces concerned. In the remaining four provinces it is only a very small element. Now it is proposed to establish an equal Indian element in all the eight provinces. I think those are all very substantial steps, which are a guarantee of our adherence to the line of policy which has been traced out in the announcement.

(After a short adjournment.)

Lord Brodrick (Viscount Midleton).

7717. Sir Michael, you are very anxious to avoid duality in the Government?—Yes.

7718. And you said you thought it was better to give the elective Legislative Council a partial control of the whole Government rather than the whole control of any part of the Government?—Yes.

7719. To what extent do you think that the exercise by the Governor of his power of overruling the elective Assembly would create friction?—I think that when it is recognised that that power is a necessary adjunct of an imperfect representative system, it should not give rise to any friction. If it is recognised as a regular constitutional machinery, to be used for safeguarding the administration in this transitional period it should not create any friction at all, and that is why I suggested that this power should be exercised, not by the Governor, but by the Governor and his Council, for the reason that in that Council Indian opinion would be fully represented.

7720. What are the subjects on which you, the Legislative Council, having what you call a partial control of the whole Government, would think it would be most likely that the Governor would have to exercise his veto or his powers?—It is very difficult to forecast. Take the subject of education, which is marked down generally for transfer, you might have educational enthusiasm carried to such a pitch as regards compulsory attendance at school as to create serious administrative difficulties. That illustration was put forward by the Bombay Government; they said, for instance, that it might lead to serious opposition among the rural classes if their children were taken away from them during the harvest time, or it might lead to rioting among the mill hands if their children, earning good wages for them in the Bombay mills, were taken away from them for many years; so that even with a subject like education, on which opinion is in principle agreed, you might have in practice very serious administrative difficulties arising affecting public order.

7721. Do you think the exercise of the veto in a subject of that kind would create any very great popular feeling?—I think not.

7772. Supposing you had a measure like the Rowlatt Bill, which had to be carried or not carried by the Legislative Council, and then the Governor had to take his action, would the friction created by that be of the same character or would it create more popular feeling?—That would probably create more popular feeling, because it lends itself, as the Rowlatt Bill lent itself, more easily to misrepresentation and agitation.

7723. You think it desirable in framing this new constitution that we should avoid those occasions of friction as far as possible?—Yes.

7724. Would it be possible, in your view, if the Montagu-Chelmsford proposals were not before us at all, to frame certain subjects which would be obviously the function of the supreme Government, leaving all other subjects to the popular Assembly?—I think, under Indian conditions, it would be difficult to frame subjects, because critical occasions might arise on even the most simple subject, and I cannot suggest any better definition than that already embodied in Section 50 of the Government of India Act where the peace, tranquillity or interests of the Province, or any part thereof, are essentially affected. It might be affected by any subject. Take a matter which does often arise now, the matter of vaccination; compulsory vaccination is axiomatic in this country. Compulsory vaccination is at present in its infancy in rural India; it has been accepted in various municipalities and strongly opposed in various others. If you attempted to impose compulsory vaccination in rural areas you might have an all-round rising in the present state of public feeling, owing to ignorance, and the fact that compulsory vaccination would be seized on to misrepresent the intentions of the Government. It would be said that the Government were getting all the children together in order to break their caste or to use them for a bridge, or some other cock and bull story of that kind, and those misrepresentations are readily swallowed by the ignorant population.

7725. Were you apprehensive that that sort of question might be unduly pressed by the Legislative Assembly, or were you thinking of its being done by higher authority?—Even if the Legislative Assembly in their enthusiasm for public health were to press that measure, it would lend itself to the same kind of misrepresentation among the populace and would raise a certain amount of genuine opposition and a certain amount of factitious opposition.

7726. I want to make my question quite clear. There is a large class of subjects such as you have mentioned, for instance vaccination, which might be left to the Legislative Assembly, and it is only in extreme cases that the Governor would have to exercise his veto?—Yes.

7727. Is there, in your opinion, any class of subjects in which in all cases and in all events the Governor would probably have to interfere to get his way? Take the question of public order?—Those are the questions in which the Governor's interference would have to be most frequent.

7728. Questions of discrimination of taxation?—That would be another, and questions involving racial and sectarian questions would also be among the number.

7729. Would you have been prepared, if you had had to draw it up, to draw up a short schedule of questions which under no circumstances would you at present put in the hands of the Legislative Council?—No, because in the whole of the field of administration I think the advice and influence of the Legislative Council is a help and to a large extent a guidance to the Government. I would exclude none except political relations; I would exclude none of the subjects a Government deals with from their purview, but I would retain the right of the Governor in Council to override their views in the wider interests which are laid down in the Government of India Act.

7730. Take finance, are you aware of the position with regard to the Consolidated Fund in the Houses of Parliament? Do you know that there are certain classes of Votes which I believe I am right in saying the House of Commons cannot touch—they cannot challenge?—I think it is provided in the Bill that those should be subjects with which the Legislative Council would not deal in dealing with finance. That would be one matter—the monetary obligations of the Provincial Government.

7731. There is therefore ample precedent for withdrawing certain things from the popular assembly?—That would be one. Another would be certain matters connected with the All-India Service, which, I think, it is proposed should be regulated by the Secretary of State and which the Provincial Governments would have no power to alter or amend. That is another class of subjects which might be removed from the purview of the Legislative Council.

7732. How do you propose, either under your scheme or under the scheme of the Bill, to work finance? Would you have in each Province a Finance Minister?—Yes, one of the members of the Council; finance would be one of the portfolios.

7733. It would be a portfolio by itself?—Not necessarily—it would depend on the number of members of the Council, but at present it is not a separate portfolio, I gather, in the Provinces where Council government exists.

7734. When you come to Ministers holding different portfolios, under the system suggested in the Memorandum of the Lieutenant-Governors, or under the system of the Bill, is it not necessary to have one man who should be a check on all parties with regard to finance?—I think it is very desirable in the interests of economy and general administration that there should be only one financial adviser.

7735. There is some view in this country that the Treasury has deteriorated since it became a spending Department. Is it not well that you should have one man whose duty it is to point out the difficulties of all expenditure to all Departments and have a perfectly free hand in recommending the provision of funds?—Yes, I have found that myself in administration.

7736. If that be so, would you propose that he should be one of the elected members, or one of the nominated, or one of the Executive Council?—I think he ought to be a member of the Executive Council. The responsibility is so great that you want considerable authority behind him, and it requires wide administrative experience, and those qualities are most likely to be found in a member of the Executive Council.

7737. Up to the present, I suppose, you yourself as Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab were the chief authority on finance?—Yes. We had a Financial Secretary, by whose advice I was guided, and we had very inquisitorial Government of India financial authorities in the provinces.

7738. But in deciding how the money should be spent each year the Lieutenant-Governor was surely the head?—Yes, but as regards all new expenditure he was guided by the advice of a Finance Committee of the Council, half of which was elected by the non-official members.

7739. It is quite clear that if either of these schemes is adopted, either yours or that of the Bill, the Governor would have to exercise his right of veto or his other powers from time to time. Is it not desirable that he should be in the position rather of an umpire?—Yes; in fact, even at present, the Governor is very often in the position of an umpire between the conflicting claims of separate Departments. The Police Department wants ten lakhs extra for police buildings or for raising the pay of the police, or the Education Department wants twenty lakhs to give a grant in aid to local bodies to start more schools, and the Governor in the last resort must decide as to the apportionment, so that he is accustomed to exercise those functions of arbitrating between conflicting claims.

7740. Let us follow out the new system. In either case—take the case you suggested yourself of the very undue and too rapid extension of compulsory education. First of all, I suppose, there would be a discussion in the Governor's Council as to the desirability of bringing forward a Bill in that form, would there not?—Under the present scheme.

7741. Assuming it is proposed by the Ministers to make a very considerable advance—a too drastic advance, as you suggested—there would be first a discussion in the Governor's Executive Council?—I do not think that necessarily follows. I think it is desirable that there should be, but the relations between the Ministers and the Executive Council have been so differently defined at various stages of the proposals that I really do not know what is contemplated. According to the last despatch of the Government of India they desire to build as big a wall as possible between the two branches of the Government, but my own view is that in the event of a matter of wide public importance like that, a common discussion would certainly be desirable.

7742. Before the Bill is drawn the question is discussed in the Cabinet: Do you not think it desirable that the Ministers should have a full discussion, with full advice, about the objections to their proposals before they put them in the form of a Bill?—I think that is essentially desirable.

7743. The next step would be, would it not, that they introduce their Bill and it is discussed in the Legislative Council, and there those members of the Governor's Executive Council who were opposed to it would make their case, would they not?—I think it is understood that it is the intention that in the Legislative Council each half of the Government must refrain from opposition to the other half: one half of the Government may influence the other half or attempt to convert it to its views at an earlier stage, but once the matter comes before the Council the words of the Government of India Bill are that a convention must be established by which either side must refrain from opposition to the other side. More than that they say that it is impossible to insist upon. I think it would be a distinct breach of etiquette if the two halves of the Provincial Government were not only to be fighting amongst themselves in their joint deliberations, but to be fighting their battles in the open. in the Council.

7744. But surely we must consider the possibility of the adoption of the other course—that the responsibility should be laid on the Ministers for what they themselves are going to propose; otherwise supposing the Governor says to them, "I wish to put forward this Bill; it is going to cost you twice as much as we appear to have the possibility of raising," should not some official state the view of the Legislative Council so that they may be seized with that view?—I think that under the scheme it is contemplated (I do not give my view the one way or the other) that that matter should be thrashed out before the Bill is framed, and that the Bill would only be framed when the two halves of the Government—or the Governor as the final authority—had decided that the measure was one which ought to be proceeded with, and when the Governor had arrived at that decision the official half of the Government could not express its disapproval of the measure. I think that is what is contemplated, and on the whole if you have a dual system I do not see that you can have less than that.

7745. You do not put any responsibility on the Ministers in that case?—That is one of the objections I have to the dual system.

7746. Mr. Montagu asked you just now whether it was fair to ask the Ministers to resign on a divided responsibility—that is to say, on a matter on which the other members of the Executive Council would not resign?—Yes.

7747. I put it to you, is not the way out of that to give the Ministers on all subjects which have been committed to them—transferred, or whatever you like to call it— the responsibility of introducing the measures for which they are going to stand advocates?—Yes, I think that is a natural enough consequence of the dual system. It is complicated, of course, by the fact that in your Government and in your Legislative Council you have a considerable official element, and also by the fact that owing to the communal system, which is the basis of your Legislative Council, you can hardly ever get a clear issue upon matters of policy. Those are limitations due to the dual scheme.

7748. Whether there should be a division between the two sides of the Government or not, ought there not to be some machinery for warning the Legislative Council of the danger of the course on which they are entering?—With reference to a Legislative measure?

7749. What machinery do you propose in the case of an extreme measure which the Governor may subsequently have to veto for the Legislative Council being seized of the whole of the arguments against it under your plan?—Under the plan of collective responsibility I do not thnk the danger would be likely to arise, Under the dual system I think the danger would arise.

7750. In that case, surely, that means that the Ministers would be overruled early in the day before they were able to put forward anything which the Governor may find necessary in the end to veto?—Yes. the question of policy would be thrashed out before the measure was framed, as I suppose it is done under the British Cabinet system.

7751. The cases where objection is likely to arise, or may arise, would be rather from the point of view of action taken by th Legislative Council in refusing legislation which the Governor considers necessary, or in refusing the supply which he deems necessary for carrying out public works?—Yes; other sources of friction would be cut off at the source, or be likely to be cut off at the source.

7752. Do you think it preferable cutting it off at the source rather than letting Ministers have the opportunity in fact to be masters in their own house, even if it is a limited house?—Yes, I think it is better at the present stage of development of representative institutions and the present stage of administrative experience.

7753. I understood you just now to say (going now to another point) that you think it is desirable to have a Finance Minister, seeing that the Governor, who may, so to speak, be the final authority on these questions, in the end may have to over-rule the Legislative Council on finance?—Yes.

7754. He should not enter into the battle but come there as an umpire?—Yes.

7755. There is a great change in his present position. At present he is constantly voting in his own Council. and has not got to take the responsibility of over-ruling a popular Assembly?—Yes, I cannot speak with reference to Council Government, because hitherto I have not had the advantage of a Council in the Punjab.

7756. I should like to ask you one question about the electorate. You said that in your case there is a great deal of talk—I have not got the actual words—with regard to the Ministers' responsibility, and very little about the responsibility of the electorate. Now, apart from the justice or injustice of the form of representation proposed, would you think that members elected on a communal basis would have a larger feeling of responsibility to their electorate than members elected on another basis?—Members elected from a common electorate, I think, will tend to look primarily to their electorate, and not to the general public. They draw their authority from a communal source and that must inevitably colour their views.

7757. You think there would be a higher sense of responsibility in that case?—A higher sense of responsibility, probably, but of a narrower character.

7758. On a narrower basis?—On a narrower basis.

7759. And therefore when you came to have a division, to use the House of Commons expression, there would be not so many members who were entirely at the mercy of the Whips, but there would be more men voting according to the views of their constituents?—Yes. The Whips in fact, I think in the first stages, as far as I contemplate them, would be communal Whips; the line of division would be inevitably communal in Provinces where various religions are strongly represented.

7760. One more question. Does your experience of municipal government in the towns incline you to think that popularly-elected bodies are economical?—I think it inclines me to the belief that popularly-elected bodies are economical with funds which they are to derive from their own areas, but are very wasteful with funds which are put at their disposal by another authority; that is to say, they are inclined to get all they can out of Government and to raise as little as they can from their own municipalities. They are very slow to impose new taxation, however necessary, because that is invariably unpopular.

7761. I gather from your evidence that you have generally the fear that the rural districts will suffer, the urban being so much better organised under the popular system. Is that so?—That is so.

7762. You think the Governor, if he is to interfere, will find that it will be on behalf of the rural areas?—Yes, because although they preponderate in numbers by nine to one, and also in wealth, in the aggregate they are badly organised, they have little interest, as is said in the Reforms Reports, in political matters, and they have at present very few people to voice their interests. They have very little voice in the Press, and working in the country they are not able to assemble on the platform.

7763. You have said more than once, I think, that from the educational standpoint the effect of this franchise will not be developed for a generation or two; what period would you say that the rural areas were behind the urban in that respect?—I should think literacy is probably three times as high in the Punjab in urban areas as in rural areas; that is to say, assuming that the total in the Punjab is one in twenty-seven as literates by the census of 1911 you may take it that it is one in ten in towns and one in thirty in the rural areas who are literate. That was in 1911. So that literacy was then thrice as high in the urban areas as compared with rural areas.

7764. If we made reasonable progress, would you expect the rural areas in ten or twenty years time to be what the urban area is now in point of education?—Possibly. I would prefer to say in a generation.

Sir Henry Craik.

7765. Sir Michael, you express yourself as in cordial sympathy with the general aims of the Declaration of August, 1917?—That is so.

7766. You find yourself prepared to agree and to cordially welcome the gradual establishment of responsible government, or anything which would lead towards responsible government in India?—Yes.

7767. Of course, as a member of the Civil Service, and long acquainted with it, you know the value of its work and the essential necessity for very high and strict rules of efficiency being applied to the administration of our Indian Empire?—Yes.

7768. But you do not feel it inconsistent to admit that you would sacrifice a certain amount of that efficiency in order to attain the end of responsible government as soon as you think it could safely be attained?—I think some sacrifice of efficiency must be admitted in order to secure the end in view.

7769. Then you do not feel that you are placed upon that dilemma which Mr. Montagu placed you upon, that if you thought this thoroughly efficient and there were certain dangers to be faced in moving forward, you were by that precluded from wishing that responsible government should some day or another be attained in India. You did not feel yourself shut out from that?—In no way.

7770. In fact you said, to use your own words, that you supported the wish to attain responsible government, owing to the faith which is in you, and free government where it is possible to obtain it?—Yes.

7771. That is a faith which I hope is in all of us, but you, like all of us, think there must be a balance to be struck by common sense between the attainment of this end and the amount of danger that you will incur in achieving it?—Yes, and it was in reference to that danger I dwelt with such insistance upon the necessity of association.

7772. I will come presently to the way of working it out, but I want first to see where we are with regard to the general aims. You cordially profess your sympathy with the aims of this Declaration of 1917, and you do not think that you are at all precluded from that sympathy by seeing the necessity for certain caution, because you realise that there are dangers?—That is so.

7773. As to these dangers, I would like to get a little closer to them. There is the necessary fear that a large number of officers who will now be drawn into the administration under the new system will lack the experience which has been hitherto employed?—Yes.

7774. You can support that, I suppose?—Yes; which they necessarily lack from want of administrative training.

7775. I want to ask you another question, as an old administrator in India. Comparing the Indian with the English administrator, do you find so far as they have been tried that there is any lack of initiative in the Indian?—I think the British character, as compared with most others, generally shows more spirit of initiative and enterprise.

7776. I want to get down rather to particulars. In your experience, have you found that where responsibility was thrown sometimes upon the natives, they rather declined it, and pushed it off upon their English administrators?—Yes; that, I think, is generally admitted. The refusal to accept, or the hesitation to accept responsibility may be due to more than one cause. It may be due largely to the communal divisions. An Indian acting in a particular way if he is a Hindoo, runs the risk of being assailed by the Mohammedans; if he is a Mohammedan he runs the risk of being assailed by the Hindoos, as having been actuated by sectarian reasons. The European has the advantage of not being assailable in that particular respect.

7777. I want to ask about another point which I am forced to touch upon. In your experience as an administrator have you found that the system of bribery entered largely amongst the lower ranks of the Indians?—Bribery, I think, is more common in all Eastern countries than in Western countries, and is more common from the fact that public opinion does not condemn it in the same way as it does in Western countries. In the Punjab we had a tremendous campaign against bribery in all ranks of the service during the last three or four years I was in office there, and it was the most difficult——

7778. In all ranks of the service? Are you speaking both of the English and the Indian?—I will call it the provincial service. We had one case in which an European magistrate—an Anglo-Indian magistrate—was concerned.

7779. And, of course, he was deprived of his position?—We succeeded in prosecuting several cases, including his, to conviction, but it was very difficult to get any real public opinion on the side of the Government in prosecuting these cases; in fact, in one case where after great difficulty we succeded in bringing home the guilt, in a very notorious case of an official of the Irrigation Department, a memorial signed by some of the most important men in the Provinces, members of the Legislative Council, of the Imperial Council and the Provincial Council, was presented to the Government, asking that this man should be let off altogether, not because he was innocent, not because he had a big family or anything of that kind, but simply because he belonged to a respectable family. That is why it is so necessary to retain a strong European element in the administration, because it is that alone which tends to secure the principle of the equality of all men before the law. That is a most difficult principle to translate into practice in India; it is admitted in theory as one of the greatest boons

we have conferred upon India, but when you come to translate it into practice you find the most appalling difficulties.

7780. It is the case, is it not, that the English officials do find themselves often thwarted by the impossibility of getting directly into touch with some of the lower classes, who can approach them only by means of some douceur given to, or favouritism shown by, an intermediary?—That is the case; the corrupt lictor is as prevalent in Oriental countries as he was in ancient Rome.

7781. And all the efforts of your officials sometimes cannot break down and get directly to the real difficulty, because there are intermediaries who have not been properly squared?—It is difficult when you are sitting in your office for these people to find access, perhaps, unless they open the door with a silver key, but the ordinary official has no difficulty when he moves about and goes down into his town or goes round the district in getting into contact with all classes. In his office at headquarters he may often find that some barrier of the kind you suggest does exist.

7782. May I put an instance within my own experience, and ask if you think it possible that such a thing could occur where an officer thought he had found out some bribery on one of his visits in connection with land settlement, and insisted that the parties concerned should be brought directly to him. He went back the next year and a petition was presented to him from these parties, asking that he should not interfere in that way again, that they had made the arrangement, but that their life had been made very uncomfortable since?—Yes, I can quite conceive that a case like that would arise.

7783. That is one of the dangers which, without hindering the natural inspirations for popular government, make you think that necessary caution must be used in the development of it?—Yes.

7784. Now I go further. I next touch this question. This responsible government must rest upon a franchise, voting for the representation necessary. I have read all your notes and also your Memorandum previously, and my recollection is, without referring to the particulars, that you say in the Punjab the rural population is as 10 to 1?—9 to 1.

7785. It is 9 out of every 10, so that I am not far wrong. Out of that number you say that 1 man in every 110, I think, will have a vote?—I think so.

7786. And out of that very small percentage, less than one per cent., eighty per cent. will be illiterate?—Yes. That is the calculation I make. It is based upon this fact, that only 1 in 10 of the males over 20 is at present literate, and I am taking it that as our electorate will be in a way drawn from the better classes, literacy will be more prevalent amongst them, so I have doubled the actual average of males over 20, and I think that is a liberal estimate.

7787. One-fifth of less than one per cent. will be the number of literate voters?—I think that is a liberal estimate.

7788. That makes, of course, the franchise representation, so far as that branch of the calculation is concerned, a very flimsy one?—Yes; and it was in view of that slender foundation that I thought we were building up too large an edifice of responsibility—a larger edifice than our foundations would support.

7789. You think that this difference between the town and country population is the widest and most important distinction that you have experienced, looking over the whole expanse of India?—I can only speak with direct knowledge of my own Province, and I should say in the Punjab it was the governing or the most dominant factor, and I think it is a more healthy line of cleavage than the communal or racial one, because it is based on the diversity of interests.

7790. When you compare it with the Western model it will also have this very serious defect, that almost admittedly it must to a large extent depend upon a communal representation; you cannot get quit of it?—No.

7791. Which, of course, to our idea, is essentially opposed to anything like what we call real ordinary representation?—Yes. We have had communal representation in some of our municipalities during the last twenty years; it was forced on us then rather reluctantly, and we have found it impossible to get rid of it up to the present. The communities concerned show no disposition to discard it.

7792. Of course, I am not saying anything, and I do not myself argue in the least against communal representation; I think it is necessary, but still I want to point out that it is alien to our Western ideas?—Yes.

7793. There is another class which would require representation, and that is the labouring part of the population. We have had some witnesses before us who professed to represent the views of the labouring classes in Bombay, Mr. Tilak and Mr. Wadia. Now, do you think that that class do represent the labouring classes really?—I should not have had any certain views on the matter if I had not seen in the last Indian Mail the report of a meeting at Bombay of the mill hands in which they repudiate Messrs. Tilak and Wadia as being entitled to represent them either in dealing with the Labour Party in England or at the approaching Labour Conference in America, and they end up by asking the Viceroy to nominate a genuine Labour representative to represent them.

7794. I do not think we have anything to do with that, but at all events it is only a proof that there may be doubts as to whether the educated classes of the extreme Reformers do represent as much as they claim to represent the view of the labour classes?—Yes, the views of the labour classes at present in India are very indefinite. If there is any one place in which they are capable of forming a view it is Bombay, which has far the largest labour population of any part of India, the number being about 200,000. In the Punjab it is a very small thing.

7795. I have gone through these general points just to explain that consistently with your real and honest desire, which we all have owing to the faith that is in you and in all of us, for the encouragement of popular institutions you feel the necessity for very great caution. Now I come to the next point, that is the machinery, and this question of the dual government. You, as I take it, see the chief objection to dual government in the fact that the separation of subjects you think is an untoward and inexpedient method of procedure?—Yes, it is an arbitrary demarcation.

7796. But that separation of subjects will at the very start draw a line between what is called the popular and what is called the official branch of the Government?—Exactly, and thereby tend to create rivalry and friction.

7797. You see no necessity why there should not be an equal responsibility given to the popular side by simply assigning as far as you thought possible from time to time and to the very utmost extent you could, a responsibility and a charge over certain subjects, not taculated subjects at all, but any subject you thought they were possibly fit for, to that popular side?—As members of the Executive Council?

7798. Yes?—No.

7799. You would make no distinction between the Ministers and the Executive; they would be all equal, but under your scheme there might be a greater amount of responsibility and charge assigned to what we call the popular element than there would be under the system of the dual government?—Yes; subject to the collective responsibility of the Government, I think it might be very interesting as an experiment to allow certain Departments to remain in the hands of your non-official Minister or member chosen from the Legislative Department for a considerable time, or one succeeding another, say for ten years, or until the first Statutory Commission came round.

7800. You would hope to develop that as rapidly as was found possible?—Yes.

7801. And that would be following the traditions and the whole arrangement and spirit of our Cabinet here?—Yes.

7802. For instance, we will take it that the Cabinet is more or less a Coalition Cabinet. We know that there are very wide divergencies of opinion between the Labour Party and the party to which I belong myself—the Unionists. There are certain elements in the Coalition Government which represent the Labour Party

Party and certain elements which represent the Unionists, and as long as they form a Coalition Government they must agree to follow a general policy united on all essential points, although it is quite recognised that there are wide divergencies of opinion on many points between them. That is the analogy you want to follow. On the other hand, is there any analogy in history or in existing constitutions for anything like this dualism or diarchy as it is called?—No, there certainly is no analogy in any Eastern country I know of, and I looked hard to find if there was any analogy among the Governments of native States.

7803. Is there any analogy in Western lands?—I do not know of any, and the nearest analogy I could find to this was the old system of the Government of India between the Army Department of the Government of India and the Military Department, and the system was gone into and repudiated as far back as 1905. Perhaps if I quoted Lord Roberts' views on the working of dualism in the Government of India it might have some bearing on the point. Writing in 1889 on dualism in the Army Department of the Government of India Lord Roberts said: "Here are two sets of officers of high capacity, animated by a common zeal, guided by a common sense of duty, and each striving to do their best for the Government they serve and the Army to which they belong—yet each set appears to be pulling a different way and to be actuated by a jealous rivalry rather than by a friendly emulation. If Army administration is to be a success the Staff at the Army Headquarters and the Military Secretariat must work together in unison and must possess a common knowledge of the questions in which they are mutually concerned."

7804. That is supposing the dual system is carried out, but, setting aside the dual system altogether, you yourself would prefer a common purse for the Province if it were possible?—Yes, setting aside the dual system.

7805. If the dual system exists, does it not necessarily involve, if you are to bring home financial responsibility to each side of the Government, a separate purse?—Certainly, that is a logical consequence of the dual system; taxation must be the vehicle or the instrument of Government, and those responsible for policy must be responsible for taxation.

7806. I want to get hold of this, because it has puzzled me. I find constantly a reference to the fact that certain revenues will be assigned and that a certain surplus which exists will be assigned in certain proportions, and that so long as that surplus exists and the portions are assigned there can be no great reason for contention or for division. That surplus arises from the fact that by your financial administration in India, if you have a surplus at the end of the year you carry it over and you form a reserve fund?—Yes, we are in the happy position of having no funded debt to avoid.

7807. You know that would not be contemplated, and would be considered absolutely unconstitutional under our financial system here. No Government would be allowed to accumulate a reserve which might, more or less, make it independent of the voting in a particular year. If you have free financial responsibility, surely the first thing which would be done is that you must make the voted revenues of each year apply to that year and not to any future year. We must begin with a tabula rasa, and we must begin each year to vote what we consider proper. That is the only way in which you can have in a popular government real financial responsibility?—The financial position of India (I am speaking here subject to correction) is different from that in the United Kingdom to this extent, that several most important sources of taxation continue and are not subject to an annual vote like Land Revenue, Excise, and matters of that kind. The items of expenditure——?

7808. I speak apart from that. We have an analogy to that in the Consolidated Fund, but I am speaking of quite a different thing—that you have a reserve fund formed by savings every year, which cannot occur under the English constitution?—An enormous fund at present.

7809. We never have had that. If any Department has a surplus of any kind it is bound to surrender that surplus at the end of the year, and it goes to the Sinking Fund. The next year's vote must be voted on the responsibility of each Minister who presents his estimates, and those estimates as a whole must have a further confirmation from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who is the chief Financial Minister. That begins and is finished within the year. Now I want to see how are the sums raised each year. Are they raised in the form of estimates or by Bill?—Not by Bill. They are fixed sources of income, as a rule, like Land Revenue, Excise, and Irrigation receipts. Those are not subject to an annual vote.

7810. Could any increase in the Excise or Land Revenue be voted by the Legislative Council in the form of a Bill?—No.

Mr. Montagu.

7811. In your opinion do you think it would be a possible change in your system that increments in Excise or in Land Revenue should be voted?—No, I think that would be undesirable; it would lead to too much detailed interference in the administration of large and important subjects by people who would not understand that administration. For instance, to take a concrete case, if a district came under settlement, say a canal colony, in which there was a very large increment to be levied owing to the great increase of irrigation, you would probably have the members for that part of the country collecting all their followers and using all their influence to get that vote rescinded in the Legislative Council.

Sir Henry Craik.

7812. I have just one other question to ask you about this which is based upon what I have asked with regard to the dual system. What is your view as regards the extension of any system such as is sketched under the Montagu-Chelmsford Report to the Government of India?—I must really confess that I have not studied the matter very deeply with reference to the Government of India, because I looked on the statement of the Government of India that they were prepared to go no further than was said in that report as decisive.

7813. It is quite clear—you are of opinion, I assume—that the effect of the system of separation between transferred and reserved subjects in the Government of India would lead to great difficulty and trouble?—Yes, and there is another reason, that when the scheme of devolution is carried out the functions of the Government of India will be very largely contracted as compared with what they are at present; the number of subjects they deal with, and the extent to which they deal with them, will be enormously reduced, so that the field of experiment in the Government of India is very much smaller than in the Provinces.

7814. Taking the system advocated by the Majority Report of a larger share, without absolute dualism and separation of subjects, being given to the popularly elected element in the Government, do you think it might not be possible for that to a certain extent to be applied to the Government of India?—That will necessarily follow from the very large Indian representation in the new Legislative Assembly, and also from the increase in the number of Indian members of the Governor-General's Council.

7815. Then you have to a certain extent already in the Central Government adopted this practice of giving greater power and responsibility to—I dislike the name but it has been used right through—the popular element; you have already done so?—Yes.

7816. If you adopted the system of the Majority Report in the Provinces, you might follow a very similar scheme with regard to the Government of India, and you might not be forced to say: "This dual system may be adopted in the Provinces, but we cannot adopt it for the Central Government of India"; that is to say, the Majority Report scheme has perhaps the advantage of enabling an advance at once to be made in the Provinces and in the Central Government to a certain extent as far as you consider it wise?—I should be very glad to think that the Majority Report has not only been a help to the Provincial Administration, but also in the Government of India. That is more than we claim for it, and perhaps it is a matter on which I should hesitate to give an opinion. Personally sonally, I think it would be wise to withhold further changes in the Government of India until after the first Statutory Commission reviewed the situation.

7817. Just one question on a totally different subject; it is referred to in some of your Memoranda. You know that the Bill as drafted now proposes to change certain Lieutenant-Governorships into Governships?—Yes; I think all of them, except Burmah.

7818. And by that change it removes them from being appointed from the Indian Civil Service, or rather it makes it no longer necessary that they should be?—The Statutory provision no longer applies. I think there is a Statutory provision at present.

7819. There is a Statutory provision, and that is that the Lieutenant-Governors should be to a certain proportion men who had served ten years. By removing them from the category of Lieutenant-Governors you remove the application of that statutory limitation. You make take it that is so?—Yes.

7820. In one of your Memoranda you deal with this question. You, as a Lieutenant-Governor, must have found it necessary, I suppose, to have very close contact with all classes of Indians?—I tried to maintain it.

7821. Would it have been possible to do so had you not been familiar with the ordinary language?—No; quite impossible. I think I made a calculation which I stated in the Official Letter of the Punjab Government, that looking to the list of visitors who I thought it was desirable to see and to talk over matters with in the Punjab, most of them—70 per cent. to be exact — were ignorant of English, and my only means of communication with them was through one or other of the vernaculars. If I had not had a knowledge of the vernacular I would have been deprived in the first place of the advantage of discussing matters with those men, some of whom were the most influential men of the Province, and they would also have felt, what is perhaps more important, that they were cut off from direct access to the head of the Province, an access which the position of many of them entitled them to have. Take the biggest man we have in the Western Punjab, a man who can call up thousands of men to repress frontier disturbances, the Chief of the Masari Tribe, he did not know a word of English; he could sign his name in English and say "Thank you," but when you came to talk to him you found that he was a man of the most wonderful administrative experience and very helpful in all matters, and his advice I found almost indispensable in dealing with tribal and frontier concerns. I mention him as the most important of the class of landed gentry who are the backbone of our administration in the Punjab, the landed classes, yeomen and peasant proprietors, and the men they can bring at their backs. Those were nearly all ignorant of English; the future generation will not be, because we have been encouraging them to educate their sons in English, but it will take some generations before they know English generally.

Chairman.

7822. What are the languages in the Punjab?—There is Urdu, which is the lingua franca, and then there is Eastern Punjabi, Central Punjabi, and Western Punjabi. They all more or less glide into one another, but there is considerable difference between them. Then on the frontier you have got Baluchi and Pushtu, only in comparatively small tracts.

7823. If it is not an impertinent question, do you speak all those?—Except Baluchi.

Sir Henry Craik.

7824. And Pushtu?—I know Pushtu moderately well. I spent about seven years on the frontier before going to the Punjab.

7825. Very few can speak Pushtu?—We tried to get a certain number of our officers to qualify in it, because we have an enormous population coming through our Province every year—100,000 Pathans and Afghans come down through the Punjab, and in dealing with them it is very necessary to know their language.

7826. In the absence of that language, supposing you had been a member of Parliament or a politician appointed to such a place, you would have had to trust to your subordinates?

Chairman.

7827. You can speak through interpreters?—Yes.

Sir Henry Craik.

7828. Is it not the case that interpreters sometimes have to be watched?—I have rarely had to use them.

7829. I have heard of the Registrar of the High Court of the Punjab at Lahore, who had frequently to correct the translations of the interpreter, and I understand that that is not an infrequent experience?—No, I should be very sorry to have to depend upon an interpreter, and if you have an interpreter you cannot get into really close touch when you desire it very often with men who ought to be and are the backbone of your administration.

Sir J. D. Rees.

7830. With reference to what Sir Henry Craik has asked you about bribery, I take it the relevant issue which of course my right honourable friend meant to raise is whether under the new dispensation, when it comes into being, bribery will be more easy and more rife than before. I want to ask you whether, seeing that the vast majority of the public servants would be Hindoos, then as now, there is any ground for thinking it will be more rife?—There is always a danger of bribery in Eastern countries, and as far as public opinion can affect it, I think public opinion is beginning to show a more healthy tendency towards disapproval of bribery; but there is another factor which is necessary to put down bribery, and that is that you have to run your bribe taker down as well as your bribe giver, and prosecute him and bring him to justice. That is very up-hill work, and I do not think that you find your Indian administrator realises so acutely as a European does what an evil thing bribery is and how desirable it is at all hazards to try to repress it.

7831. When you say "administrator" have you the new Minister in mind?—I was thinking more of a magistrate or a Minister or whoever might have to deal with it.

7832. Will there be any larger opportunity with regard to those officials under the new scheme? I put to you what I believe to be the relevant issue whether there will be greater opportunities for bribery under the new dispensation than under that which is passing away; that is the question?—My reply to that would be that so far as you are Orientalising the administration there will be, I believe, a tendency to the deterioration of standards.

7833. Taking the higher officials in India, who are Hindoos—Indian gentlemen—do they lie under any suspicion now of taking bribes?—Within the last few years I am sorry to say that four members of our Provincial service—magistrates, barristers, some of them educated in England—were convicted by the Courts of bribery.

7834. In the Punjab?—In the Punjab. I should be very sorry to say that they were representative of our Provincial service; I think they were the black sheep, and we were very fortunate in being able to bring home their offences to them.

7835. There has been, at any rate, one case?—There have been four cases in the last three years.

7836. There is no service which is absolutely free from it. You were also asked by Sir Henry Craik, or rather it was suggested, that there was a difficulty in the lower classes getting into touch with the Lieutenant-Governor or with the minor officials under him. Is there really any such difficulty at all? Have not all classes direct access to the highest official during his time in camp and even in his headquarters?—Not in headquarters, I think in practice, but certainly when he is in camp.

7837. And the Lieutenant-Governor spends some months in camp every year?—Three or four months.

7838. And the lesser lights spend a still longer time in camp, probably?—Yes, five to six months.

7839. You quoted Lord Roberts' objection to dualism in the Viceroy's Council?—Yes.

7940. Subsequently, in the time of Lord Kitchener that dualism was brought to an end, was it not?—Yes.

7841. Was not the failure in Mesopotamia chiefly attributed to that change?—That I do not know. I should should be sorry to think it was due to that; anyhow I have my own opinion upon the subject. I would not atribute it to that change.

7842. It struck me as an unfortunate illustration; but as regards taxation and the separate purse, will you kindly tell the Committee (perhaps the Committee understands, and I may be the solitary exception who does not) why does the power of taxation postulate a separate purse?—I did not speak of the power of taxation, but if you give a body certain wider powers you ought to test it also by its finance, and in order to apply the financial test the only method is to give it separate financial responsibility, and that involves a separate purse.

7843. If, as I believe to be the case, the finance of both branches will be recorded and followed and checked by the Governor and the whole Government, why will it be necessary to have a separate purse?—I think it brings the results much more fairly before all parties, before the taxpayer, and before the representatives in the Council: if they say, "we start with a certain balance and certain sources of revenue, with certain items of expenditure," if after so many years working their own items separately they have their separate balance-sheets, they ought to show that they have achieved certain results at such and such a cost. If you had a joint purse, I think it would be very difficult to differentiate the items in practice.

7844. I take it that would be for the purpose of representing in the public eye the results, but, as an actual fact, would they not be equally on record and equally apparent to those whose business it was to compare and check and criticise?—The people whose most important business it would be to compare and criticise would be the electors and their representatives, and I think they will see the matter much more clearly under the system of a separate purse. I do not advocate a separate purse from the administrative point of view, but I think it follows logically.

7845. Could not the Government as a whole publish those figures? Would they not be published every year in their budgets?—The separate purse includes separate powers of taxation, and that is the great test.

7846. I do not know that?—That is what the Government of India contemplated. I have not been deeply into the matter, but I think it is contemplated that each part of the Government should impose its separate taxation, to be guaranteed by the whole Government, of course, and each would have separate powers of taxation and separate powers of borrowing.

7847. Am I right that the difference between your scheme and the scheme of the Report, is that yours does not now give responsibility? Is not that the chief difference between them?—I do not think the scheme of the Report gives more responsibility.

7848. At any rate, it is upon that issue that you differ from them, is it not?—Yes. You profess in the scheme to give responsibility, but you have necessarily imposed so many safeguards and limitations that you do not give full responsibility, and thereby you disappoint expectations and create discontent, or run the risk of further transfer of subjects—premature transfer.

7849. I do not want to cover ground that has been covered, but if you accept, as you do, the Declaration of August the 20th, 1917, that provides for the progressive realisation of responsibility, and requires that a substantial step should be taken at present. You recognise and approve to the last degree the maintenance of the power of the British Government and Parliament. The British Government has decided this and Parliament has accepted this declaration without cavil and has acted upon it and has given this Bill a second reading. Therefore, can you explain how you reconcile your present support of your own scheme, lacking responsibility, as you admit, with the scheme of the British Government upon your own admission?—Yes. I am quite prepared to do that. If you wish I will take the terms of the Announcement, one by one. There is a very material part which has been long neglected, "The policy of His Majesty's Government is that of the increasing association of Indians in every branch of the administration." My contention is, if I am told that our scheme does not fulfil the terms of the Announcement, that dualism does not fulfil the terms of the Announcement in this respect. If Indians are to be associated in every branch of the administration as laid down here, how can you assure that you divide the administration into two separate branches? How can association take place in division? You divided your administration into reserved subjects and transferred subjects you warn your Indians off to a large extent fom your reserved subjects, and you put your transferred subjects more or less under their separate control, and yet the terms of the Announcement bind you to an increasing association of Indians in every branch of the administration.

7850. Is your answer to the question that neither your scheme nor the scheme of the Bill goes as far as the declaration of the 20th August?—No, that is not my answer. I say the scheme of the Bill does not fulfil one of the requirements of the announcement of the 20th August as I interpret it.

7851. Which one?—The increasing association of Indians in every branch of the administration.

7852. It gives a great deal in that very respect, does it not?—It does not, because you divide the administration into two separate parts, and, therefore, you cannot have association where you have division.

7853. How does responsibility turn upon this exactly?—I have not yet come to responsibility at all; I am dealing with association, and I am trying to make it clear that by dividing the administration into two separate heads, and putting them under two separate authorities you are disabling yourself from fulfiling this requirement—this increasing association of Indians in every branch of the administration. If you ask me about responsibility——

7854. I do?—I say that our scheme provides for it in so far as the conditions of responsibility allow; our scheme goes as far as is possible under those conditions.

7855. If you make it a question of the conditions of responsibility I have no more to say?—But I was taking the effect of your scheme on the other.

7856. I do not ask you upon a matter of opinion; I know your opinion—you have stated it?—It is not only my opinion; it is also the opinion of the Government of India and also of the authors of the Report. If you would like me to point out in what respect our scheme gives responsibility I can point it out to you.

7857. The point I ventured to put to you was that your scheme differs from the other in not providing for responsibility, that the announcement of August, 1917, provides for responsibility, and Parliament has approved that announcement, and that I do not see how, Parliament having approved the announcement, you can put forward your scheme now without any responsibility as coming within its purview?—In reply to that, I can indicate the points on which our scheme gives responsibility. In the first place, responsibility must rest upon a certain foundation, and that foundation is an electorate. Our scheme provides as wide an electorate as is possible at present in order to establish some basis of responsibility. I admit that that basis is not a very large one, and therefore it cannot support a very great edifice of responsibility. In the next place, having established that electorate, we followed the scheme in all those respects. We agreed to a Legislative Council with a very large elective majority. We give that Legislative Council power of legislation and power as to finance, subject to necessary safeguards. Those are very large responsibilities. Finally——

7858. I beg pardon, but I only venture to interrupt by way of saving time, as those points you are on at the moment are really rather off what I was exactly on. I was not on the democratic advances concerned in your scheme, but strictly on the subject of responsibility, which I believe is wanting in it. If I am wrong——?—Our point of view may be different. I understand all these things mean a considerable advance in responsibility that is towards responsible government.

7859. Responsibility of a sort, but not responsibility to an electorate, which is what I am talking about?—We support your electorate. Your Legislative Council is responsible to the electorate.

7860. You do not provide any real electorate, do you, under your scheme?—Our scheme accepts the same electorate which has been proposed by Lord Southborough's Committee. We accept everything in the the scheme of the Montagu-Chelmsford Report and the Bill except the dualism in the Government. We accept all the principles of responsibility.

7861. Do you accept the Southborough electorate?—Yes.

7862. Since the Report came in?—Yes, since the Report came in; I do not think there was ever any doubt about it. The Southborough proposals were practically based on the proposals of the Local Governments, so that we have no reason to dissent from them. My point is that you have a very large amount of responsibility in the fact that you are constituting five millions of an electorate. When you have an elected majority in each Legislature, and when you give that elected majority powers of controlling finance and legislation, and when you are appointing in each Local Government a large Indian element in the Government itself, that is my interpretation of responsibility.

Chairman.] I think you have made that quite plain.

Sir J. D. Rees.

7863. You think the scheme of the Bill goes too far now? Generally speaking, that is your attitude, is it not?—Only in this particular respect as regards dualism, I think in endeavouring to confer separate responsibility on the Minister responsible to the Council, you are going too far for present Indian conditions.

7864. It is going too far—those are my words; I understood that to be so, and I ask you on that footing. You say elsewhere in your Memorandum many special safeguards the Bill provides. You go on, upon page 5, to say there that is only an illusory control over the transferred portion. On the next page you approve of the power given to the Governor very rightly to override his Minister, even in the administration of transferred subjects. What I ask you, for my own information only, is if this scheme goes too far, how is that compatible with the fact that the control given is purely illusory?—I should say in theory it goes too far. You are setting out this theory of responsibility, but directly you try to give effect to it in practice, you find you cannot do it, and therefore you have imposed these safeguards. It is when you come to imposing the safeguards on your theoretical scheme of responsibility that you find your responsibility is illusory.

7865. You do think that there are many safeguards which will prevent this scheme working for the too rapid development of democracy in India. You think there are many safeguards—those are your own words—special safeguards?—Yes.

7866. They do exist; you do not condemn the scheme because there are not sufficient safeguards provided to temper too rapid an advance?—Too dangerous an advance, I should say; the more rapid the better, consistent with safety.

7867. You think that safety is provided for?—In that direction, certainly, but the method is likely to arouse friction and discontent.

7868. You spoke of the educated classes being exclusively urban?—Did I say "exclusively"? If I said that, it is wrong.

Chairman.

7869. Preponderatingly?—"Preponderatingly" is the word, I think.

Sir J. D. Rees.

7870. That being so, would not that be a good reason for a somewhat broad extension of the franchise amongst the rural classes?—I do not follow.

7871. If the educated classes are chiefly urban, they would have an undue weight in the administration, but to countervail that, would not a broad, democratic franchise amongst the rural people be very desirable from a——?—That would be one way, but we have endeavoured to obtain the result in another way by basing the rural representation in this way, giving the rural interests representation according to their numbers or with some reference to their numbers. So long as you get a sufficient number of representatives, it does not matter so much how many voters you have.

7872. A reference was made to sanitary measures, and I should like to ask you whether in the Punjab they are generally intensely unpopular, and only carried by the insistence of the Indian educated classes: is that so, or not?—Sanitary developments are generally unpopular, and they are carried either by the influence of the educated classes or by the influence of the administration in more cases.

7873. You referred to the people of the Punjab, the ryot class as I understand, as being unfit to exercise the franchise on pages 8 and 9. I should like to ask you whether in the Punjab the ordinary ryot is or is not a very shrewd person, quite capable of understanding his own interests, and of casting a vote in an election, and whose opinion would be valuable on a simple issue?—Anything connected with his land or holding, his relations with the landowner, or taxation if it was a clear issue, he would be capable of giving a shrewd opinion upon.

7874. Is he not generally rather a shrewd person?—His outlook is extremely narrow, and I would not consider him capable of taking a sane political outlook on a general question.

7875. You said that the present reform movement was a movement in an anti-sectarian direction. May I ask if it is also an anti-high caste, anti-upper caste movement in any way in the Punjab?—No, I do not think so. The caste feeling in the Punjab is not nearly so strong as in other parts of India.

7876. I am not sure if I gathered from your evidence, and I should very much like to know if you think the abolition of the caste system is desirable for the advancement of reform in India? Is it necessary or desirable?—I do not know how we should get on without it, because the caste system to a large extent takes the place of Government; it supplements the action of the Government. Some of its features are admirable.

7877. Would any action on the part of the Government in the way of loosening the bonds of caste or abolishing it be compatible with Queen Victoria's Proclamation?—I think not; in fact, I think it would arouse the most serious discontent. We have had evidence of that in the agitation against the Patel Marriage Bill. I believe the Government was considered by orthodox Hindoos to have shown a disposition to favour that reform by circulating the Bill to Local Governments for their opinion. Even that small action by the Government apparently aroused great suspicion in orthodox circles that the Government was identifying itself with a movement which was directed against certain features of the caste system.

7878. You spoke of large commercial interests. Is there much foreign capital invested in the Punjab?—A great deal in the export trade, wheat and cotton, but not much in industries, it is chiefly export.

7879. Have you any reason to suppose that the interests of that capital and that trade would be jeopardised by the adoption of the reforms contemplated? Is sufficient provision made for safeguarding those great interests?—As far as I can make out, the matter was gone into by the Franchise Committee, and there was a feeling that the interests of the European trading community were not sufficiantly provided for in the scheme, and I was asked whether I would suggest that they should be given a member. I thought their numbers at present were too few for the creation of an electorate in the Punjab, and I did not proceed further with the matter; but undoubtedly the commercial interests do feel a certain anxiety as to what their position will be under the scheme.

7880. There is a question that I forgot to ask you just now. Would you say that the Punjab ryot classes—the so-called depressed classes, as it is the custom to call them now—are oppressed by the other castes and classes? Is there anything like a systematic oppression?—No; but I would not say they were treated well. They are regarded as hewers of wood and drawers of water, and of recent years, largely under the influence of Government and by funds provided by Government, there has been a movement for their uplift, with which we have endeavoured to associate every religious society in the Punjab—

Hindoo, Mohammedan and Sikh. I think that movement is bearing fruit.

7881. Apropos of the relative positions of Ministers and the members of the Executive Council, I understood you to say that there was a possibility that the Government might be by schisms rent asunder in respect to these two classes. I understood you to say that a member of the Executive Council, if he was recalcitrant, or if he did not give satisfaction, could be removed by the Government. Is that so?—Yes, he could be removed by the Crown, I said, as he is at present.

7882. He is appointed by the Crown?—And he is removable, I presume.

7883. Do you ever remember one being removed?—I cannot recall a case of a member of the Executive Council being removed, but if he refused to carry out the policy of the Governor then the only course open would be for the Governor to propose his removal.

7884. I can remember a case of a Governor being removed on that score, but do you ever remember a member of the Executive Council being removed on that score?—No.

7885. If you have answered this when I was away will you kindly tell me, so that I may not waste time? Do you think the adoption of these reforms is likely to lead to wholesale applications for proportionate pensions and a large number of retirements from the Civil Service?—I think if you have a dual Government, the Services will feel they are in a very difficult position. They will have to serve two masters, and, what is more difficult still, they will have to serve two policies. I think all the anxiety, as far as I can make out, having studied the question most thoroughly with various Departments, proceeds from that fact—that they would have to serve two masters and two policies—and that is one of the reasons why so many of the heads of Provincial Governments were strong in opposing a dual system.

7886. Do you think there will be many such retirements on that score?—Judging by the number who came in before I left India, in my own Province I am afraid the number will be very considerable.

7887. Before they have completed their service for full pensions?—Yes. I would not like to say how many came in, but, in fact, the number rather appalled me.

7888. Am I right in supposing that their pecuniary position will not be at all prejudiced by the adoption of this scheme, but rather the other way?—As far as one can make out, their pecuniary position will certainly be no worse, except to this extent, that they may find themselves in a position in which their only course will be to retire on a proportionate pension.

7889. They may, but I understood you to say they have in large numbers?—Up to the time I left the Punjab I had nine such applications.

7890. Out of a service of how many?—Out of a service of 120 within the Province. I think it was nine; I would not vouch for the exact number.

7891. Do you think that the changes that are imminent are likely prejudicially to affect the recruitment for the Indian Civil Service?—I think so, because the same causes that will make men leave the Services, very materially will prevent them from coming into the Service. These things spread very rapidly; and I think I can say that, rightly or wrongly, nine out of ten men now serving in India, whether in the Civil Service or in the Army or other services, who have got sons at school or at the University, have come to the conclusion that it is inadvisable for their sons to enter the Indian Service. I think it is a very unfortunate result, and personally I have tried to allay their anxiety. But there the fact is.

7892. Do you think that new blood, people who will not be led by forbears who had lived under the ancient system in India, the new generation of public school boys and others, are likely to shy at the prospects of India now? They will not be in the same position?—One hopes they will not, but one knows that in these matters school boys or University men are rather like a flock of sheep; the word goes round and the tendency is for everyone to follow one course.

7893. I gather that you regard electorates in which there is a true representation of the people of all classes as the real foundation of government?—Yes.

7894. And if that foundation cannot be securely laid, there can be no real responsibility in the limited technical sense. The main responsibility is that of the elected to the electorate?—Yes. My view is that you cannot build up a very stable edifice on an unstable foundation.

7895. The utility of your Eastern stream that you wish to combine with the Western stream will depend really on the electorate being a valid electorate?—Yes.

7896. You have had great experience of elections in India during the last thirty years; can you give an instance of the difficulties which arise in elections in securing the results which they ought to produce?—In the first place, you get a very large number of people in the Punjab who are opposed to election at all. When I took charge of the Punjab I found there were thirty municipalities in which they did not exist. In endeavouring to introduce the elective system we made inquiries and we found that some agreed to it, but a good many said, "Do nothing to force on us an elective system which will arouse all our latent animosities and give rise to new factions, and generally create an undesirable state of affairs." I think we were able, with all the goodwill in the world, to impose an elective syystem in only twelve cases; in the other eighteen cases, owing to feuds or factions, or corruption of the most widespread kind, we had to defer to the local view and refuse to compel them to adopt an elective system.

7897. Therefore it is very probable that at first, at any rate, there would be huge abstentions from elections?—Yes; judging by what takes place at present in municipal elections and in District Board elections, the abstentions will be enormous, in fact people only go to the poll at present in large numbers when there is some personal or sectarian issue involved.

7898. Therefore for some time really an electoral scheme cannot be expected to get into real working order at all?—No; because you have to arouse interest; you have to educate your electorate, and you have to establish your machinery.

7899. You said that 80 per cent. of the rural electorates in the Punjab will be illiterate. There must be a danger, must there not, in a case like that, that those illiterate people will be liable to be swayed by propaganda of all kinds?—Yes; I think their case will be like that which I have quoted from Mill: If they vote at all they will not bestow their suffrages on public grounds, but sell them for money, or vote for some who have control over them, or whom for private reasons they desire to propitiate.

7900. So there may be real dangers that reports circulated at an election may sway the electors into doing what they would not do if they understood the issue?—Yes. While education and enlightenment generally is as low as it is at present, I am afraid there will be that danger.

7901. Then do you think it is really possible to supervise the very large new electorates that you are going to have?—I think in the Punjab, where we have about 240,000 electors, we could barely manage it by closing down all our other administrative work for the week or so that the elections were going on, and devoting all our energies to the conduct of the elections. Even then it would be a very serious difficulty, and we would have an enormous number of petitions and objections to dispose of afterwards. In the other Provinces, which have over a million electors, honestly I do not contemplate how they would propose to cope with the work. We find in the Punjab the polling of, say 15,000 to 20,000 voters, even though they are polled as Hindoos, Mohammedans, and Sikhs separately, is a matter of the greatest difficulty. We have to suspend all public work for a week and put all our officers in charge charge of these elections, and even then we do not carry them out very satisfactorily.

7902. You have considered the electorates in the Punjab as proposed by the Southborough Committee. Do you think they give due representation to all the various communities, and especially to the agricultural population?—They do not give representation to the agricultural population in proportion to their numbers, but they accepted the proposal of the Local Government Board, of which I was head at the time, and we gave the urban population increased numbers, largely owing to the fact that the state of education was much higher in urban areas than in rural areas. In relation to the population I think in towns you have only one-tenth of the total elected members; we gave them about one-sixth, in view of their higher level of education and intelligence, and in view of the fact that in the towns you have already a large number of people who are exercising the franchise. We made that concession to the urban population, but it was rather resented, I must admit, by the rural populations, who thought that representation should be in accordance with population.

7903. We have had a memorandum presented to us by Sir Malik Umra Khan saying that the rural class, which contributes 90 per cent. of the revenue, will not have adequate representation, and it is suggested that that class will suffer under the various reforms?—I think under the franchise scheme, although the rural population will not be represented in proportion to its population, still it will have such strong representation that it should be able hereafter, when properly organised, to protect its own interests; but at present, of course, it is unorganised.

7904. Do you see any other way, except by an increase of the communal system, of giving representation to the lower classes in India—except by extending the communal system more than we have it already?—That would be the most effective and desirable way, but it would be also advisable to secure their representation through nomination. In Provinces like the Punjab, where the depressed classes do not bulk so large as they do down country, at present, until there is some sort of organisation evident amongst them, I think it would be better to have them represented by nomination.

7905. In other cases, where they have organisations, do you think nominations from a panel sent in by their own organisations would be a good way of meeting their case and giving them representation?—Prima facie, I should think so, but I do not know enough of local conditions in those cases to give a very definite opinion.

7906. Was there not real danger at one time that all the land in the Punjab and elsewhere would be taken out of the hands of the hereditary cultivators into the hands of moneylenders and town capitalists?—In certain parts of the Punjab the danger was very acute; in the western part of the Punjab, where you had a Mohammedan peasantry and Hindoo moneylenders, the Mohammedan peasantry was particularly ignorant and the moneylenders were not always over scrupulous. The result was that alienation was proceeding at a terrific pace, leading to riots, murders, and serious political discontent. In the rest of the Punjab the situation was not so acute, but even there the alienation was becoming a serious political danger, and it was owing to the realisation of these facts that the Punjab Government of the time determined to take action.

7907. You have told us that that Bill was strongly opposed by some of the Indian politicians. Has not that happened in the case of some other measures intended to benefit the working classes?—I think factory legislation in India has generally been opposed by the urban representatives, the moneyed interests in the Councils. The hours of labour at present in Indian factories, I think, are allowed by Statute to be twelve hours a day, but, even so, I think any reduction of the hours or any improvement in factory conditions meets with a great deal of opposition. I have never myself had to put a Factory Bill through, but that is so far as I know. Another very important matter in India has been the co-operative movement, especially among the rural classes. That really supplements the Land Alienation Act. The Land Alienation Act restricts credit from the village moneylender; the co-operative credit organisation supplies a man with credit from his own brethren; and the co-operative credit movement, which has been working about ten years, received great opposition from the moneyed interests and generally from the urban interests in the Punjab and from the sections of the administration which are drawn from those classes. We had frequent complaints from our co-operative societies that they were being very hardly treated by our civil judges and others who belonged to classes to which the moneylenders belong.

7908. So that those classes do require safeguards, and you are not surprised that one receives constant telegrams begging that they shall have the benefit of communal representation of their classes?—I do not think we heard much about communal representation until it was known that the Government was going to withdraw from certain branches of the administration. As long as the Government was willing to retain its control over every branch of the administration the desire for communal representation did not show itself, but directly it appeared that the Government were going to withdraw from administration, and that Indian administrators were going to take it up, then all classes, especially minorities, were on the alert to try to protect their own interests, because they felt some suspicion, rightly or wrongly, that they might not receive impartial consideration under the altered conditions.

7909. Is that the main objection to the dual Government—that the two sections of it would derive their authority from different sources and by a different form of control? Is not that the vital objection to it?—Yes, that appears to be so.

7910. And there is nothing better laid down, for instance in instructions or in statute, to get over that difficulty and to bridge over that difference?—No.

7911. It is an organic difference?—Yes.

7912. In those conditions, is not antagonism almost certain to develop?—I am afraid that for a long time to come there will be serious risk of it.

7913. Is it not a serious thing that we should begin the reform with a system which is likely to start in antagonism?—Yes; I think it is very desirable that we should have a calm and peaceful atmosphere to start the new system of administration.

7914. Do you think it is possible that in the Legislative Council one half of the Government can sit aside while the other half is proposing and supporting and arguing for a Bill of which the other half does not approve? Is it a conceivable state of things?—I suppose under this Convention, which it is hoped to establish, one half of the Government must not actively oppose a measure which the other half is bringing forward. It must, as I have said already to-day, content itself with a benevolent neutrality, or an armed neutrality, or a correct neutrality.

7915. Is the neutrality to be on both sides? Is the popular Minister to be silent when the Executive proposes its Bill?—That is the intention.

7916. It is to be reciprocal?—It is to be reciprocal.

7917. Then at certain periods one half of the Government is always to be muzzled in the Legislative Council?—I hope in many cases, even under the dual system, the Ministers and the Executive Councillors would see eye to eye; but cases, important cases, would undoubtedly arise where they differed, and in those cases I should say one of them would be muzzled.
